And now Mary and Charles were alone. In spite of all Charles's love and care, Mary's sad illness returned very often, and then she had to go away from home and from her brother; and though she went to the same kind people, whom she loved, it was always a terrible grief to Charles. When Mary felt her illness coming on, she was quite willing to go, and got herself ready quite gently and uncomplainingly; and a friend describes how he once met the brother and sister walking together towards the home where she was to stay, both crying bitterly.

In the intervals, when Mary was well, they were very happy. There is a delightful account of a most happy visit of Mary and Charles to Coleridge and his family at the Lakes, which they enjoyed boundlessly. They also made friends with Wordsworth and his sister Dorothy.

Mary and Charles together wrote and published a little book of poetry for children, and a story called "Mrs. Leicester's School," and then they wrote "Tales from Shakespeare," of which Mary did the largest share. Charles also wrote several volumes of essays, called "Essays of Elia," and it is in one of these volumes that the story of little Barbara is to be found, which I told you last week.

And so their life went on, year after year, spent in complete devotion to each other. They had much sadness, but a good deal of happiness, an dmany friends. Charles's writings are full of humour, as well as pathos.

He died at the age of fifty-nine, after a short illness; Mary was ill at the time, and away from home, and unable for nearly a year fully to understand and realise his death; but when she recovered, she learned to bear her solitude very patiently, and out of love for Charles was content to be the one left alone. She lived without him thirteen years, after his death, and then followed him in 1847.

This, briefly, is the story of Charles Lamb's devoted and self-sacrificing life.

GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom, or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, JUNE 27, 1903.

PROFESSOR UPTON'S FAREWELL.

THE close this week of the present session of Manchester College, Oxford, marks the termination of Professor UPTON'S tenure of the chair of Philosophy, to which he was called as Dr. MARTINEAU'S successor, and which he has now held for twenty-eight years. The proceedings at the end of the session we must report next week. They will doubtless include words of grateful recognition and warm appreciation of the services rendered by Mr. UPTON for so many years, not to the College alone, but to our religious community as a whole. But meanwhile, we must claim the privilege at once, in this week of his farewell, of bearing affectionate testimony to what we owe to a friend and teacher, who, though the most modest of men, and working always in the most unobtrusive ways, has exercised a salutary and quickening influence upon the religious thought of a growing circle of students and readers, and by the beautiful spirit of his life has been a teacher in the best sense of all, whom in his old age we must delight to honour.

Mr. UPTON has been for many years one of the most valued contributors to THE INQUIRER, and we are happy to know that his good-will and interest in our work are unfailing, so that we may hope during the coming years that these columns will still often be enriched by his searching criticisms and the stimulus of his ripe wisdom and spiritual faith, even as his connection with Manchester College is not to be altogether broken, and he will remain emeritus professor, still lecturing from time to time, and offering to fresh generations of students what has been in the past of such inestimable worth—the privilege of his counsel and friendship. In the philosopher's retreat at Littlemore they will find, what many a one now gratefully remembers,—the truth of that ancient word: "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom." For even in the midst of keen discussions, in the gracious light of most unselfish kindness, "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

Like his great predecessor, Mr. UPTON came as a teacher to Manchester College, from Liverpool, where he had been for eight years minister of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth. Like Dr. MARTINEAU, he had also been in earlier years a student in the College, and, indeed, a pupil of the teacher whom he was to succeed. In the Martineau Memorial number of THE INQUIRER he gave a delightful description of the intercourse he enjoyed in later years with his revered friend. This was quoted in the preface to the "Survey of Dr. MARTINEAU'S Philosophical Work" which Mr. UPTON contributed to the second volume of the "Life and Letters," a masterly piece of work which proved, for any who still needed the assurance, how eminently fitted he had been, by his powers of lucid exposition and his keen and sympathetic insight, for the office of teaching to which he was called. But, indeed, that had long been known, not only to those within the intimate circle of the College, but to all who were acquainted with Mr. UPTON'S earlier writings. During his Liverpool ministry he had begun a series of contributions to the Theological Review, which included articles on "Evolution and Religion," "Christian Pantheism," "Human Automatism," and an examination of "Mill's Essays on Religion." Then several of his lectures at the opening of College sessions were published, and in 1893 he gave the Hibbert Lectures, published in the following year, on "The Bases of Religious Belief." If we are to name one among Mr. UPTON'S many contributions to these columns, as of special interest and value, it shall be the three articles in December, 1900, in criticism of "Dr. P. T. Forsyth on the Unitarianism of Dr. Martineau."

It was in October, 1875, that Mr. UPTON entered on his duties as professor in Manchester College, then in London, and he then gave the opening lecture of the session. We are tempted to give one extract from this lecture, which was on "The Place of a Science of Theology Amongst University Studies." Dealing towards the end of the lecture with the question of Personality in God, Mr. UPTON said :—

> One obvious truth we must always keep in view—every mode of energy conceivable by man is of necessity either Personal or something lower than Personal. The momentous consideration for us then is, Do the facts of nature and of history, when combined with the conclusions of a sound psychology, warrant the belief that in the Intelligence, the Rectitude, and the Love of man there is a finite reflex of some features in the perfections of the Infinite and Eternal God? In favour of an affirmative reply, there is first, the logical demand that the Cause of our personal life must possess at least the excellences which He has summoned into existence; and there is also the fact of Science, which urges upon us the reflection that the Energy around us which is ever weaving the marvellous web of natural phenomena, must have some affinity with that human intellect which has proved itself able to unravel and to explain in part the complex texture of the outer world. It is, however, to the direct testimony of the individual consciousness that theology must have recourse for its most satisfying proofs. If our own spiritual experiences combined with the recorded facts of biography and history eloquently testify to personal contact with the Eternal—to a Guiding Voice we cannot choose but hear, to spiritual tranquillity and strength proportioned to our moral faithfulness, to enlightenment and comfort in answer to our earnest prayers; if, further, in our higher and choicer moods this feeling of personal sympathy between ourselves and the All-pervading Spirit becomes more vivid and unmistakable, then, I say, we have sufficient reason to believe that the excellences and satisfactions involved in personality are in perfection inherent in the nature of God. Thus fortified, we may, I think, cheerfully confront the doubtful questionings I have referred to above. No longer will they avail to quench our faith, rather will they utter to us wholesome and needful warnings. They will save us from futile attempts to define the Eternal, to limit Him unduly by assumed human analogies, but they will be no bar to a modest study of theology, to a real and progressive insight into those aspects of the Divine Nature, the knowledge of which is all-important to the heart and mind of man.

In that spirit Mr. UPTON began his teaching in the College, and both the Hibbert Lectures and his study of Dr. MARTINEAU'S Philosophy bear witness to the wealth of insight, the earnest devotion to truth, and the fervour of aspiration after knowledge of the highest, which he brought to the fulfilment of his task. But no published works can bear complete testimony to the charm and power of the teacher's personality. Only the friends who have enjoyed the privilege of private converse with him on the deepest questions of life know the full measure of his goodness, and how, amid disabilities which might have warped a spirit less unselfish, he has pursued his course with single-minded purpose, and has constantly led those who came to him for help into paths of life-giving truth.

For such a teacher in the evening time surely there shall be light. We rejoice to think of the many friends who will wish at this time to gather round with grateful acknowledgments, with the earnest hope that there may yet remain to Mr. UPTON many days for a rich harvest of the philosophic kind, and with the assurance that, be the days few or many, they cannot be without solace or bare of affection for one who has been the faithful servant of that Wisdom known of old as "a loving spirit."

THE part played in controversial church life by the late Cardinal Vaughan was typical of Rome in its least hopeful tendencies. It was vain to look to him for countenance save on the rigorous terms of complete submission to the traditions of the Church, as Dr. St. George Mivart proved to his cost. As a force in popular life he was far inferior to Manning, and in intellectual life he was immeasurably below Newman. But he was at least as assiduous in performing the pieties as in maintaining the prerogatives of the priesthood, and in Manchester and Salford he left behind memories full of gratitude and true reverence.

AN APPRECIATION OF MARTINEAU'S PHILOSOPHY.

THE following letter addressed by the Rev. W. Mackintosh Mackay, M.A., B.D., of the United Free Church of Scotland, to Professor Upton, of Manchester College, Oxford, we are glad to be permitted to publish here. The letter speaks for itself, but we should add that it was written purely as a private expression of gratitude, and with no intention in the writer's mind that it should ever be used for any other purpose.

5, Westfield-terrace, Aberdeen,
April 29, 1903.

To the Rev. C. B. Upton.

Dear Sir,—I feel I ought to thank you for the great pleasure your account of Martineau's philosophical opinions has given me. As I am a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, I, of course, occupy a position theologically far apart from him, but since reading his "Endeavours" years ago I have always felt at one with him.

I did not, however, know his philosophy (to my regret now), as I studied at Glasgow about fifteen years ago under Dr. Caird, now Master of Balliol. Under his magnetic influence I became for a time an enthusiastic Hegelian, and contemptuously spurned the home-spun product of my native land. I found, however, on coming into a pulpit what you indicate—namely, that there was an entire divorce between my Ethics and my Philosophy. The discord, curiously, did not reach my Theology, as I thought that the Hegelian "Right" gave the true interpretation of the Logik, and for the rest I took refuge in the (I now think) unmoral distinction between Vorstellung and Begriff. Besides, Professor A. B. Bruce had made me fall in love with Christ, and I could not give him up, even for Hegel.

I was, however, often disappointed that Hegel's Ethics had so little place in my scheme. "Self-realisation" seemed a poor substitute for "man's chief end is to glorify God." Nor did I like their nebulous treatment of Freedom and Personality.

Under this, Hegelianism has fallen away from me for years, and I have been attracted to Ritschlianism largely from its contempt of Metaphysics. But I now see that Metaphysics as Martineau developed it on the basis of patient Psychological Reflection has a noble place, and I mean, whenever I have time, to take up his books and read them through. It is not easy with a large city pastorate, but I mean to try. Thanks very much for your lucid account. I take a very different view of Martineau to that which Professor Seth takes in this month's Hibbert Journal, and regard him as a philosopher who will live far longer than some of those at present in vogue.

Curiously enough, though all powerful in our Scottish Colleges, Hegelianism has little or no influence on our practical life. The men of Science are largely agnostic—the men of Religion have practically no philosophy.

I think the time will come when the Scottish Philosophy, as revised and deepened by Martineau's profound Psychology, will have its innings; so that I cannot agree with Mr. Hutton when he put Martineau's religious influence higher than his philosophical. However, I feel that I have little right to judge in these matters, but could not refrain from thanking you for a great pleasure.

If I might suggest any criticism it would be whether Schopenhauer's conception of "The World as Will and Idea" has not something akin to Martineau's doctrine of Causation, and was not worthy of more reference. Of course Schopenhauer's Ethics was impossible, but I always thought that his insistence against the Idealists that there was more in the world than Idea, there was also Will, was worth something; and Martineau's emphasis on the sense of "resistance" in matter seems in line with that.—I am, yours very truly,

WILLIAM MACKINTOSH MACKAY.

In sending the letter, with the writer's kind consent, for publication, Mr. Upton asks us to add the following note:—

By an inexcusable oversight on my part it was stated in the "Life and Letters" that the memorial notice of Dr. Martineau in the Spectator was "probably from the pen of his old pupil Mr. R. H. Hutton." This, however, could not possibly have been the case, for Mr. Hutton died two years before Dr. Martineau; and, further, he had reviewed all Dr. Martineau's greater works, and had given a very high estimate of their philosophical value. I should also like to add that Mr. Mackay is quite right in what he says about the close affinity between Martineau's views and those of Schopenhauer in regard to Causation, and attention should have been called to this in my account of Dr. Martineau's philosophy. Dr. Martineau regarded Schopenhauer's refutation of Hegelian Idealism as a masterly and conclusive piece of work, and Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung was one of his favourite books.

CHARLES B. UPTON.

WE are much interested to hear from Professor Eerdmans of Leiden, that the Dutch Government have offered the chair of "Old-Christian Literature and Exegesis of the New Testament" at the University of Leiden to Dr. J. Rendel Harris, of Cambridge. This is the chair from which Professor van Manen has just retired. Whether Dr. Rendel Harris has accepted the appointment we have not yet heard. It certainly would be interesting if this country could in this way repay a little of all that great debt it owes to the scholars of Holland.

PORT SUNLIGHT.—Messrs. Lever Bros., Limited, write to us as follows:—On page 410 of THE INQUIRER, dated June 20th, you publish a paragraph on the opening of the Auditorium, Port Sunlight. The report contains one very grave inaccuracy, which we fear we must ask you to correct. You state that this firm have "already provided a large proportion of their employees with beautiful and healthy homes rent free, while continuing to pay trades union rate of wages." The statement regarding rent is wrong. The tenants pay a rent sufficient to keep the houses on the Estate in proper repair (no interest on capital involved being charged), and in addition they pay their own rates. [We regret the mistake.—ED. INQUIRER.]

NOTES FROM ASSISI.

"AS-SISI!" sings out the porter, and the traveller, who has had his eyes fixed from afar on the city climbing the slopes of Monte Subasio, suddenly realises with a sort of horror that he has arrived at the heart of the Middle Ages by train! It is perhaps one degree less incongruous than a visit by motor-car, such as those which I one day saw flying in procession down the windings of the hill and along the road past the sanctuary of the Portiuncula.

What impressions can the passing traveller gather that may interest the readers of THE INQUIRER? Everyone, now, knows all about St. Francis—for has not M. Sabatier once for all told the wonderful story—while the enterprise of Mr. Dent has put the Fioretti and the precious "Mirror of Perfection," composed by Brother Leo only a few months after the death of his master, within reach of all. Yet a few notes may be here set down, partly to draw attention to the real complexity of the interests which await the visitor who will give a few days to realise the spirit of the place.

There is, first of all, its exceeding natural beauty. The city stands some three hundred feet or more above the broad vale below, once, doubtless, a vast lake. Behind it rises Monte Subasio, to the height, say, of Skiddaw; though without the dignity of form which gives so regal a character to the Cumbrian mountain. From the windows of the Hotel Subasio, built on the city wall, the visitor looks across some fifteen miles of richly cultivated plain to the proud towers of Perugia on their lofty hill. Morning by morning did the eastern sun light them with exceeding brilliance. In the opposite direction the vale is bounded by ranges of hills which take colours of enchantment as the hours pass. Now clear and firm, by and by they melt into distances so soft and tender that the plain which they encompass loses all distinctness, and seems like some exquisite sea tinted with hues of the most delicate opal. Here before one's eyes lie the lovely landscapes which Perugino was wont to set behind Nativity and Transfiguration. You have but to climb the mountain, and the expanse of Lake Trasimene lies spread out before you. Yonder are the snowy masses of the Apennines. Northwards are the upper valleys through which young Tiber makes his way. All over the grassy downs which crown the ridge, pink and yellow orchises, a large golden oxslip, purple pansy and bright blue forget-me-not, run riot in sunshine; and though in a few minutes the ground for miles is white with hail, the storm will not crush them; they will sing their song of praise again unharmed. One can see what was one of the sources of that joy which bore up Francis till the last years of his life, and inspired his constant wonder and adoration. Alas for his followers, who no longer chant (so one of them told me) the "Canticle of the Sun"!

The city of Assisi, like so many of its neighbours, Perugia on the one side, Spoleto on the other, or the smaller towns in similar situations, such as Spello and Trevi, stands on the site of one far more ancient. Here Propertius was born in the first century before our era. The town square covers the ancient forum. A noble Corinthian portico—once the front of a temple of Minerva—marks the entrance to a church. Away in a top corner, under the shadow of the mediæval fortress, stand the remains of an amphitheatre dexterously adapted to the mountain slope. In the interval between the Roman age and the thirteenth century, one figure rises of supreme interest, though the glory of Francis has cast it into the shade—that of Benedict, founder of the great monastic order of the West, in the sixth century. His home at Nursia lay at the foot of an adjoining mountain among these Umbrian valleys. Tradition connects him with the little chapel of the Portiuncula, and the chapel itself, whose bold round arch of Roman type over the doorway Benedict is believed to have rebuilt, was already (so runs the legend) there before him. High up on the side of Monte Subasio, some three miles or so east of the city, was a monastery built in the eleventh century which preserved his memory. It has been in ruins for centuries. There is no cult of St. Benedict. Gregory's account of him has found no modern translator. The fine ladies who come to Assisi, with their maids and their dogs and their parrots, and declare themselves charmed, and assure M. Sabatier "Je suis tout-à-fait Franciscaine," know nothing of him. But there would have been no Francis had there been no Benedict.

In the interval grew that strange city, with its narrow streets, its steep stairways, its crumbling towers and faded palaces. The houses seem to have stood in all sorts of curious relations with each other in past times. Arches that lead nowhere, windows long since walled up, projecting cornices that cover nothing, show quaint traces of former siege and repair, perpetual ruin and restoration. And here again and again one may see the ancient "doors for the dead," through which in older days the body was carried forth to burial, and the opening was closed immediately that the spirit might not make its way back and re-enter the old home. On the venerable façade of the Cathedral, the imagination of the twelfth century portrayed its faith in the power of the Church to heal man's warring passions and feed his soul with heavenly grace by many a quaint symbol—animals that rend and devour, the wandering vine where birds eat the sacramental grape, the hart and the dove which typify the regenerated believer. As in so many other churches, the interior underwent complete transformation late in the sixteenth century. One church only did I discover much in the condition in which St. Francis might have known it, the beautiful little church of San Pietro. Small and unpretending, it has the inestimable quality of style. The three rose windows of the front, the two noble bays which form the nave, the massive stone piers happily unspoiled by plaster or stucco ornament, the apse (marred by an ill-placed organ and a still more ill-placed square window), the beautiful cupola where row after row of naked stones show every detail of the structure—on all these St. Francis might have looked as they are to-day. But the contours of the city have changed. The vast projections at the western end, which instantly take the eye of the visitor ascending from below, only grew up by degrees beyond the church in which St. Francis is enshrined. When that church, so quaintly doubled, the upper rising on the top of the lower, was first reared, it stood on a detached hill outside the walls, and was reached from the city by a bridge. The grassy square at the end of the nave of the upper church, the platforms and terraces below, which now unite the old fabric to the town, took centuries to construct.

Everyone knows the importance of this church in the history of Italian art. Here are the frescoes in which is recorded the transition from the older Byzantine style to the new forms wherein Giotto and his successors embodied the thought and feeling of the wonderful age which had Dante for its poet. In Francis, art found a new subject. Tradition had long been at work upon the Gospel story. Successive generations might modify the old forms, might change the personal types, might introduce new details into sacred scenes. But imagination was not wholly free to work as it pleased. In the legend of Francis, on the other hand, each incident demanded fresh treatment. And the creative power of the artists of the upper church at once established the types for the holy tale. When Benozzo Gozzoli painted a similar series afterwards at Montefalco on the opposite hill, he could do little more than reproduce the earlier inventions (though he, too, had enough of the poetic spirit to design a lovely picture of the meeting of Francis and Dominic not included in the earlier series). Among all the churches which I have seen in Italy, this surely ranks first in intensity and variety of interest. The upper church, which stands on the nave, transept, and apse of the lower, without its clustering chapels, possesses the charm of the most exquisite simplicity of style. Here is true Gothic, with rare harmony of proportions, where architecture and painting have combined to produce a perfect work. Column and arch, sculpture and fresco, seen amid the rich hues of mediæval glass, have been wrought into exquisite completeness. Its chastened wealth is indeed a strange monument to the saint who wedded the Lady Poverty, but never did art lay a lovelier offering at the shrine of religion.

Not, however, at the Church of St. Francesco—where we witnessed, on the anniversary of its foundation, a lengthy exhibition of relics—not even in the tiny chapel of the "Little Portion," beneath the vast dome of Saint Mary of the Angels, did the real Francis spring into life for me. There you may see, indeed, step by step, how the correspondence was drawn out between the disciple and his Lord. Just as in the church reared over Bernardone's house up in the city, the monk in charge shows you an old arch just outside the door, and assures you that beneath that arch Pica passed into the stable to give birth to the future saint, so on one of the pulpits in the great structure on the plain St. Francis is depicted as descending to Hades, to preach to the spirits in the realm below. Well might one of the brethren complain, when I asked him if he knew M. Sabatier, "No, we are not allowed to read his book; he has done for St. Francis what Strauss did for Christ." Not even at the Carceri, in the quaint pile wedged in among the rocks of the ravine, where a stout, blue-bloused, red-capped cook received us, and pantingly escorted us up and down the narrow steps and winding paths, not there could I find him. But on the last day before I left, M. Sabatier kindly took me to the old lepers' quarter down in the valley, where he washed the sores of the poor sufferers, and showed them a sympathy none had made them feel before. Anyone who has seen the lepers congregated at the gates of Jerusalem, can easily imagine how unhappy was their lot. Through fields of corn sown among the olives, where the vines are trained over trees quaintly pollarded for their service, the railway runs eastward from the station for some distance beside the old Roman road along the valley from Perugia. At right angles with it another Roman road ran up to the city, which it entered at the Porta di Moiana. This road also still exists. The corner thus made was assigned to the lepers. No one then dared to cultivate the plain. Its fields would have been exposed to perpetual inroad. It was covered with oak forest, such as still remains here and there upon the hills, especially around Lake Trasimene, and then offered shelter to the bandit and the outlaw. Two little chapels, now both disused, stood in this small tract; one was allotted to the women, the other to the men. The latter is only a small square room, and is now incorporated in an adjoining cottage. The other was of Romanesque architecture, and stood alone: with its round-arched entrance and terminal apse, it still possesses a distinction of its own. Beside it was a peasant's tiny farmstead, the house with its outside stair-way and its little loggia above being of the very type, observed M. Sabatier, of a Roman country dwelling. To this devoted student the archives of Assisi had disclosed the lists containing the very names of the lepers in St. Francis' day. This was the true holy ground. Here he had passed to and fro, exerting all his self-control to bear with the ill-temper of the miserable patients. There were no misleading associations here; only the spirit of charity breathed gently among the trees, and seemed to find an echo in the voice of M. Sabatier, as he gathered the children round him, and made their faces brighten with laughter, and then gave them a parting word, "Addio, cari."

I heard much from M. Sabatier of the conditions of thought among the more cultivated priests of France and Italy; much, also, of new movements, in France especially, slowly and silently gaining strength among the people, and destined (in his judgment) to have growing influence in the future. They are outside the Churches now. Protestantism is so much occupied with holding its own position, that it pays but scant attention to them; it has not sufficient imagination to realise the possibilities which they present; and Catholicism is bound by its traditions and cannot accept them. What will their issue be? M. Sabatier is full of hope. We are on the eve, he thinks, of a great spiritual revival, though it will not take the old forms, and may use a language of a different type from the ordinary vocabularies of faith. Be it so, then. Let us prepare ourselves to recognise and welcome the Francis of the twentieth century, who shall renew within us in whatsoever ways the love of God, of nature, and of man.

J. E. C.

A SCOTTISH SUMMER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY.

WHEN Emerson began his famous address to the Divinity students at Cambridge with the expression of a joyous seasonal experience, he set a great example. His captivating words: "In this refulgent summer it has been a luxury to draw the breath of life. The grass grows, the buds burst, the meadow is spotted with fire and gold in the tint of flowers. The air is full of birds and sweet with the breath of the pine," called attention to Nature's evangel, and set up the standard of the true faith which, as he said, "should blend with the light of rising and setting suns, with the flying cloud, the singing birds, and the breath of flowers."

But even if the lecturers of the Summer School of Theology held at Aberdeen with June more than half through, had shared Emerson's convictions, they would have lacked his sunny experience, for the days were chill and damp. The calendar notified summer, but the actual weather crossed the almanack.

So was it with the theology of the School: nominally one thing, it was actually another.

The School was the project of ministers of the United Free Church. Its lecturers, with one or two exceptions, were Presbyterians, who had signed the Confession of Faith, and its two hundred students were mainly ministers of the United Free Church. But the Confession, except in one lecture, did not cast its shadow on the School. The lecturers were in mufti, and the students on holiday. The theology expounded was not Calvinistic, but manifested itself as a modern compound, which, being not yet baptized authoritatively, is here unnameable. It was really a species of liberalism, characterised by very large concessions to modernity, and by earnest reconstructive effort. It indicated a new attitude, a new light, and a new doctrine.

The School deserves more than a passing notice because it indicated the stage at which Scottish theology has arrived in its journey from dogmatic Calvinism to free rationalism. It has got to the "top of Pisgah, which looketh towards Jeshimon," and is now treating with "Sihon, King of the Amorites," for a passage through his land (the "Amorites" being its own superstitions and preconceptions). Its Aaron is dead, and its Moses can only look across wistfully to the land whereon he will not set foot.

There were several significant circumstances connected with the School. It met in the college (U.F.C.) from which Professor W. Robertson Smith was deposed for heresy, and in the hall wherein his portrait hangs. From behind, facing the speakers, his studious eyes looked out of the canvas, in the western light, sympathetically yet reproachfully, on the assembly which applauded broader heresies than those which deprived him of office.

Dr. Dods, who gave four lectures out of the nineteen, and exercised the strongest influence during the proceedings, is an escaped heretic of his Church. By making him a professor, his sect finally forgave his heresy, and now gladly assimilates his developed teaching.

Another of the lecturers, Dr. Gibson, is son of one who was the most active prosecutor of the Rev. W. C. Smith for alleged heresy, but is himself a variant in the direction of liberalism. He gave an illuminating address on "Mission Sidelights on Theology."

Another thing which made the School significant was the Spring Revival Mission conducted here by two American evangelists. These revivalists were backed by leading members of the United Free Church. Dr. Torrey promulgated the theory of Biblical infallibility, sent the "Higher Critics" to perdition, repudiated evolution, and otherwise spoke for the old Calvinistic dogmas. The same persons countenanced the Summer School, which stood for an opposite view of the Bible, criticism, evolution, &c.

I wondered if the School was intended diplomatically to counteract the mission. Judging by the manner in which the lectures were received, the students of the Summer School have no sympathy with Dr. Torrey's views. There was no appearance of dissent, no sign of disapproval, but the most cordial acceptance of even the most pronounced departure from the old dogmatic position.

As one trained in the Calvinistic circle in the atmosphere of the Free Church, I recognised the change of air and attitude.

I remembered sitting through the prosecution of Walter C. Smith, alongside of Dr. Crosskey, partly amused and saddened by the Calvinistic fanaticism it manifested, and could hardly recognise the sect in its new aspect.

Forty years ago, while a member of the Free Church, I was directed to Marcus Dods, then minister of Renfield Free Church, Glasgow, as one likely to stay my lapse from Calvinism. I tried him, with the effect of having my lapse hastened. I had not seen or heard him again till I did so at the Summer School. He has been one of the most arduous reconstructors of the much altered Church. As I listened to him there arose before my mind the figures of the heretics of his and of the U.P. Church belonging to these changeful years—Wm. Knight, George Gilfillan, Walter C. Smith, David Macrae, Fergus Ferguson, and W. Robertson Smith, and I imagined the Summer School as making atonement with their spirits. Itself a heretic, the Free Church has much to answer for in the way of theological prosecution!

It is quite evident that the United Free Church is now determined to retain and even to glorify the heretic. Indeed, "heresy" is obsolete in Scotland, and criticism and variation are sanctified.

But I felt that, as a Unitarian, I am as far from the reconstructed orthodoxy as I was from the dogmatic position of the Free Church forty years ago. I was made freshly aware of the gulf existing between reformed Calvinism and Unitarianism. Advanced though the theology of the School is in relation to the Calvinian standards, I had a sense of halting, compromise, and lack of thoroughness. There was an air of freedom and conscious emancipation, a strenuous girding of the loins for further advance, and a sincere desire to find reality, and yet there was narrowness, backwardness, and incapacity.

It would take a long article to explain this. Let me indicate it briefly, though my words have no value but that of personal opinion.

Dr. Denney, to whom was entrusted the important part of opening and sounding the rallying cry of the School, had for his subject "The Atonement and the Modern Mind." All through his weighty and exhaustive lectures there is evident a desire to concede and conserve, to retain and yet reconstruct orthodoxy, to keep the old bottles and have the new wine. While he spoke I thought of the Apocalyptic angel having one foot on the land and another on the sea. He surrendered the inspiration of Scripture, and declared that in discussing the Atonement, a doctrine of the origin of sin (such as is based on the third chapter of Genesis) is unnecessary. He warmly disowned the forensic doctrine of the Atonement, and yet endeavoured to retain the idea of law. He adopted evolution, but asserted a fall. He emphasised the assertion that "sin and death are aspects of one thing, viz., a divine reaction against human disorder."

It seems as if there are certain facts against his theory. Death was before sin as the doom of mortal things. It is in nature not as a calamity or punishment, but as a normality and beneficence. To seek deliverance from death is an impiety. To regard it as an evil is to misunderstand it.

The vitiating assumption which permeated Dr. Denney's lectures was that of the Atonement as something apart from natural law, a scheme which had its operation in a non-natural sphere and was accomplished by other than natural means. The scheme somehow superseded natural law and made the forgiveness of sin a thing separate from the saving first intentions and evolutionary activities of nature. The scheme implies the godlessness of nature. And, besides being arbitrary, the scheme is local and partial. Though it speaks of the Atonement, it is not universal either in its proclamation or in its effects. Only some races have heard of it and only some men will be saved by it. It really represents racial egotism and exclusiveness, and, therefore, must be permanently rejected by the modern mind impressed with universalism.

Dr. Dods plainly indicated the new position held by those for whom he spoke when he said they "had reason to congratulate themselves they lived in a time when the question no longer was, 'Were the Gospels inspired?'" The present day student had not the preconception of infallible accuracy, but simply sought in the Gospels a trustworthy picture of Jesus. None of the Gospels professed to be accurate or inspired, and to say they were so was in the highest sense mischievous. But while he gave away the inspiration of the Gospels, he characterised the criticism which fixed attention on discrepancies of the Gospels as peddling and irrelevant. He asserted that one of the Gospels expressly claimed to be from the hand of one who saw and was a part of what he described. In the fourth Gospel they had the sworn evidence of an eye-witness.

In his lecture on the miracles of Christ, Dr. Dods affirmed that the miracles were not performed to prove Messiahship, but to relieve distress and manifest God's love.

He incidentally mentioned Mr. Percy Gardner (and also Professor Carpenter, as agreeing with him) as "the man who had mainly to be reckoned with" in this connection.

The concessions to criticism made by Dr. Dods lead him farther than he is willing to go. He simply lifts the miracles from one difficulty to another. When he asserts that the miracles of Jesus were wrought to manifest God's love, the question at once suggests itself, "Why did not God's love originally prevent the distress which the miracles were wrought to relieve? If God, being love, allowed the distress, does not Jesus appear as a counterworker rather than as a fellow-worker when he works miracles to relieve distress?"

In endeavouring to evade a historic difficulty, Dr. Dods falls into a greater ethical difficulty.

Some of the other utterances for which the School is responsible are notable. Professor Ramsay, with caustic fervour, asserted that those who regarded the Gospels as productions of the second century did so in pure ignorance. He described the "Encyclopædia Biblica" as "the most delightful and amusing of modern works," and regretted that it consisted of four volumes only. The perfervid Professor would evidently enjoy it all the more if, like the newly written Japanese novel, it had fifty-nine volumes.

What will be regarded by some as belonging to the eccentricities of the School are the ideas of Professor Kennedy regarding the Ark of the Covenant and the Tabernacle. He asserted, amid much laughter, that there was never anything in the Ark. Its sanctity lay in its emptiness. And while trusting that he would not be regarded as a crank, he declared that it was now a relief to find that the Tabernacle and its ritual was "only a magnificent idea."

The old-fashioned believer, hearing thus of the disappearance of the tables from the Ark and of the whole Tabernacle from history, will certainly tremble for his Christ.

But the theologian of the reconstruction will be ready to reassure by affirming even though the Christ is taken out of the Gospels and the Epistles, he may have a refuge in the believing heart. And so, even in Scotland, the old order changes, and God fulfils Himself in many ways.

ALEX. WEBSTER.

Aberdeen, June, 22 1903.

LET others wrangle; I will admire.

Augustine.

IRISH NON-SUBSCRIBING ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of the Association of Irish Non-subscribing Presbyterian and other Free Christian Churches, was held in the first Presbyterian Church, Belfast, on Wednesday, June 17. Service was held at noon, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. H. CROOKER, D.D., of Ann Arbor, from Romans xii.: "Your reasonable service." Applied Christianity was the subject of the sermon, in the course of which Dr. Crooker said that the great word of the Bible was life, not creed. The doctrines of the old scheme of salvation were out of touch with the applied Christianity of the twentieth century. As they looked to the sister churches they saw that which bore the Divine harvest, that which they were able to apply, was not the old form, the old doctrine, but the actual experience in their hearts of God, the actual love in their breasts for Jesus, and the actual devotion of their souls to the God of the world. The old forms of doctrine, the old sacraments, and the old services, stood in the way of practical and immediate application of the old and new truths that both formed the Gospel of the living God. The only way to have a religious system where every new sentiment could be put right into operation was to have a free pulpit where every star when seen could be made to shed its light upon the pathway of men. The old theology placed Jesus away off in the court of the skies, in the chancery of the Almighty, almost out of touch of the human heart. The spirit of the twentieth century in its endeavour to have an applied Christianity was bringing Jesus close to the human heart, close to the homes, close to the suffering souls, and close to the ways of men, that they might feel the power and glory of the spirit of the Son of God.

The business meeting was held at two o'clock, the president, Mr. Thomas Andrews, D.L., in the chair. Mr. John Rogers, of Ardenreagh, was elected to succeed as president. Dr. Crooker was warmly thanked for his sermon, and the regular business of the Association was transacted.

In the evening, the annual dinner was held in Ye Olde Castle Restaurant, Mr. John Rogers, president, occupying the chair.

The loyal toasts were drunk, and in reply to the toasts of the preacher of the annual sermon, Dr. CROOKER spoke of the position of the Unitarian Church in America. They had never been so united, he said, as they were to-day, and they did not waste energy in petty discussions. They were not looking back, but forward. They had come close together, and the things that bothered their fathers were not bothering them. Twenty-five years ago they were spending £5,000 on missionary purposes, and to-day they were spending four times that amount. Women had organised all by themselves. They had started churches, revived churches, and sent a thrill of life and hope throughout the length and breadth of their work in America. They were facing the future under the leadership of President Eliot, of the American Unitarian Association and were beginning to do a little. They were beginning to recognise that religion was not only a personal conviction; it was a corporate life. A third-rate theology backed up by a first-rate enthusiasm would do infinitely more than a first-rate theology backed up by a third-rate enthusiasm. In America the fires were kindling, and they were getting ready to do something.

Other toasts followed, including that of "Our Work and our Workers," proposed by the Rev. ALEXANDER GORDON and acknowledged by the Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND. The toast of the Association was proposed by the Rev. W. NAPIER and acknowledged by the Rev. D. WALMSLEY.

REMONSTRANT SYNOD OF ULSTER.

THE seventy-fourth annual meeting was held on Tuesday, June 16, in the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast. Service was conducted at noon, the Rev. J. A. KELLY preaching from the words, "What think ye of Christ?" and, subsequently, as out-going Moderator delivering his address. In this he referred to the losses sustained by the death of the Revs. S. G. Pinkerton and T. W. Scott, and Mr. David McWilliam, and then spoke, in loyal terms, of the King's coronation and his coming visit to Ireland. After some interesting citations in warm appreciation of Dr. Martineau, apropos of the "Life and Letters," the address concluded:—

"Fathers and brethren, let me say that the trend of religious thought in these days and the expression of opinion by leading men in other Churches regarding subscription to human creeds as unnecessary, if not hurtful to living faith, only serve to confirm us in the conviction that the founders of our Synod took up and maintained a position that the flight of time only tends to justify and to make more secure. When we find a man of the standing of Dr. Story declaring that he signed the Westminster Confession once, but that he would not do it now, what are we to think? Surely that the days of subscription are numbered; and we rejoice, but in no boastful spirit, at the prospect of a coming union of those who should never have been separated on the ground of subscription, as they held, and we still hold, as vital, so much in common; and when human creeds cease to be imposed, then will the religion of Christ be the gainer. Creeds may secure a uniformity in appearance, but Christ demands, not uniformity, but vitality, and the late Dr. Parker must have been with us when he declared that 'he who writes a creed distrusts the Holy Ghost.' Let us, then, take fresh courage. Let us value, as they deserve, our foundation principles, and stand firmly by them with all reverence and humility, for they contain that which is enduring. What are those principles? They are allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ as, under God, the only King and Head of the Church; the great principles of the Reformation—viz., the sufficiency of the Scripture, the right of private judgment, and the rejection of human authority in matters of faith. This is not a bad foundation for a church to depend upon at this present moment, with growing sacerdotalism on the one hand, and unrest and scepticism on the other. Let us, then, never weary proclaiming with all our powers these time-honoured principles; let us humbly and fervently pray that they may grow in favour in our midst, conscious that it will indeed be an evil day for our land when they are thrown aside and forgotten."

Two nominations having been made for the office of Moderator, the Rev. J. Dunkerley, by the Temple Patrick Presbytery, and the Rev. Frederick Thomas, by the Armagh and Comber Presbyteries, Mr. Dunkerley was elected. The Rev. W. E. Mellone was re-elected clerk, and the Rev. J. A. Miskimmin was appointed assistant clerk, and the routine business was transacted.

It was agreed to hold a Pro Re Nata meeting to deal with a proposed amalgamation of the Armagh and Bangor Presbyteries, and also with the revision of the Code of Discipline.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

THE annual meetings of the Assembly were held at Chowbent, on Thursday, June 18, and were well attended. A service was held in the old chapel at eleven a.m., the devotional portion of which was conducted by the Rev. J. C. HIRST.

The preacher was the Rev. T. R. ELLIOTT, of Mosley, who took as his text Revelation iv. 1. The sermon was largely autobiographical, and created a deep impression. He drew the picture of a young child born in the early thirties of the last century, within the atmosphere of a theology which taught that the Almighty had determined, even before they were born, that some of His children should be lost, and others saved, without regard to their character or any choice of their own; and that which of His children should belong to the one class, and which to the other, might be ascertained by their having passed through certain religious experiences, described, only too definitely, by the preacher, and made to depend upon his interpretation of certain Scriptures: against which preaching, of course, simple minds had no defence. His paternal grandsire, however, was able to extract from what were called the "doctrines of grace," a modest assurance of his own election, without losing hope that God had ways of His own of saving others, not actually assured of their salvation. The boy grew up, finding in the latter view his immediate refuge from despair. As the years came and went, he found there were other doctrines believed and preached, that all souls were called of God, and that Christ died that all might not perish, but have everlasting life. He found in the Bible many voices, all connected with religion in some way, even the voice that said, "curse God and die," for it was a protest of a woman's heart against false and cruel notions of religion. The greatest voice was that of the "Beloved Son" which spoke of love; it was the voice of a noble soul in whom the doubt and anguish of all souls have been vanquished, in one great sense of the truth of things, of the love and purpose and power of God. Whatever criticism may have to say as to the authorship of New Testament writings, the words recorded of Jesus are vital in themselves; they have affinity with the highest aspirations of the spirit. One great mistake in religious teaching is to assert that what is called revealed truth is a miracle, beyond our unaided conception, offered for our faith, not for our understanding, verifiable only by falling back upon authority. To accept on authority only is to be an automaton, and not a man. On the other hand, if God and man are essentially one in nature, as certain prominent orthodox preachers are at present maintaining, man's thought of God must be the human image of God's thought, revealing itself to him, to be known to him as truth; and the divine life in man must be the product of God's grace and human endeavour. The preacher then described how for a time he had lost his hold on prayer, which had been to him the one means by which God and the human soul were kept in unbroken communion, and through a very vivid experience, in a time of inward conflict, found his faith again.

His thought moved in the direction of the Unitarian belief, and he discovered that the world was God's, and not the devil's. The truth came to him as a revelation. Then the whole scene of things underwent transformation. God's love was winning more and more of the hearts of His children, until the most wicked should come within the reach of saving grace. In conclusion, the preacher said:—"As to showing the things that must be hereafter—the religious faith that shows that the life above springs from the life below, shows also that the God who is not feared in this world need not be feared in any other. And so I too have now come to fear God less than any other being in the world. And, as my life came to me before any prayer had been offered by me, or any desire of mine had taken shape, or any interest in living had been awakened in me, I can give back my life to Him Who gave it at the first; confident that He who takes is the same as He who gave, and that the hand still clasps mine which since I came to be, has led me and held me up through all the changing years until this hour. So sustaining has this Unitarian Gospel been to me, that I say to God, 'I can pass without a prayer or plea.' I once felt that I must make one claim at least, that there be restored to me my first year-old boy, who, whilst he lived, was 'my piece of love and sunshine,' and my life-long sorrow since he died. But now I surrender even that one claim, and leave my all with God. Back to Him at last we go, that in us, as in all things else in the universe, the divine purposes may be fulfilled, and God be all in all."

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

The business meeting was held in the afternoon, under the chairmanship of Mr. F. Monks, J.P. The new church at Halliwell-road, Bolton, was added to the list.

The CHAIRMAN, in the course of his address, referred to the changes which had taken place in the ministry within the province, and also to the losses sustained by death, paying a tribute of gratitude for their devoted labours. He referred to the change in the licensing law, which would enable the magistrates to deal with congested areas so as to remove temptation from those districts, while badly managed houses they will be able to suppress altogether. The granting and renewal of off licences was a matter that temperance reformers should give special attention to. They were fast getting into the hands of the large brewers, and it would not be surprising if application were made for permission to drink on the premises. A large amount of the drunkenness among the wives of working men can be directly traced to this source. The Education Bill of last session he thought to be a measure which all should do their best to make serve the cause of education, and work for the establishment of a national system, free from all denominational tests and clerical control, whether Church or Dissent. To condemn beforehand with the rancour of a sectarian bigot, to publicly avow your hostility and determination to make the Bill an unworkable one, was not, in his opinion, either a reasonable or a fair attitude for any Nonconformist to take up. Protest, not revolution, is the remedy. He thought it was not unlikely that they would see a steady change in the larger towns and cities in favour of provided schools, where there would be no denominational tests or dogmatic teaching. "The more I study the Bill and see its possibilities, the more I am satisfied that, if worked in the right spirit, it will eventually lead to a national system of education under public control, with means adequate for its support, and with systematised methods dealing with elementary, secondary, and technical education; but it will make great demands on the time and energy of our public men, and will require officials of a high order of merit both intellectually and morally." "From generation to generation our churches have contributed largely of high-toned public men who have devoted much time, thought, and energy to the public life of our country, and let us hope that this will be a continuing feature amongst us, and that we shall always give to our national and municipal life some of its best and worthiest citizens. With the growth of population, with the ever increasing demands upon our public bodies to undertake great and increasing responsibilities requiring tact and judgment, business capacity and integrity of character for their management, the demand for such men will not be less but greater." He thought they ought to give every possible encouragement to their younger men to engage in this work. Referring to the questions raised in the Rev. J. Wood's paper at the recent Conference, he thought that cohesion, in the sense of welding our churches together under Conference control, was impossible. A Wesleyan Conference or a Congregational Union were examples they were not likely to follow. But cohesion on such a basis as that ancient Provincial Assembly afforded would be feasible enough if the experiment was considered worth a trial. Its organisation could be easily adapted to meet the financial requirements of its separate churches and missions; and its advisory committee was composed of men of the highest standing, with a sympathetic appreciation of difficulties. The reform and re-adjustment of endowments which had been left, he thought, for the spread of truth as for the special benefit of individual churches, must be undertaken by some organisation, and not left in that state of isolation and exclusiveness which neither asks for nor receives an account of the administration of trust funds belonging to the body. Many trusts have lapsed and drifted into private hands, and so been lost altogether. Some trustees may object to give information for a complete registration, and plead that they are bound to administer the trust in accordance with the trust deed. The plea must be admitted; but where the conditions have changed from the original intent, common sense and Christian charity suggest an application to the Charity Commissioners for power to alter the deed, so as to make the trust as useful as it was intended to be. They could easily point to districts where new churches were doing excellent work on very scanty means, and where an old chapel with its small congregation exists, well endowed, paying a good salary to a minister to preach and pray to almost empty pews, or again to others where the endowments have increased to such an amount as to relieve the congregation from contributing its fair share to its own maintenance. They of all the churches who profess and desire to see the love of truth and justice prevail, should be the first to reform any such abuse of their endowments, and should be an example of just and equitable administration of trust funds for religious purposes. Why, too, should not the administration of our educational institutions come under review? A little healthy criticism would tend to quicken their life, improve their methods, and possibly save them from what he called the narrowness of breadth. They were so broad in their sympathies that they could join in public worship with the Anglican, and yet so narrow in their interpretation of a trust deed as to countenance a studied neglect of public worship with our own household of faith, where the founder of the trust worshipped regularly with his own people. The education of their youth was a matter of deep concern to all of them, and it was not an unreasonable thing to expect from even a self-elicted body of trustees an account of their stewardship to a body as representative as that to which they appeal for financial support. By such cohesion they would lose nothing of their freedom, if they lost some of their exclusiveness. They would strengthen each other in all that is worth working for, and they would preserve their endowments for useful purposes, freeing them from the canker of selfishness or negligence which always lead, to abuse.

A report on "public questions" was submitted to the meeting, of which the main points were the Housing Question, the Licensing Question, and the Native Races Question in Africa. Prior to its adoption a most interesting discussion took place concerning the various points raised. There was regret expressed that there should be no reference in it to the Education Bill; but it was pointed out that there had been an interim report on that special question.

On behalf of the Committee, the Rev. C. J. STREET, M.A., moved the following resolution:—

"That this Assembly rejoices in the vigorous independent action taken by many licensing Benches in refusing the renewal of licences on the ground that they were not required, in accordance with a well-established principle of the English law, and strongly disapproves of the Bill introduced by Sir William Hart Dyke to suspend this discretionary power of the magistrates.

This Assembly also, in view of the proposals in Mr. Butcher's Bill and foreshadowed by the Prime Minister or compensation being paid in the case of licences so refused, hereby expresses its deliberate opinion that as there is no vested interest in any licence and each licence is a free grant made solely for the public convenience no compensation ought in such cases to be made out of public funds.

That copies of this resolution be sent to the Prime Minister, the Lord Chancellor, the Home Secretary, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, and Sir W. Harcourt."

The Rev. R. MCGEE seconded, and the resolution was adopted.

A report on the proceedings of the District Missionary Societies in the province was also received and adopted, and a report of the work done by the Advisory Committee was read. The Rev. Dendy Agate was elected President of the Assembly in succession to Mr. Monks. The Rev. J. J. Wright was elected "Supporter" for 1904.

An invitation from Moss Side for the Assembly to hold its meeting there next year was accepted.

In the evening a large and enthusiastic meeting was held in the Volunteer Hall, presided over by Mr. JOHN HARRISON, of London. His address was full of reminiscences, he having been born at the Chowbent parsonage. The Rev. James C. Street gave an address on "Churches? and the One Living Church"; Mr. R. D. Holt, on "Conference Ideals"; and the Rev. J. A. Pearson, on "Liberty and Love."

The proceedings throughout the day were memorable. The universal comment was that Chowbent had set a record which will not be easily beaten. In the afternoon, following lunch, Mr. J. Harrison gave an organ recital in the chapel, on the new instrument recently presented by Mr. C. Eckersley, J.P.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: Rhyl-street Domestic Mission.—Rev William Wilson, 5 Claremont-road, Cricklewood, N.W., writes:—"May I appeal for subscriptions towards our Sunday-school excursion, which will probably cost about £15? The excursion for the boys and girls will be by brake to Pinner on July 4, each paying 6d.; that for the infant boys and girls will be by train to Elstree on July 11, each of them paying 2d."

Ballycarry.—The Rev. A. O. Ashworth writes to supply an omission in last week's report of the Sunday-school Conference. Carrickfergus was represented, and the total number of persons at the conference should have been stated as over 400, not as it is, "over 300."

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah (Appointment).—The Rev. J. Worsley Austin, M.A., son of the Rev. J. Austin, of Cirencester, has received and accepted an invitation to the pulpit, in succession to the Rev. L. P. Jacks.

Croft.—The annual sermons were preached last Sunday afternoon and evening by Rev. J. J. Wright. Standing as this little chapel does in a lovely country place, and the day being ideal in regard to weather, very large contingents of friends from Chowbent, Warrington, Leigh, and other places drove over to the services. Possibly as many people had to sit or stand in the sunny chapel yard as were able to get inside the chapel. Tea was served in a roomy hay-shed kindly lent by a neighbouring farmer of another faith. The music was by the Warrington choir. The day's collections realised £19, being an increase of £5 upon last year; but in order to meet an outstanding debt in connection with the chapel and school and at the same time to provide the usual amount for current expenses, some Chowbent and Warrington friends by additional contributions, per Mr. Wright, made up the amount to £35.

Cardiff.—The Rev. J. Harwood asks us to point out, in reference to last week's report of the Welsh Choral Festival, and to guard against misapprehension, that he is occupying the Cardiff pulpit temporarily only.

Edinburgh.—The members of the St. Mark's Chapel Literary Society, accompanied by a number of the congregation and other friends, had their annual picnic on Saturday, June 20. The rendezvous was Hopetoun House, and the company were much delighted with the privilege of rambling through the lovely demesne of the Earl of Linlithgow. The drive to and from the city and the al fresco entertainment were also very greatly enjoyed, the weather on this occasion contributing in no small degree to the complete success of the outing.

Glossop.—The anniversary of the Church was held last Sunday, and was conducted by Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., who delivered eloquent and impressive addresses to large congregations, extra seats having to be provided in the evening. A large number of strangers representing almost every religious communion in the town attended the service. The collection amounted to £40, a considerable falling-off from last year, but eminently satisfactory in view of the terribly depressed state of the local industries.

Taunton.—The Sunday-school anniversary was held on Sunday June 14 the Rev. Joseph Wain conducting the services and preaching two acceptable sermons. The collections amounted to £4 10s.

London: Essex Church.—The Guild, last Saturday, visited the Tate Gallery. In the week previously they entertained to tea and music thirty blind workers from the Kensington workshops. The Provincial Assembly collection amounted to £64 16s.; the Hospital Sunday collection to £173 8s. 3d. The Annual Flower Service is fixed for July 5.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The united flower service of the children attending the Church of the Divine Unity and Byker Unitarian Sunday-schools, took place last Sunday. The church was beautifully decorated with plants and flowers, and the decorations evoked much praise from the congregations. The Rev. Frank Walters conducted the services, and preached sermons suitable for the occasion. The flowers were afterwards sent to the Infirmary. On Wednesday, the annual excursion of the two schools took place, the destination being the romantic little town of Warkworth.

Poole.—Our correspondent writes:—"A nandsome brass lectern has been placed in the church in memory of our late beloved pastor, the Rev. E. S. Anthony. The lectern was dedicated on Sunday last, and a special service conducted by the Rev. C. Coe, of Bournemouth. The congregation was very large, friends from nearly all denominations being present to mark their respect for the memory of one who lived a truly Christian life."

NEW RICHES FROM OLD MINES.

Who would value raw grains if all the arts of milling and preparing them were lost?

Similarly, nuts (which are foods of enormous value) have been unappreciated because the art of preparing them has been neglected.

HUGH MAPLETON, Colonial House, Ardwick, Manchester, is now making from nuts, rich, nourishing, digestible foods. Write to-day for descriptive price lists.

Sweet as a Rose, where "Sanitas" goes.

"SANITAS."
BEST OF ALL
DISINFECTANTS,
AND THE ONLY ONE FIT FOR DOMESTIC USE.

"SANITAS."
FRAGRANT, NON-POISONOUS,
CLEAN AND NATURAL.

"SANITAS."
1/- Pint Bottles and 1/- Tins, Powder.
3d. Bars Soap.
Of all Chemists and Stores.

"HOW TO DISINFECT" BOOK FREE.
"Sanitas" Co., Ltd., Bethnal Green, London, E.

Contractors to H.M. Government.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.

Miss Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden Hill, London, W., acknowledges with many thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums :—

	£	s.	d.
Mr. John Quintrell	0	10	0
Mr. George Chitty	1	0	0
Mr. P. M. Martineau	1	1	0
Rev. R. B. Drummond	1	0	0
E.	2	0	0

MARRIAGES.

BADCOCK—LEWIS—On June 20th, at the Unitarian Church, Wandsworth, by the Rev. Lindsey T. Badcock (father of the bridegroom) and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A. (Minister of the Church), William Lindsey Badcock to Ethel Mary, third daughter of Bernard Lewis, Esq. Acton.

CURTIS—FISHER—On the 20th inst., at Unity Church, Wood Green, by the Rev. Dr. Mummery, Ernest Clement, son of Geo. Curtis, Esq., J.P., of Poole, Dorsetshire, and Harriet Eliza, daughter of the late Thomas Escolme Fisher, Esq., solicitor, St. Ives, Hunts.

PRESTON—SELFE—On June 20th, at St. Mary's Church, Spring Grove, Isleworth, by the Rev. C. H. Banning, M.A., Herbert Classon, only son of J. Classon Preston, of Wedderburn House, Hampstead, to Lilian Annie, eldest daughter of T. V. Selfe, of "Thistleboon," Spring Grove.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, June 28.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton. Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M., Mr. BERNARD LEWIS.
Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.
Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., "Paul the Traveller," Rev. FREDERIC ALLEN.
Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M and 7 P.M., Rev. J. McDOWELL.
Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. J. J. POOL.
Deptford, Church-street, 11.15, A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. J. MARCHANT.
Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. R. T. HERFORD, B.A.
Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.
Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. R. H. U. BLOOR.
Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. GOW, B.A.
Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. E. CAPLETON.
Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.
Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.
Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. S. PERRIS, M.A.
Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. G. CARTER.
Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.
Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. S. FARRINGTON.
Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. C. A. GINEVER.
Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.
Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M., Mr. W. J. HAWKINS, and 6.30 P.M., Mr. A. H. BIGGS, M.A.
Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, Eastthill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Dr. MUMMERY.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
BEDFORD, Library (side room), 6.30 P.M., Rev. ROWLAND HILL.
BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.
BLACKPOOL, Unitarian Church, Masonic Hall, South Shore, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS.
BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. C. C. COE.
BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. M. LIVENS.
BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET.
CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., J. REMINGTON WILSON, M.A.
DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.
GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. T. B. BROADRICK.
HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. GARDNER PRESTON.
HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. WILLIAM MELLOR.
LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. ERNEST PARRY.
LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. J. JUPP.
LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. ALEXANDER GORDON, M.A.
NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. E. PIKE.
OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. J. E. ODGERS, M.A.
PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.
PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 P.M., Mr. THOMAS BOND.
SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. OTTWELL BINNS.
SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.
SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.
SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.
STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church, Tyler-street, 7 P.M., Rev. ARTHUR RYLAND.
TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.
WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Mr. J. PARK DAVIES, B.A.

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH.
SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F. Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS.

ETHICAL RELIGION SOCIETY, STEINWAY HALL, PORTMAN SQ., W.—June 21, at 11.15 AM., Dr. WASHINGTON SULLIVAN, "National and Individual Morality : A Contrast."

SOUTH-PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.—June 28, at 11.15 A.M., JOHN A. HOBSON, M.A., "The Theory of the Leisured Class."

SUPPLY.—Rev. E. S. LANG BUCKLAND, 3, Guildford Park-road, Guildford.

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.
Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
London : LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

ST. JACOBS OIL

The Great Remedy for Pain Unequalled.

CURES
RHEUMATISM. NEURALGIA. SPRAINS.
SORENESS. STIFFNESS. SORE THROAT.
And all Bodily Aches and Pains.

Conquers Pain. ACTS LIKE MAGIC. Used for 30 years.

1/1½ AND 2/6

Board and Residence.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged. — Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

BOURNEMOUTH.—"ARNEWOOD." Occupies a splendid position at the corner of West Cliff Road, and affords all requirements for Health, Comfort or Convenience. Sea views ; close to the Winter Garden Pavilion, Unitarian Church, pier and promenade. Terms, &c., on application to Manageress.

BOURNEMOUTH. — Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Most comfortable private BOARDING-HOUSE ; close to sea ; sheltered among the pines ; south aspect. Billiard-room (full-sized table). Terms moderate.—Address, Miss CHALDECOTT, Stirling House, Manor-road.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE ; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

BOARDING HOUSE.—THE FELL, TROUTBECK, WINDERMERE, is situated 550 feet above sea-level, and about 2½ miles from the station at Windermere. Every home comfort.

TO BE LET well-furnished House for one or two months from July 14th, to careful tenants, for nominal sum, servant left. Address, B., c/o, PELLING, Baker, The Avenue, Bedford-park, W.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH, DEVONSHIRE.

An ALL-THE-YEAR-ROUND HOLIDAY and HEALTH RESORT for YOUNG LADIES or SCHOOL GIRLS.

Sea and Moorland. Home comforts. Walks, games, excursions, sketching, music, bathing, picnics, &c.

Weekly terms. Prospectus and Guide Book from THE PROPRIETOR.

Unitarian Home Missionary College.

The ANNUAL PUBLIC EXAMINATION of the Students of the Unitarian Home Missionary College will be held in the MEMORIAL HALL, MANCHESTER, on WEDNESDAY, JULY 1st, commencing at 10.0 a.m. The VISITOR'S ADDRESS will be delivered by the Rev. PHILEMON MOORE, B.A., at 5.0 o'clock.

On the Evening of the same day, the VALEDICTORY SERVICE will be held in the CROSS STREET CHAPEL, at 7.30, and will be conducted by the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, M.A., LL.D., LITT.D., Principal, Manchester College, Oxford.

Music by the Choir of Brookfield Church, Gorton. Organist, Mr. JOHN A. EARNSHAW.

The attendance of all friends of the College is earnestly invited.

For the Committee,
Edward Talbot, } Hon. Secs.
E. L. H. Thomas, }

Manchester, June 24th, 1903.

FREDK. LONG & SON,

AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,

ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P , 17, Mincing-lane, E.C.
Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.
F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.
Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.
STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS

By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

DAILY MEDITATIONS

(Fourth Edition Revised.)

NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.

Cloth, red edges, 6d. ; roan gilt, 1s.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

READY JULY 1, ROYAL 8vo, 216 PAGES.

NUMBER FOUR OF

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.

A quarterly Review of Religion, Theology, and Philosophy. Price 2s. 6d net.

Ten Shillings per Annum, Post Free.

Principal Contents of Number Four.

The Character of Jesus Christ, by Rev. Francis G. Peabody, D.D., Plummer Professor of Christian Morals in Harvard University. Are Indian Missions a Failure? By Rev. William Miller, C.I.E., D.D., LL.D., Principal of the Madras Christian College, Vice-chancellor of the University of Madras. The Philosophy of Authority in Religion, by Wilfred Ward. Do we Believe in the Reformation? by Rev. W. F. Cobb, D.D., Rector of St. Ethelburga's, London. The Liberal Catholic Movement in England, by Philip Sydney. The Growing Reluctance of Able Men to take Orders, by P. S. Burrell, M.A. Physical Law Life, by J. H. Poynting, Sc.D. F.R.S., Professor of Physics in the University of Birmingham. Pressing Need of Old Testament Study, by the Rev. T. K. Cheyne, D.D. Zoroastrianism and Primitive Christianity, by Rev James Moffatt, D.D. The Purpose of Eusebius, by Walter R. Cassels. Discussions, by Rev. Prof. Alan Menzies, R. Hoernle, Rev. G. Galloway, Rev. Prof. W. B. Smith, Miss E. E. C. Jones, and G. T. Deas. A Number of Signed Reviews, and also a Bibliography of Recent Books and articles in Theological and Philosophical Periodicals.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-st., London, W.C., and 9, Broad-st., Oxford.

In Cloth, Price 1s. ; Stout Paper, 6d.

THE HUNGARIAN UNITARIANS.

Some Account of their Origin, Vicissitudes, and Present Condition.

Compiled from various sources by M. LUCY TAGART.

"Miss Tagart has done well to collect a number of most interesting papers and sketches bearing upon the history and the existing state of our Unitarian brethren in Hungary and Transylvania. . . . The booklet excites and keeps attention from beginning to end."—Christian Life.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING OFFICE, 5, Furnival-street, Holborn, E.C.

Schools, etc.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN,
NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air ; field for games ; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON
(Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

WILLASTON SCHOOL,
NANTWICH.
AN UNITARIAN FIRST GRADE PUBLIC SCHOOL.

HEADMASTER.—GUY LEWIS, M.A.

Opened September, 1900. Foundation Scholarships.
Next Entrance Examination, July 15th.

WILLASTON SCHOOL. — Speech Day, WEDNESDAY, JULY 1st.—The Governors will be obliged if any one who has NOT RECEIVED an INVITATION, and who desires to be present, will send their Name and Address to the CLERK, 38, Barton-arcade, Manchester.

Situations, etc.

AS HEAD NURSE, or MATRON, or for any POSITION of TRUST. A Widow, 41, seeks re-engagement. Highly recommended from last situation, and also by Mrs. RICHARD ROSCOE and Mrs. WALLACE BRUCE.—Address Mrs. PARSONS, 16, Kemplay-road, Hampstead, N.W.

NURSE (SUPERIOR) wanted middle of July, for 3 children, 6¼. 3 years, and 5 months. Good wages.—Mrs. PHILIP ROSCOE 82, Denning-road, Hampstead, London.

SUMMER ENGAGEMENT WANTED in an English family, by preference near Bristol, by a French young lady, musical, who would teach French and German in return for board and travelling expenses paid. Apply to JEAN REVILLE, 4, Villa de la Réunion, Paris, Auteuil.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOHNSON, Pier-street.

MICROSCOPES, second-hand, excellent condition, from one-third original cost. Slides, great variety, best makers, from 3s. per doz. Write for particulars, THE NEW AGE PRESS, 8, John-street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2½% repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES

Purchased and sold for customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD, 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate. — Saturday, June 28, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3184. NEW SERIES, No. 288.] LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 4, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 441
ARTICLES—
Encyclopœdia Biblica 442
Principal Story's Confession 442
Sunday at the Foot of Mont Blanc .. 443
Cardinal Vaughan 444
LITERATURE—
Wescott's Biography 445
Some Philosophical Books 446
Short Notices 446
OBITUARY—
Miss Maria Cooper 447
Miss Constance Bache 447
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 447
LEADERS—
A Channing Memorial 448
Christianity and Tariffs 448
MEETINGS—
Manchester College, Oxford 449
CORRESPONDENCE—
Holy Communion 453
Religious Tests and Managers of Public Schools 453
Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire 453
London District Unitarian Society .. 453
Blackfriars Missions : Country Homes .. 453
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 454
ADVERTISEMENTS 454

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. Charles W. Wendte, of the Theodore Parker Memorial Church in Boston, and the energetic secretary of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, sailed for Holland on the first of this month, and after consulting there with Professor Eerdmans, is to visit Germany, Switzerland, and France in the interests of the Council. We regret to hear from Mr. Wendte that we must not hope to see him this year in England, as his time will be fully occupied abroad, and he is obliged to return home immediately after his Amsterdam meetings. It is good news that at least thirty American visitors are enrolled for the meetings.

THE REV. W. COPELAND BOWIE and Mr. Ion Pritchard have just returned from a visit to Amsterdam, where they have been surveying the ground in company with the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, and in particular have seen all the chief hotels. Full particulars on this subject will be given next week, but we may say at once that there will be ample and most excellent accommodation for all visitors (we hear that at least a hundred are going from this country), providing they make their plans at once, and inform Mr. Pritchard, at Essen Hall, of their intention to be of the party.

AT the Methodist New Connexion Conference at Dudley, a report favourable to Methodist union was submitted. It showed the existence of a strong desire for union on the part of the Methodist Free Churches, Bible Christian Methodists, and the Wesleyan Reformers. The basis of union suggested is (1) equality of ministerial and lay representation; (2) maintenance of the Connexional principle in the authority of the Conference; (3) the due recognition of the superintendent ministers in the transaction of all Church business; (4) and the preservation of the office of guardian representatives. A proposal to submit the matter to the January quarterly meetings, with arrangement that the numbers for union, against it, and neutral may be reported from each quarterly meeting, was passed unanimously, and was followed by the singing of the Doxology.

EVIDENTLY, as regards the minor Methodist bodies, the prospect of union is very distinctly brightening. Union with the Primitive Methodists seems less likely, and there is no chance at present of union with the Wesleyans. Of this matter the Methodist Times speaks frankly: "The different Methodist Churches differ to some extent in the average social grade of their members. But a difference of social grade involves difference of manners, and even in part of temper and taste, and manners and taste count for a great deal in the practical working, if not in the theory, of institutions."

OF the unveiling of a statue of Channing in Boston, on the hundredth anniversary of his ordination as minister of the Federal-street Church in that city, we have told in another column. Writing of that occasion, the editor of the Christian Register speaks of Channing in the following terms:—

Beyond the bounds of Unitarianism his influence is felt and cherished by many in Europe and America who know him not as a leader of a religious revolution, but as the champion of universal liberty, of human rights, and the principles upon which the American Republic was founded. His writings have to many patriots become sacred scriptures, addressed to all who struggle against tyranny, or who work for the emancipation of the race. Because Channing sought for the truth, in some measure found it, and trusted it altogether, his words endure and his fame increases. His addresses on Slavery were fulfilled in the emancipation of the slave, and his sermons on War will continue to be read until war shall be no more.

IN the July number of Sermons for the Day the Rev. R. A. Armstrong has printed the Presidential Address which he gave at the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Whitweek, and which was published in THE INQUIRER of June 6. To the re-issue of his address Mr. Armstrong adds the following note:—

This address was delivered at Essex Hall, London, on the evening of June 3, 1903, on the completion of my year of office as President of the Unitarian Association. I learn, to my surprise, that there are those who find in it a renunciation of principles which I have always held and often publicly maintained. Let me then here declare that I still regard it as inaccurate and improper to speak of Churches by trust-deed free from dogmatic limitations as Unitarian Churches, and that personally I should decline to accept the pastorate of a Church bound to Unitarian doctrine. But I cannot imagine why that should debar me from approving of offices of mutual helpfulness and good-will between the Unitarian Association and such congregations as may be minded to accept help from that Association or to bestow help upon it. Nor do I see why it should preclude me from recognising the historical connection between Unitarian Christianity and ecclesiastical freedom, or the debt of the Free Churches to an Association which has ever proved ready to extend to them a helpful hand.

The June Sermons for the Day contains a sermon on "Mediæval Cities and Modern," preached on Citizen Sunday in Hope-street Church, Liverpool.

ON the subject of National Physical Training, the Manchester Guardian has given a number of additional contributions from eminent men, since those referred to in THE INQUIRER of May 9, including Dr. Macnamara, Mr. Arthur Newsholme, M.D., Sir Lauder Brunton, M.D., Mr. E. J. Broadfield, Mr. Haldane, M.P., and Canon Hicks. The general opinion is that military drill is not best suited to develop boys and girls, even if military service were the end in view. We gather the following from the excellent points made by the writers of the articles:—

The general health and development of the child should be the one end aimed at, not military service.

Opportunities for romping and interesting play are as important, or more important, than set exercises.

Physical drill is no substitute for healthy homes and good air.

The greater the amount of drill and physical exercise, the more necessary is it that children should be sufficiently and suitably fed. Vast numbers of children would be the worse for enforced exercises, because the body is not nourished with adequate food.

Ignorant and foolish eating and drinking habits, including the consumption of large quantities of intoxicants, tea, and pastry, instead of wholesome food, are in large measure causes of physical degeneracy, both by the introduction of harmful elements into the body and the waste of means whereby good and nourishing foods could be bought. Especially harmful is ignorance in the feeding of children and young people.

Insufficient income of parents, and the overcrowding in unhealthy houses and districts, create a condition of underfed and languid feebleness in children which unfits them for either bodily or mental exertion.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BIBLICA.

Completion of a Notable Work.

The fourth and concluding volume of the Encyclopædia Biblica is now issued, and the whole work may also be had. printed on thin Bible paper, in a single volume or divided into two. In this form the price of the whole work, bound in cloth is £4, or £5 in half leather, the same as in the four volume form.

Messrs. A. & C. Black, the publishers, have issued an interesting note on the character of this work, which, as our readers are aware, is edited by Professor Cheyne and Dr. Sutherland Black. Of the concluding volume we shall shortly publish a review, and add here some particulars from the Publishers' Note.

The one volume Encyclopædia is only three inches thick, and its 5444 columns contain about five million words.

Aim of the Work.

The articles are not simply collected and arranged alphabetically. The aim of the dictionary has been to co-ordinate the mass of material presented to the reader, so that whatever he might begin to read, he would be drawn farther and farther into the heart of the complex biblical investigations which form the subject-matter of the work. The aim of the articles, as articles, has been to give a fresh discussion of each subject by the hand of a trained specialist, shedding, if possible, some fresh light on the problems under investigation.

Different Standpoints of Contributors.

As the contributors were all selected definitely to write on the subjects which they have treated, the Encyclopædia is, on the whole, somewhat homogeneous. The reader will nevertheless find not a little variety due to obvious differences of standpoint. The reader is warned of this by cross references. In some cases it was arranged to invite more than one writer to contribute to the discussion of a subject from different points of view. See, for example, the discussion of Galatian geography by Professors Schmiedel and Woodhouse respectively, under "Galatia"; the vigorous defence of the non-Pauline authorship of the major "Pauline" epistles by Professor van Manen (in "Romans," "Paul," "Old Christian Literature"), and the able defence of the opposite view by Professor Schmiedel (in "Galatians," and elsewhere), the account of Paul preserved from Hatch's Encyclopædia Britannica article alongside of that of van Manen, the discussions of the beginnings of ecclesiastical institutions, by Dean Armitage Robinson (in "Church," "Bishop," &c.), and by Professor Schmiedel (in "Ministry," "Spiritual Gifts"); in the Old Testament, Professor Cheyne's new theory in many smaller articles alongside of other views represented in the major articles by other scholars, or in part of the article "Prophecy," alongside of the discussions of the individual prophets by other writers; finally, the discussion of the beginnings of the Christian Church by van Manen in "Rome (Church)" and by Schmiedel in a series of great articles covering in all 125 columns under the headings "Spiritual Gifts," "Simon Peter," "Simon Magus," Editorial Standpoint.

Whilst two sides to a question have been definitely represented in certain cases, to do so always was impossible. For example, the Graf-Wellhausen theory explained in the article "Hexateuch," is elsewhere generally assumed. This seemed justified by its wide acceptance amongst scholars. On the other hand, the main position argued for by Professor van Manen, or the far-reaching theory advocated in many articles by Professor Cheyne, is nowhere assumed except in their own contributions. Every article, therefore, must be estimated in connection with the signature over which it appears, and to affarm that the editorial standpoint is more nearly that (for example) of Dean Armitage Robinson, or of Professor Schmiedel, or of Professor van Manen is to express a purely speculative opinion. In the present position, especially of New Testament studies, it is difficult to see how this could be otherwise. The Encyclopædia is not a dogmatic text-book for children. It is a carefully selected, annotated, and correlated library, making what the various writers contribute to the elucidation of the problems of biblical science immediately accessible in a single volume. Every layman now knows generally the various standpoints of the writers of the most fundamental articles. The volume shows him what these standpoints really mean, and how they are reached.

An Epoch-marking Work.

It thus appears that the Encyclopædia Biblica is no ordinary work. . . . As a singularly weighty contribution to the biblical science of the time, its impulse is admitted perhaps most markedly by those who dissent most strongly from the views defended in some of its articles. It will be impossible to understand the movement of thought on biblical subjects during the next quarter of a century without taking account of the Encyclopædia Biblica.

PRINCIPAL STORY'S CONFESSION.

Preaching recently in St. Mark's Chapel, Edinburgh, the Rev. R. B. Drummond referred to the remarkable attack made by Principal Story of Glasgow in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, on the Westminster Confession of Faith, the acknowledged doctrinal standard of his Church. It was impossible, the preacher said, not to admire the courage of the man who could stand up in the assembly of his brethren and thus denounce the creed to which they were all in common pledged. And yet it takes something from our admiration if we reflect that courage is to be measured by the resistance it meets, or, at least, by the resistance it expects. Dr. Story's speech met with practically no resistance, and, no doubt, with his knowledge and experience, he had been able to gauge pretty accurately the feeling of the Church. Nor is it possible to help asking whether he was exactly the right man to denounce the Confession, seeing that he had long since accepted it as the confession of his faith, that he holds high office in the Church whose creed he assaults, and is in the full enjoyment of her honours and emoluments. He should say distinctly not, unless he was to follow up his attack by heading a new disruption, which seems to be now his only honest course. Dr. Story stated with the utmost frankness, that "if he had known the doctrines of the Confession when he signed them as well as he knew them now, he would never have signed them, and he would not sign them again." Does not this extraordinary announcement place Dr. Story in a most anomalous position? The Westminster Confession is either the creed of the Church of Scotland, or it is not. If it is, what possible right has Dr. Story to be in that Church? If it is not, let it at once be abolished. There is no other rational alternative. But Dr. Story ended his speech with a motion. Did that motion, then, propose that the Confession having now, owing to the advance of knowledge, become unbelievable, should no longer be held binding on the conscience of anyone? Not in the least. The motion he proposed, and the motion he acquiesced in (they were substantially the same), and which was carried by a very large majority of the Assembly, was this: "The Assembly declare that the Confession of Faith is to be regarded as an infallible rule of faith and worship, only in so far as it accords with the Holy Scriptures interpreted by the Holy Spirit." "Oh, most lame and impotent conclusion!" As if the most rigid Puritan of the seventeenth century, or any one of the authors of the Confession, ever dreamt of the Confession being infallible except so far as it was in accordance with Holy Scripture! Besides, what is the use of a Confession at all, if it is not to say in what sense Scripture is to be understood? The Bible is understood by one church in one sense, by another in another, and the only conceivable purpose of a creed or confession of faith is to state in plain language and systematic form what the Church accepts as the truth taught by the Scripture. However, let us remember that churches move slowly in the path of reform. The significance of this year's Assembly is that it has now been proclaimed to all the world that in spite of the Confession Calvinism is no longer the creed of the Church of Scotland. And surely we may "thank God and take courage," when we see the principles for which we have so long contended, taken up and sounded forth in quarters coming from which they must command the attention of the world.

Professor Peake, of the Primitive Methodist College, Manchester, is appointed Hartley Lecturer for the next Conference. His subject will be "The Problem of Suffering in the Old Testament."

SUNDAY AT THE FOOT OF MONT BLANC.

IT was Trinity Sunday, and from a cloudless sky the sun shone brilliantly on the mighty precipices on the southern side of the great chain of Mont Blanc. White peaks reared their heads into the blue around the mighty monarch of them all, and the rich red aiguilles towered above the glacier-steeps below as the perpetual guardians of the silent sanctuary in their midst. From the little village of Pré St. Didier I started to walk up the valley some three miles and a half to Courmayeur. Only about nine miles, I think, in a direct line from Chamounix, and at a considerably greater elevation, Courmayeur has a much warmer climate and a richer vegetation. Walnut and poplar, sycamore, acacia and willow, make the valley lovely with foliage; while the solemn pine woods climb towards the heights. A little below, the vine and the chestnut flourish, the hay is being cut and carried, and the air is laden with the sweetest of country perfumes. In the upper reaches the meadows seem like one vast mass of flowers. Red, gold, blue and white, ran in joyous riot over the green; and from countless blossoms, opening gratefully to the sun, arose a wondrous harmony of love and joy. Lilac and hawthorn and white rose were all in bloom together. The air was musical with the sound of falling water; torrents flashed through the forests, leaping from rock to rock to serve the fields below, where they were captured and conveyed by numberless small runnels to the thirsty grass. Far down the vale, tower after tower marked the little village churches which had been for hundreds of years the venerated homes of faith and prayer. It was to such a church that I made my way. Strolling in the woods the evening before, in the dark interval between the swift fading of twilight and the rise of the moon over the ridge behind us, we had noticed strange fires on the mountains. So had we also observed in the afternoon two carriages of priests, one adorned with a huge mass of flowers, coming up the valley. These were the simple greetings of the country-side to a young priest, who was to say his first mass next morning at Courmayeur.

Peasants were hurrying to the village, familiar with glories which made so deep an impress on my spirit, that all being seemed resolved into one great emotion of the presence of God. Across the entrance a little arch was formed with fir-boughs, and wreaths of evergreen entwined with lilies of the valley, another and more beautiful white lily which I well remembered to have seen six-and-thirty years ago growing on the uplands above, and many a flower beside. Almost every house had some decoration, a young tree from the woods planted in front, a bouquet on an outside stair, a garland over a door, flowers heaped upon the window-sills. From the entrance-arch depended a written welcome, Vos compatriotes sont heureux de vous saluer, Prêtre du Seigneur, and a little further on another garland, stretched athwart the street, contained the sacred words, Béni soit celui qui vient au nom du Seigneur. The government notices, the military instructions, the municipal announcements, and the designations of the schools, were all in Italian; but the people spoke apparently a mixed dialect, chiefly French, and the hotels and shops made their announcements in that language.

The church, reached by high flights of steps, stood on a little eminence above a platform or terrace on the hill-side. Its tower spoke of the old Romanesque builders; but its fabric seemed modern. A crowd of men and women, with a few children, had already gathered, talking with subdued friendliness and expectancy; an old woman, seated on the parapet, whose knotted fingers told a tale of strenuous toil, munched chestnuts out of a small sack beside her, occasionally giving one to a little boy at her feet. They were waiting for the procession, after which mass was to be celebrated at ten o'clock. By-and-by, a feu de joie was heard, and sounds of a distant band. Then from the far end of the village, where similar arches gave similar welcome, a high crucifix was seen advancing, borne by an elderly but stalwart woman. A number of little girls followed, the younger with wreaths of white flowers, the elder with white veils. Then came a group of women in the white linen habit and large bonnet of some local guild of helpfulness; a crowd of ordinary women, prayer-books in hand, repeating prayers or fingering their rosaries; a troop of boys whose sashes, red, blue, and green, bore the badge of the Sacred Heart; the men who had come from field and homestead to welcome the new priest—were his parents proudly among the devout multitude, I wondered, with hearts full of thankfulness and joy? Crosses and banners appeared at intervals. The government was represented by the two magnificently attired gens-d'armes in cocked hats and tail coats, whose white-gloved presence seems inevitable at any public function in Italy. Last came a group of clergy in rich robes shining in the sunshine; the young priest whom they had assembled to support walking with lowly reverence in their midst, clad in a vestment adorned with glorious Renaissance embroidery, and carrying a small exquisitely carved ivory crucifix in his hands. The band, which brought up the rear, stationed itself on the terrace below the church. The crowd fell apart; the procession swept up the steps; the girls and boys were disposed within and around the altar rails; the men sat in front, the women behind; the gens-d'armes looked on benevolently from behind the side seats of the priests; the rest of the worshippers thronged the aisles and back of the building, or sat on the steps outside. Within were lights upon the altar, where the Holy Mother and the Child looked down from above upon the kneeling crowd. Scarlet star-spangled hangings covered the pillars, which were linked with paper garlands of red, white, blue, and green. Around the pulpit a band of scarlet cloth bore the words, Fides, Spes, Caritas. And outside the mountains kept their mighty guard, and the streams danced, and the flowers looked laughing to the sun, and the woods pointed innumerable spires to heaven.

The village organist did his best with his poor little instrument, and the choir sang with lusty goodwill to make up for their occasional lack of intelligence or harmony. What a different scene was this from that which I had witnessed a week before, when the Archbishop of Siena on Whit-Sunday "pontificated" (the word was supplied to me by an Anglican clergyman, who rolled it about like a delicious morsel on his tongue), with all imaginable state in his own cathedral! Here was no public robing and unrobing; no master of the ceremonies with dexterous side-nods, gestures, and swift movements when things did not go right, keeping a complicated retinue in order; no troop of canons uncertain when to remove their privileged white mitres, and when to put them on again. All was simple. Two elder friends supported the young celebrant on either side, with a third to help; and when with a voice trembling with emotion the priest uttered words of prayer or benediction, the whole congregation seemed to join in the response, or give its sanction to the petition with an earnest "Amen."

Presently there was a pause. The kneeling crowd arose; those who had seats sat down; the rest of us stood. A young black-robed monk was in the pulpit; he belonged, so I was afterwards informed, to the order of St. Joseph. A week before I had heard a sermon from his grace of Siena on the personality of the Holy Spirit. Seated in front of the altar on a magnificent chair, with the whole attendant clergy disposed around him, he received from a kneeling priest a sumptuous red silk sermon-case, opened his discourse, held it up with his gloved hands near his eyes, stood up, and began to read. It was an elaborate theological argument on the work of the Spirit in the processes of creation, incarnation, and sanctification. I was told afterwards that Italian sermons are often of this abstract kind. But the preacher at Courmayeur understood his duty quite otherwise. If the day provided him with a great theological opportunity to discourse on the nature of the ever-blessed Trinity, he quietly passed it by. Addressing the congregation in French, after an earnest invitation to them to attend Vespers that afternoon in the same numbers with which they then filled the Church, he asked what was the cause of their great assemblage. It was that Courmayeur had produced a priest. An impassioned glorification of the priesthood followed. His analogies might be loose, his logic not above reproach, but no one could doubt his sincerity, his sympathy with the people to whom he spoke, his fervent devotion to the ideal of his Church.

"God," said he, with the utmost simplicity, "is very high, and we are very low." Yesterday as he came up the valley, he had seen every peak in the mighty range but one. The summit of Mont Blanc was veiled. So was the majesty of God hidden from us, and he could be known only through a Mediator. (He forgot to add that all that morning the full glory of the mountain top had been revealed.) Such a Mediator was found, first of all, in Jesus Christ, who on Calvary had offered the first mass, himself at once victim and priest, on the altar of faith. But he needed a representative, and that representative was provided in the priest. Every morning it would be the duty of the priest whom they had come to welcome to say mass at that altar ; and they knew that Jesus Christ himself would be personally present with him, because when he uttered the words of consecration, which converted the bread and wine into the body and blood of the Lord, he would not say, "This is his body," but "This is my body." From the mass he passed to the work of the priest in absolution. In glowing words he described his sufferings as he came to know the hidden sins of his people, sufferings which by a mystery might be said to fill up even that which was already complete, the suffering of Christ. He pictured the priest passing to and fro among the villagers who had known him from his childhood, caring for the young, ministering to the stricken and sorrowing, rebuking the evil, and moving everywhere as a presence inspiring, consoling, and sanctifying. And then, turning to the young man, who had again and again struggled with his emotion, he depicted him at the last day before the throne, bringing the souls he had succoured, and receiving from the Heavenly Judge the eternal reward of fidelity and love.

The service lasted long, and presently, though it was not over, the greater part of the congregation rose, and slowly streamed out of the church. A proclamation of the national statutory holiday was being read from the steps above the terrace by a stout white-bearded Mayor. I joined the rest of my party, and an hour or two later we crossed the river, and made our way to the path through the woods on the right bank, down the valley to Pré St. Didier. It was nearly half-past two. The strains of the band floated across the valley, signifying the holiday which had been announced by the civil power that morning. The peasants were gathering from distant parts for Vespers ; fathers and mothers were bringing their children, proud to carry neatly bound prayer-books carefully wrapped in handkerchiefs. All were genial and gay. Every one saluted us, or returned our salutation. There seemed no want ; the mendicancy so painful elsewhere troubled us not here ; the people were well clad, and though work was laborious, it was not without its requital of prosperity: Down through the forest we went, past banks of lily of the valley, varied with a large golden ranunculus, purple butterwort, columbines, dark red and blue—one of rare size and beauty—with the delicate cystopteris fragilis, a mountain polypody, close cousin to our oak and beech-ferns, and many another bit of floral loveliness ; while bright yellow barbery and the white rose grew in clumps in occasional open spaces among the great tall pines, and the music of the rushing stream came up from the ravine below. Who could be indifferent to these things ? On the one hand the glory and the loveliness of nature, on the other, the sufferings and sorrows and sins of humanity, and the ever recurring needs and aspirations of the soul. Priesthood, mediation, are they not perpetual facts of our experience, though we strip them of their ancient semblance of dogma and hierarchy ? The word that speaks to us with authority out of the heart of teacher or friend, revealing a higher nobleness than we had known ; the comfort in sorrow or the strength in trial which comes from those who have themselves suffered and been strong ; the gladness which rises when fountains of joy are unlocked within us by some dear presence unexpectedly, or by the kindling of new vision as we learn to look with fresh eyes on common things, and see in them the holy and divine—do not all these exercise a ministry of mediation, and teach us to take up the ancient hymn, with a wider sense than the villagers of Courmayeur intended, Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini ?

J. E. C.

CARDINAL VAUGHAN.

Our readers scarcely need to be reminded of the chief points in Cardinal Vaughan's career. He was born in April, 1832, and came of a good old Roman Catholic stock. His family had been settled for centuries at Courtfield on the Wye, where they are said to have entertained Henry IV. In the religious troubles of the sixteenth century they held fast to the Pope and paid the inevitable penalty by the loss of broad acres and the wealth which had once been theirs. Like most of their co-religionists they contended with unswerving fidelity for the Stuart dynasty, and the great-grandfather of the Cardinal fought under the Prince at Culloden. Still, in spite of all this they maintained their position among the landed gentry of the Roman obedience. And the Cardinal used to say that he was cousin to all the "Old Catholics" in England. His mother was a Weld. His uncle, who died the other day at a great age, was titular bishop of Plymouth. The Cardinal himself renounced his title to the family estate in order that he might devote himself to the sacred ministry. No less than five of his brothers followed his example. Two of them became Benedictines ; one is still a Jesuit and is well known as a popular preacher ; two were, like the Cardinal himself, members of the secular clergy ; one of them being Archbishop of Sydney.

When we try to estimate the value of his work and influence, the chief thing which must strike every one who knew him, or even knew about him, is the wonderful devotion, the unshrinking sacrifice of self with which he gave himself to the service of God. The present writer remembers him well as a simple priest nearly forty years ago. He was then and he remained till the end handsome in a remarkable degree. He had a dignified presence, and there was a peculiar charm in his easy, genial manner unspoiled by the slightest shade of pomposity or self-consciousness. It was very edifying to notice his threadbare clothing, and to remember the ease and wealth which might have been his had he but put out his hand to take them. Before the time of which we speak, he had risked his life in attendance on those who were dying by crowds of small-pox in South America ; he had laboured hard among the negroes of the United States, and having returned to his native land, he was wearing himself out in the endeavour to secure funds for his foreign missionary college, the first institution of the kind which arose among Anglo-Romans.

Even in those early days he had many critics within his own communion, and they were, as a rule, anything but friendly. True, he represented the "Old Catholic" aristocracy. He was an Englishman through and through ; his sympathies were strongly conservative. He was, however, very far from sharing the moderate and semi-Gallican views then prevalent in England. During his studies for the priesthood at Rome, he had fallen under the influence of Mr.—afterwards Cardinal—Manning ; he had joined the congregation of secular priests known as the Oblates of St. Charles Borromeo, and as Vice-Principal of St. Edmund's College, the diocesan seminary for the dioceses of Westminster and Southwark, he had imbibed the ultramontane ideas of Dr. Ward, who was acting there as as theological professor. Later he became proprietor of the Tablet and the Dublin Review and flung himself with characteristic ardour into that battle within his own church which terminated in the Vatican council.

The great mass of clergy and laity were arrayed against him. He used to speak of his own uncle, the Bishop of Plymouth, as of one wholly estranged from him because of his ultramontane sentiments. Of course, he had Manning, Ward, and other distinguished converts on his side. Yet even among the converts men of note, such as Macmallen, Maskell, Oxenham, and above all Newman, were keenly and even bitterly opposed to him. Nor can it be for one moment pretended that he was well equipped for such a contest. "Herbert Vaughan," so Dr. Ward wrote in 1862 to Dr. Newman, "who is my greatest friend and to my mind about the finest character I ever came across, is not intellectual, and with a self-knowledge truly rare, knows himself not to be so." Far from being intellectual, he was not even acquainted with the most familiar facts in church history. On one occasion he endeavoured to depreciate the weight of episcopal opposition to the definition of Papal infallibility by reminding the readers of, I think, the Tablet, that Arius was a bishop. A clerical opponent replied that Arius, to the best of his knowledge, lived and died a simple priest, and might possibly convey a useful warning to restless, intriguing, and ignorant clerics of the second order.

Unfortunately the party which Father Vaughan supported with such strenuous and reckless zeal prevailed at the council. Nevertheless, nobody could doubt Father Vaughan's sincerity and piety, though his piety also was of a narrow and intolerant type. We have seen how the beauty of his character affected Dr. Ward, and it made a deep impression on no less a person than the late R. H. Hutton, one of the most thoughtful and original writers on theology in recent times.

Sorely against his will Father Vaughan, who was absolutely free from ambition, became first "Bishop of Salford" and then "Archbishop of Westminster." At Salford he did much philanthropic work. He became interested in the housing of the poor, in efforts to provide amusement of an elevating kind and to promote temperance. In his last years he fought nobly in the cause of Christian education, and he provided the metropolitan church with a vast and dignified cathedral. With many of his clergy he was from first to to last far from popular. Exacting to himself, he was also exacting to them, but he always had a lofty ideal before his mind. He desired to see them faithful to their vocation, men of prayer, humble and devout ministers of Jesus Christ.

When Cardinal Vaughan was dying he said, "God called me to a great position and I have not filled it well." In a sense he was right, but after all the man who could also say, "I have received this grace to have no will save the will of God in every detail," has not lived in vain. He has left us a great example. He has passed, like his great contemporaries, Bishop Fraser and Archbishop Temple, into fuller light, into that beatific vision where we know even as we are known, where divines who have misunderstood each other upon earth meet in the joy of a common Lord.

WILLIAM ADDIS.

THE OLD TEMERAIRE. (Turner.)

MIGHTY, war-worn, old warrior of the vast deep!
No rebel wave resists the path thou now dost keep
With folded wings: subdued, the tired waves sleep.

A stellar and a solar glow companions thee!
The weary sun glides lonely through his own red sea,
A nascent star pierces the blue thy lamp to be.

The night approaches quick as thee its symbol draws;
The white wooden walls follow quick Fate's iron laws,
Ere the night falls, one ecstatic moment grant to pause.

Dead Swan, thy weird white form a great white shadow casts,
Thou thrillest by the tall white glamour of thy masts,
And dying, livest, while Time or man's glory lasts.

E. L. H. THOMAS.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden Hill, London, W., acknowledges with many thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Dr. Courtney Kenny, £1 1s.; Miss E. Garrett, £1 1s.

SOME people seem to think that Death is the only reality in life. Others, happier and rightlier-minded, see and feel that Life is the true Reality in Death.

—Julius Hare.

LITERATURE.

WESTCOTT'S BIOGRAPHY.*

WE confess to being of the number of those who think that most modern biographies are too long. A portrait of a man drawn by a skilful hand is what interests us, the essence of his life unencumbered by the mass of detail which can be of value only to a narrow circle. We shall probably not grudge the three volumes to Mr. Morley's "Life of Gladstone," for it must be in the nature of things full of incident and rich in documents of first-rate importance, almost a history of modern English politics. But the career of a great scholar gives no similar opening, and even the crowded activities of a beloved and successful bishop have about them an inevitable sameness. We believe that Mr. Arthur Westcott would have produced a more successful biography of his father, if he had known how to omit. Somehow, with every desire to be interested, we cannot say that the book carries us along. Many of the letters are of no permanent value—Dr. Westcott was not a great letter writer—and several that are printed are concerned with trivial details of daily life, which add nothing to our knowledge of the man. There are also, in our opinion, far too many extracts from contemporary newspaper reports of the bishop's speeches and activities. The catalogue of the meetings he attended and the sermons he preached becomes a little wearisome; while the description of his consecration is given with a detail suitable for the local newspaper on the following morning, and even tells us that the offertory realised over £51!

Having had our grumble about the defects of workmanship in these two volumes, we must hasten to express our gratitude for the hours of fellowship, which they have given us, with a man of rare gifts of mind and spirit In spite of the wonderful success of his episcopate and his absorbing interest in the economic and industrial problems of modern society, we think of him chiefly not as the bishop or the founder of the Christian Social Union, but as the great Christian scholar, and his career is above all a vindication of the positive worth of the scholar, modest, sensitive, reserved, both to the Church and the world. In other respects we are inclined to place him among the great inspirers rather than with the great thinkers of the past generation. His sermons and essays and commentaries contain a good deal of fresh and original thought, but he never elaborated it into a system. Especially in later years his mind was dominated by a few luminous and far-reaching principles, but in his own religious life he continued to find complete satisfaction within the system which he had inherited. In both respects, alike in his entire loyalty to the Church of England as the channel of grace, and in the strength of his personal influence, combined with a certain lack of definition in his thought, he may be compared to Frederick Denison Maurice. Of this latter trait it would be hard to give a better description than in the following words by Canon Scott Holland:—

"The real and vital impression made came from the intensity of the spiritual passion, which forced its way out through that strangely knotted brow, and lit up those wonderful grey eyes, and shook that thin high voice into some ringing clang as of a trumpet. There was a famous address at the founding of the Christian Social Union, delivered to us in Sion College, which none who were present can ever forget. Yet none of us can ever recall in the least what was said. No one knows. Only we know that we were lifted, kindled, transformed. We pledged ourselves; we committed ourselves, we were ready to die for the Cause; but if you asked us why, and for what, we could not tell you. There he was, there he spoke, the prophetic fire was breaking from him; the martyr spirit glowed through him. We, too, were caught up. But words had become only symbols. There was nothing verbal to report or to repeat. We could remember nothing, except the spirit which was in the words, and that was enough."

A man of whom words like these can be written, has in an unusual degree the secret of religious fascination. His favourite phrases, his central doctrine, his way of relating all the events of life and history with the Incarnation, you can hardly detach them from his personality. They are all channels, by which the spiritual essence of his own life flows into the lives of other men.

Westcott's intense—it was never a narrow—Anglicanism is a trait which will appeal most forcibly to those who have shared the same traditions and training. To us, we confess it seems at times to restrict his sympathies and to hamper the range of his thought. The claim, for instance, that the Church of England is the National Church in face of the fact that it does not represent more than half the religious life of the English people; the pained surprise at the humiliating narrowness of Welsh Liberals who advocated the disestablishment of the Church in Wales; the tendency not to permit the language of theological thought to go beyond that of the formularies; all this was due to the exigencies of his surroundings, and not to the native quality of his genius. He was an Anglican of a Cambridge, and not of an Oxford type. In 1887, in a letter describing a meeting with the Dean of Durham, he says, "I have never had an opportunity before of coming face to face with the old Oxford Movement." But he had from very early years a special liking for Keble's "Christian Year," and in an enthusiastic college letter, which his biographer has been rash enough to print, he speaks of Keble as the true poet in comparison with Wordsworth and Goethe! We doubt whether he would have said as much in later life; but there is throughout these volumes a curious absence of wide literary interest, and an aloofness from the great currents of thought outside his own range of religious teaching and speculation. He confesses that he has tried to see Emerson's world and finds it very hard—"harder than to bring the world which I do see into a tendency towards harmony." Even his well-known enthusiasm for Browning has something sporadic about it, and hardly fits in with the familiar habit of his mind.

For the rest the biography gives us

*"Life and Letters of Brooke Foss Westcott, D.D., D.C.L., some time Bishop of Durham." By his son, Arthur Westcott. (London; Macmillan Co. 2 vols. 17s. net.)

the impression of a man who found it rather hard to laugh; a little too sensitive ever to be quite happy; a little too serious to amuse himself with a good conscience. With a few men, Hort, Lightfoot, Benson, he was on terms of singularly intimate friendship; but for the rest of the world there was a veil of reserve. Even now he hardly stands revealed. But we do not complain. He used his gift. He was himself. In an age of bustle and talk he taught us the value of modesty and reserve and concentration of purpose, the close kinship on the plane of Christian living between the virtues of the scholar and the graces of the saint.

W. H. D.

SOME PHILOSOPHICAL BOOKS.*

SCHOPENHAUER'S Essay on the Basis of Morality, which has now received a satisfactory translation into English, was written on the announcement by a "Royal Academy of Sciences," in Copenhagen, of a prize to be offered for the best Essay on the Basis of Morality. Schopenhauer's Essay, which was the only one sent in, did not gain the award. It appears that the judges were scandalised by the freedom—not to say scorn—with which he attacks the reigning academic philosophers of the day, particularly Kant and Fichte. That the Essay was of far greater merit than they were capable of appreciating needs hardly to be said. Half of it is occupied with a severe criticism of Kant's moral system, unsympathetic and in part misleading, because it pays attention exclusively to the mere letter of what Kant says. The remaining half gives Schopenhauer's own ideas of "The basis of morality" and is of great interest, notwithstanding the frequent appearance of the author's favourite paradox, that pleasure is "negative," i.e., is only the relief from a preceding pain. The chief interest of Schopenhauer's ethics lies in the place he gives to Compassion. There is, he says, only a single kind of action which has any moral worth; when, by what I do, or omit to do, I simply and solely regard the weal and woe of another, and have absolutely no other object than to benefit him. "For this to be possible, I must in some way or other be identified with him, that is, the difference between myself and him, which is the raison d'etre of my egoism, must be removed, at least to some extent." "It is what we see every day—the phenomenon of Compassion—in other words, the direct participation, independent of all ulterior considerations, in the sufferings of another, leading to sympathetic assistance in the effort to remove them, whereon in the last resort all satisfaction and all well-being and happiness depend."

The volumes on Hume and Hegel, mentioned below, form two interesting additions to a very unequal series. They are symptomatic of the determination of the leaders of Liberal Orthodoxy to come to terms with modern philosophy. Dr. Orr had, of course, a very much easier task than that which Dr. Mackintosh undertook; and his account of Hume is painstaking and on the whole accurate, notwithstanding a continual tendency to hold the famous sceptic up as an awful example. He has done much to meet the real need for a good book on Hume's thought as a whole; for Professor Knight's volume has for long been taken for what it is worth by those who are competent to judge, and Huxley's brilliant sketch in the "English Men of Letters" series is really a defence of "scientific" positivism and nothing more.

Dr. Mackintosh speaks in his preface of the extraordinary difficulty of his task, of giving in less than three hundred octavo pages "an outline of the various portions" of Hegel's system. Much might be said both by way of criticism and of commendation of the result; but probably, it is only fair to say that he has suceeded almost as well as any one could who undertook such an enterprise within such limits. Specially interesting is his account of the earlier and later phases of "Hegelianism" in Great Britain. For his final verdict on the system, he adopts Arnold's comment on Keats ("Beauty is truth, truth beauty—that is all Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know"): "No, it is not all; but it is true, deeply true, and we have deep need to know it."

Signor Villa's account of present-day Psychology is a welcome addition to Sonnenschein's "Library of Philosophy," under the competent editorship of Professor Muirhead. The author has certainly succeeded in giving a good and clear summary of the ruling tendencies in Psychology at the present time, including among these "ruling tendencies" what we will venture to call not a few fashionable fallacies. The author's plan has been to take up certain questions of principle which are implied in every attempt to give a scientific account of the mind, and discuss prevalent views regarding each; thus, he deals in turn with "The Object and Scope of Psychology," "Mind and Body," "The Methods of Psychology," "Psychical Functions," "The Composition and Development of Mental Life," "Consciousness," and "The Laws of Psychology." It is a useful survey of what at present passes for a "science" of Psychology. We believe that there is no science of Psychology, but only the hope of one; although the hope is not strengthened by the fact that those writers who make the loudest claim to be "scientific" are invariably the most careless on matters of method and principle which require accurate thought.

S. H. MELLONE.

* "The Basis of Morality." By Arthur Schopenhauer. Translated by A. B. Bullock, M.A. London: Sonnenschein. Price 4s. 6d.

"Hegel" (The World's Epoch-makers). By R. Mackintosh, D.D., Professor of Apologetics in Lancashire Independent College, Manchester. Price 3s.

"Hume" (The World's Epoch-makers). By James Orr, D.D., Professor of Apologetics and Systematic Theology in the United Free Church College, Glasgow. Price 3s.

"Contemporary Psychology." By Guido Villa, Lecturer on Philosophy in the University of Rome. Translated by H. Manacorda, of the Italian Embassy in Paris. London: Sonnenschein. Price 10s. 6d. net.

BE such a man, live such a life, that if every man were such as you, and every life a life like yours, this earth would be paradise.—Phillips Brooks.

SHORT NOTICES

Edna Lyall: An Appreciation. With Biographical and Critical Notes, by the Rev. G. A. Payne, author of "Mrs. Gaskell and Knutsford," gives an interesting account of the late Ada Ellen Bayly, an account the greater part of which she herself had read and approved shortly before her death. Mr. Payne writes with warm appreciation of the stories which won for their gifted author so wide a popularity, and still higher appreciation of the character of the writer. He describes a visit which he paid to her at Eastbourne in the summer of 1897. Miss Bayly then told him that her grandfather, Robert Bayly, of Gray's Inn, was a strong Unitarian, though her father had become a Churchman; but she added, "One of the books I value most is my father's well-worn copy of 'Endeavours after the Christian Life,' by Dr. Martineau." Miss Bayly was born in 1857, and the story of her early discouragements as a writer and the ultimate triumph of her indomitable spirit is now well known. Mr. Payne does full justice to the admirable spirit of her life, and concludes his account with a bibliography. (Manchester: John Heywood, Deansgate. 1s. 6d.)

A charming little pocket volume of Selected Poems of George Meredith will be tempting to many who like such a quiet companion to take with them into the country. Here they will find "Woodland Peace" and "The Lark Ascending," "Melampus" and "The Woods of Westermain," and many another familiar piece.

He sings me, out of Winter's throat,
The young time with the life ahead;
And my young time his leaping note
Recalls to spirit-mirth from dead.

Imbedded in a land of greed,
Of mammon-quaking dire as Earth's,
My care was but to soothe my need;
At peace among the little worths.

To light and song my yearning aimed;
To that deep breast of song and light
Which men have barrenest proclaimed;
As 'tis to senses pricked with fright.

So mine are these new fruitings rich
The simple to the common brings;
I keep the youth of souls who pitch
Their joy in this old heart of things:

Who feels the Coming young as aye,
Thrice hopeful on the ground we plough;
Alive for life, awake to die;
One voice to cheer the seedling Now.

So the "Thrush in February" sets him singing; and soon after that comes "Love in the Valley." (Constable. 3s. 6d. net.)

Thoughts on Some Social Questions, Past and Present, by Louisa Twining, reprints as a pamphlet articles contributed to The Churchman in 1901-3. The subjects are not treated after the manner of Charles Booth and Seebohm Rowntree, but the papers are personal reminiscences of one who has been a worker in connection with churches and public movements for the benefit of the people, and whose memory extends over seventy years. It is interesting and suggestive to trace with the author the many changes for better and for worse in many phases of social life in the position of the clergy and the doings of the Church, immorality, intemperance, domestic service, dress, care of children, novel-reading, smoking, charitable institutions, women's position, thrift, and many other parts of social life. The "general apathy" towards widely dominant vices and public evils which the authoress laments is, we may hope, less general than appears in her retrospect. The absurdities of dress and extravagances of fashion are condemned, the disadvantages of the general disinclination to self-restraint and obedience among children, resulting in licence as they grow older, excessive athleticism, the reading of foolish novels instead of more wholesome literature, and the degradation of church life by the devotion of time and attention so largely to bazaars, theatricals and dances, the "degradation of charity" by means of these substitutes for genuine giving, while church services are shortened and less largely attended, are among the adverse changes deplored. Miss Twining recognises, however, that there are gains to record. The organisation of charities, settlements and homes for men and women workers, the increasing part taken in public work by women, attention to public health, working men's colleges, and the progress of poor law work give reason for satisfaction. The experiences of a cultured woman, a devoted worker, who believes in church work and has engaged in philanthropical effort for the great part of her life, must be of interest to a wider circle than that to which the letters were originally addressed. Several letters to the Guardian, with observations on religious and charitable institutions in Paris, Russia, Seville, and Holland, the result of travels in those countries, are added. (Elliot Stock. 1s. 6d.)

British Political Leaders, by Justin McCarthy. Appreciations of thirteen political leaders written with the acumen of an "Old Parliamentary hand," and with the charm of style characteristic of the author. Of special interest just now are the estimates of those politicians who are taking the lead on one side or on the other on the question, strangely a question still, of preferential tariffs; while Mr. McCarthy's intimate knowledge of the negotiations behind the scenes, which were followed by the liberal split in 1886, gives additional weight to his character sketches of some of them. An excellent portrait prefaces each chapter. (T. Fisher Unwin, 1903. 7s. 6d. net.)

Among the People of British Columbia, by F. E. Herring. Pleasantly, if sometimes naïvely, written pictures of life in the far West, joined together by a simple narrative of the romance of a girl's life. The fact of the pictures and the fiction of the romance are well worked together. A Chinaman's funeral, an Indian passion play, and the fish canning industry are described with special vividness. It is difficult to know whether the book is the work of a young author, as the literary form would suggest (there are sentences that are not sentences, and others of 130 words with several relatives), or of an experienced writer posing as a beginner, as the list of books which she has already produced makes probable. In the former case the work shows much promise, in the latter it is cleverly done. A good book for young people. (T. Fisher Unwin, 1903. 6s.)

OBITUARY.

MISS MARIA COOPER.

BY the death of Miss Maria Cooper, of Norwich, which took place on Monday last in her eighty-second year, another link is severed which united us with the noble men and women who made the Octagon Chapel famous in the early part of the last century. Miss Cooper's life was given up to the service of others, in overflowing and most thoughtful kindness, and in the hidden ways of a gracious Christian charity. She was a perfect example of pure, practical religion, a true modern Dorcas. She took the greatest interest in all the institutions connected with the Octagon, with which her whole life, excepting a brief stay in Kent, had been connected. Her purse was open to the fullest extent possible for the assistance of these; and her generosity was increased by the sacrifice of many pleasures which might have been hers. Often she would say to her minister on his visits: "Are you sure there is no one who requires help which I can give? Now that I am debarred from attending service, I must make amends in other ways." For the greater part of the active period of her life, she was a teacher in the Octagon Girls' Sunday-schools, of which she acted as superintendent for several years. During the last few years she was the moving spirit in, and the chief supporter of the Octagon Girls' and Infants' Day-schools, of which she acted as manager for fifty-nine years. She was also a most active district visitor. With remarkable strength of will, which, undoubtedly, prolonged her life, she united the sweetest gentleness of spirit. Her acquaintances delighted in her company, and admired her unfailing cheerfulness, the large intelligence of her mind, and the simple refinement of her life. One of her sisters was the mother of Mr. Leyson Lewis, who married the eldest daughter of Dr. Martineau; another was the mother of Miss Norton, of Hampstead; and a third was the mother of Mr. Francis Taylor, of Diss, and Mr. Alfred Taylor and Miss Taylor of Starston. Miss Cooper was the last survivor of nine sisters, who formed a family remarkable for their noble character. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall on Thursday afternoon.

MISS CONSTANCE BACHE.

MANY friends will hear with sorrow of the death of Miss Constance Bache, who passed away on Sunday morning, June 28, at Montreux, Switzerland. She was the youngest child of the late Rev. Samuel Bache, of Birmingham, and was born March 11, 1846, at Fairview House, Hagley-road, Edgbaston. Like two of her brothers, Edward and Walter, she adopted music as her profession, receiving instruction from the late Mr. Stimpson at home, and afterwards studying at Munich Conservatory. Latterly, Miss Bache devoted herself largely to the work of translation, and made English versions of some hundreds of songs. The English of Wolfrum's "Christmas Mystery," which is to be given at Hereford Festival, is from her pen; and she translated the letters of Liszt and of Bülow. Two years ago she published "Brother Musicians: Reminiscences of Edward and Walter Bache," noticed at the time in these columns. The interment took place at Montreux on Tuesday.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

BE good, that others may be good;
Not for ourselves alone
Are we placed here,
But to encourage and to cheer.
Each deed we do, each word we say,
Helps on or hinders,
In some strange way.
Therefore—be good.

The Sins of Needle:

"OH dear! it is nearly midnight, and I still have this hole to mend, or I shall be ragged to-morrow," sighed Elsie, as she looked into her workbox for needle and cotton. She had had a hard day's work and was very tried. She, and her mother, and invalid brother were very poor.

"Oh dear!" she exclaimed, "my only nice needle has gone again. It always does go whem I'm in a hurry. There is only this broken-pointed one. I don't know whether I can manage with this, but I'll try. Be kind and do your best, needle," she added, and set to work.

"Mother would say that I am as bad as the needle," she thought to herself; "for she often says that I go away just when she wants me most. And then she has only poor little Phil. He does his best, like you, needle," she added aloud to the needle, which, of course, could not hear, if she had only thought of it; "but he can't help mother as much as I can—There, it is finished!" she exclaimed joyfully, as she put the last stitch in. "I shall put you in this corner of my needlebook, poor broken needle, as a reminder to me not to run away when mother wants me; and not to blame the needles for running away, but to see that they don't do it!"

It is not usually necessary to keep broken neeedles; but the one we have been speaking about seemed such a friend to Elsie, that she did not like to throw it away. Certainly its stitches were not very good, but that wasn't to be expected. Even good needles make bad stitches sometimes. But then, whose fault is that?

Detmore. M. T. MOTT.

AN admirable wall map of the Dominion of Canada, mounted on rollers, has been prepared at the instance of the Hon. Clifford Sifton, Minister of the Interior, for presentation to schools, institutes, boys' clubs, reading-rooms, and public institutions generally in this country. It embodies the very latest information with regard to the topography of the Dominion, the steadily expanding railway system, and the new settlements which are being formed with such rapidity in every part of this vast region. Applications for the map should be addressed to the Canadian Government Offices, 11 and 12, Charing Cross, London, S.W.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom, or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, JULY 4, 1903.

A CHANNING MEMORIAL.

MR. CHADWICK'S new Life of Channing, of which we published a review last week by Mr. Armstrong, has appeared very opportunely in the year of the Emerson centenary, which is also the centenary (exactly a week after Emerson's birth) of Channing's ordination as minister of the Federal-street Church in Boston.

The anniversary of that ordination, significant of so much to the city of Boston, and to liberal religious thought and life throughout the world, was marked by the unveiling of a statue of Channing in the Public Gardens opposite the chief entrance of the Arlington-street Church, the present representative of the church to which he ministered for so many years. The statue is the gift of a citizen of Boston and member of the church, who died some years ago, but left an ample bequest to secure its erection.

Of the unveiling, by a grandson of the great preacher, a correspondent tells, in the Christian Register of June 4, as follows:—"In perfect weather, on the first day of June, when the rhododendrons were in blossom and the foliage and flowers of the Public Garden in a glory of colour, the first statue of Channing erected in the city of Boston was unveiled. It is a noble figure in bronze, with marble pedestal and canopy, by Herbert Adams, and stands exactly opposite the main entrance into Arlington-street Church, in a corner of the Public Garden, but facing the street, so that the passing stream of men and women will have the noble face full in view."

The Register of the following week gives a picture of the statue, which represents Channing robed in his ample preacher's gown, and with a somewhat austere expression on his face; and there is also a full account of the service of commemoration held in the Arlington-street Church before the actual unveiling took place.

The service opened with the singing of Gounod's anthem, "Send out Thy light," which was followed by an invocation by the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D. The introductory address was given by the Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, pastor of the church, who told of the gift of the statue, and recalled the memories of a hundred years ago.

Subsequently, addresses were given by President Eliot, of Harvard, and the Rev. W. C. Gannett, Lieutenant Governor Guild, and Dr. Edward Everett Hale, who pronounced the Benediction. Before the conclusion of the service, a hymn, written for the occasion by the Rev. J. W. Chadwick, was sung by the entire congregation, which crowded the church to the doors.

"Simply and purely of Thy love he told us,"
"He of our nature's solemn height assured us," are the opening lines of two of the verses, and the concluding verse runs:—

Dead, he yet speaketh, and his voice is sounding
Now in our ears as when our fathers heard:
To us he publishes Thy grace abounding,
To us he brings Thy everlasting word.

"We commemorate a great preacher," said President Eliot in his address, "a noble man with a noble mission." But, after speaking of the profound influence exerted by Channing, he added words which we also may take to heart in this country:—

It is impossible to join in this centennial celebration of the advent to Boston of this religious pioneer and philanthropic leader without perceiving that in certain respects the country has recently fallen away from the moral standards he set up. Channing taught that no real good can come through violence, injustice, greed, and the inculcation of hatred and enmities, or of suspicions and contempts. He believed that public well-being can be promoted only through public justice, freedom, peace, and goodwill among men. He never could have imagined that there would be an outburst in his dear country, grown rich and strong, of such doctrines as that the might of arms or possessions or majorities make right; that a superior civilisation may rightly force itself on an inferior by wholesale killing, hurting, and impoverishing; that an extension of commerce or of missionary activities justifies war; that the example of imperial Rome is an instructive one for republican America; and that the right to liberty and the brotherhood of man are obsolete sentimentalities.

Nevertheless, in spite of these temporary aberrations of the public mind and heart, it is plain that many of Channing's anticipations and hopes have already been realised, that his influence on three generations of men has been profound and wholly beneficent, and that the world is going his way, though with slow and halting steps.

Mr. Gannett, the son of Channing's colleague in the ministry, spoke of him as that "frail-bodied soldier for God, his weapon the sword of the spirit, his shield the shield of his faith in God and in man." An ideal thinker and seer, he was essentially a prophet and an emancipator in the highest sense, setting free the soul, bidding it know its power, its place in the universe, its participation in the nature of God. Thus he liberated the soul from all possible bondage into all possible growth. And thus Mr. Gannett concluded his address.—

Now because Boston is nearer to Channing's mind than she was when he walked the streets, so he in turn, being invisible, is nearer to Boston's heart than he was; and fitly she welcomes him back, in visible semblance, as permanent citizen. Still he will preach—now at the door of his Church instead of the pulpit; now to the larger audience of the passing people. Henceforth the children of Boston will claim him as theirs, as one of the few of the old time who belong to the now of each new generation. The stranger who comes to the city as pilgrim will pause at his feet and consider. They will look, if not listen; and the eye will translate to the ear his message. And the message is that which has brightened from prophet to prophet for ages: "That is the true Light which lighteth every man who cometh into the world; and, as many as receive it, to them it giveth the power to become the Sons of God."

CHRISTIANITY AND TARIFFS.

IT is becoming more and more evident as the weeks creep by, that if we are not to be led by false ideals straight upon national and imperial disaster, all men of clear brain and single mind who place the good of the many before the gain of the few must be up and doing. For there are many men of clear brain and oblique mind and still more men of single mind but mistrained brain, who are working their hardest to guide the nation into a path which may bring doubtful good to the few, but can, in the nature of things, bring nothing but ill to the mass of our people at home and—ultimately—in our colonies as well.

A very casual glance at the arguments of the New Protectionists should suffice to bring home their unsoundness to the reader possessing a real grip of the root-principles of Christian polity. Is it a good or an evil thing that commodities should be cheap? In the mind of the individual grower or manufacturer of the individual commodity it is, so far as that commodity is concerned, an evil thing. In the mind of the man of goodwill who places first the welfare of the mass of the community it is, or should be, an unmixed good. Let him whose political ideals seem to him for the moment to be reduced to chaos by the war of words over the so-called new Zollverein proposals put this simple test to the contentions of the propagandist. What appears to be his chief concern? Is it that the people at large shall find ready to their hand, cheap, good and abundant, the commodities wherewith to satisfy their material needs? Or is it that this or that individual agricultural or industrial interest shall be eased of its difficulties in meeting the competition of other interests in the supply of the general market? No politician who knows his business will let it appear that he entirely ignores the interests of the consumer, i.e., of the people at large, but the test by which he must be made to stand or fall is as to which interest he places first.

Fifty years have shown us, despite all cooked statistics to the contrary, that when once the interest of the general buyer has been given full and frank supremacy over the interest of the individual seller, the enhanced capacity of the buyer to satisfy his needs is a sure guarantee that prosperity for the seller—in the aggregate and on the average—will follow in its train. For him who has once grasped this fundamental fact the distracted talk of our markets being "flooded by foreign goods," about our being "the one dumping ground of the world," and about our "helplessness" in the face of this "foreign invasion," so far from causing distress of mind, has nothing but thankfulness and satisfaction. In the commercial world one does not get something for nothing, and it follows as night after day that this foreign invasion has and will have its counterpart in stimulated exports and increased production, if not in one home industry then in another.

But, indeed, the questioners of these elemental economic truths would have had far less chance of creating a popular following than they have now, were it not for the skilful interweaving by their leader of a kind of sentimental imperialism with the threadbare fallacies of "Fair Trade." Our colonies, they say, are anxious to secure, and we should be anxious to confer upon them, a closer material union with the mother country. In what happier manner can we carry out this aim than by entering into a great imperial compact to fight shoulder to shoulder against the menace to our trade supremacy offered by this terrible German and American competition? Let us buy from each other wherever we can, irrespective of our relative ability, in competition with the foreigner, to produce the best and cheapest goods; let us strengthen the ties of sentimental preference by the coercion of differential tariffs; and let us retaliate on the counter discrimination which the foreigner may set up against the exports of our colonies by resort to those old weapons of tariff warfare which were believed to have been abandoned once and for all over fifty years ago.

But what a lowered ideal of national and international conduct this propaganda discloses beside the ideals associated with the names of COBDEN and GLADSTONE and BRIGHT! To them trade was the great messenger of peace and fosterer of goodwill between nation and nation. To them our great confederation of free self-governing States was the nucleus of a greater confederation in mutual helpfulness and amity of the nations of the world. It is indeed, to bring not peace but the sword that the new federationists, consciously or unconsciously, have set themselves. Dear food is to be the ground of the love of the working men at home for his brothers in the colonies. Suspicion of undue advantage given to Australian wool or Canadian corn over New Zealand meat is to be the basis of the affection of the colonies for the law makers of the mother country. The resolve to reduce to the minimum that mutual knowledge and understanding which trade relations have brought and will bring between frontier and frontier is to be the foundation of the new era of international goodwill which seemed so near at The Hague four short years ago.

Love of home is a commendable virtue, but only while it leaves free flow to the duty of loving one's neighbour. Concern for the welfare of one's native town is good, but it must not be allowed to wean the heart from the larger calls of national patriotism. A patriotism, again, which confines itself to the shores of these islands, to the exclusion of the daughter nations across the seas, we have lately been told again and again, in eloquent periods, betrays a conscience dead to the splendour of the destiny of our race. But why are we to stop there? Why are we to deny, or speak and act as though we denied the further obligations laid upon us to care and work for the good of every child of GOD, of whatever clime or race or colour.

It is because the conception of our position at the centre of this wonderful Empire so vigorously propounded within the past few years ignores in its essence this final obligation upon the Christian citizen that it becomes necessary for men of longer sight to strive to the utmost to secure the rehabilitation of the old ideals in their old pre-eminence while there is yet time. To seek to restrict to one particular group of peoples, in however small a degree, the mutual advantages of trade relations, and the relations of friendship depending upon and following them, is to misapply the natural sentiments of kinship; it is utterly short-sighted from a materialistic point of view and it is utterly and fundamentally un-Christian.

LORD ROSEBERY, writing last Saturday to the Chairman of the London County Council, announced the offer of a great gift by Messrs. Wernher, Beit & Co., to secure the foundation of a Technical College in London, on the lines of the great College of Applied Science at Charlottenburg, in close proximity to the University of Berlin. The firm are prepared to give £300,000 for this purpose, provided that the Government will give a site that is available at South Kensington, close to the buildings of the London University and kindred institutions, and further, that the County Council will furnish an income of £20,000. Much larger resources will be required for the full development of the scheme, but this will secure an adequate foundation in what is universally recognised as a matter of urgent national and imperial concern.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE annual proceedings at the close of the Session took place at the College on Thursday and Friday, June 25 and 26. The greater part of Thursday was devoted as usual to the reading of passages from the students' essays and examination answers, and sermons were preached in the College Chapel by Messrs R. P. Farley, B.A., J. Ewart, M.A., and E. Lockett, who have completed their course. Mr. Ewart is to continue his studies as a Hibbert scholar. Mr. V. R. Shinde, B.A., the Indian student, and Mr. Z. Toyosaki, the Japanese student, have also completed their two years' course at the College, and after attending the International meetings at Amsterdam in September, are returning home. Mr. Toyosaki, however, hopes to return to Japan by way of America, and thus to secure a term of further study at Harvard. At five o'clock the Visitor's Address was given by the Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A., and in the evening the Valedictory service was held.

A special interest attached to the meeting of the Trustees on Friday, on account of the retirement of Professor Upton from the Chair of Philosophy, which he has held for twenty-eight years. The occasion was taken for the warmest recognition of his services, and at a subsequent luncheon a presentation was made by his old students. Mr. Upton, as we recorded last week, will happily still maintain his connection with the college as Emeritus Professor, and will continue to reside at Littlemore.

THE VISITOR'S ADDRESS.

The Visitor's Address was given by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., on Thursday afternoon, the general subject being the value of Opinion and its relation to Truth and Fact. The address is to be published, and we can give here only a few notes from it. Opinion Mr. Hargrove defined as "all assertions or beliefs which are matters of dispute, the opposite of which are maintained by people generally reputed to be of good sense and not without knowledge of the subject matter." Things of which we are certain we call fact, what we differ about we call, or ought to call, opinion; but between the two is a wide disputed territory. This was illustrated in the matter of knowledge of the material world, and of theological assertion, and the mischief arising from the dogmatic assertiveness of the churches was emphasised. "The cause of truth," said Mr. Hargrove, "is sacred; it is one to live for, to fight for, to die for: to know it and deny it is treason against one's own soul; to know and to conceal it is a cowardice degrading to our manhood." But for that very reason, one cannot be too careful not to confound what is merely pious belief with truth. In that college they stood not for opinions, but for principles. The college existed for the purpose of promoting the study of religion, theology, and philosophy without insisting upon the adoption of particular doctrines. The principle was grand. It distinguished them, who otherwise were an insignificant minority, from every other "splinter'd fraction of a sect," each asserting itself and practically insisting upon an infallibility which it must therefore be modest in their declarations, as seekers of truth, and not pretend to absolute knowledge which they did not possess, but have respect for the judgments of other minds also. A clear understanding of the fundamental distinctions between fact and opinion would go far towards moderating the rancour of political and religious strife, and great would be the gain to the world and the church, to science and to learning. After further illustration and insistence on the necessity of deference only to facts and consideration for the opinions of others, the address concluded :—

"Prove all things, hold fast that which is good." It is by a faithful following of the Apostolic maxim, that we shall be true to those who preceded us, teaching here doctrine in many respects different to what now commends itself to us, true also to those yet unborn who shall succeed us here and condemn or approve our work with the same liberty which we have inherited from our predecessors. Let us be generously afraid lest we impose our opinions for divine revelation, or take "the broken lights" which God vouchsafes to each humble seeker as the full day in which all is made manifest. So shall the inevitable diversity which comes of liberty be found consistent with the perfect harmony which should prevail among those whose simple object is the pursuit of truth—Truth, not yours or mine, but the property of that Holy Spirit, of which the promise is that it shall guide us, if so be that we let ourselves be guided, "into all truth."

The Valedictory Service.

The Valedictory Service for the students leaving college was held in the College Chapel on Thursday evening. The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, who read as lessons Isaiah vi. and passages from 2 Timothy. The farewell on behalf of the college was given by the Principal, Dr. Drummond, and the welcome into the ministry by the Rev. Henry Gow.

Dr. Drummond in his Valedictory address to the five students, having spoken of the studies in which they had been engaged, said that their primary end was not to be theologians but ministers of the grace of God. Yet in not many was the inspiration so pure that they could safely trust to their untrained nature. The history of religion showed into what wild fanaticism and puerile superstition men were driven by untrained emotion. It was almost always the men of widest knowledge and most carefully trained mind who had wielded the largest and purest influence; and in their own immediate circle he recalled the memory of James Martineau, John James Tayler, John Hamilton Thom, and Charles Beard, men able to hold their own in the world of scholarship and thought, who spared no pains to make themselves perfect for their work. It was true that mere knowledge could not take the place of religious inspiration, but religion had an intellectual side; through thought and knowledge progress was effected; spiritual and intellectual progress must go together. They were passing through a very serious crisis at the present time. Old foundations of faith were crumbling away. Many were drifting with silent despair on the sea of doubt, going they knew not whither, and others were clinging to ruined positions which all men of ordinary knowledge knew to be untenable. It was for the modern preacher to exhibit the ancient truths, to liberate the spirit of Christianity once more, and show it in its pristine loveliness.

In conclusion he addressed the five students individually, who, he noted, were of five different nationalities, and with words of sympathy and good wishes on behalf of the college bade them an affectionate farewell.

Welcome into the Ministry.

The Rev. Henry Gow, in giving the welcome into the ministry, spoke first of the happiness of student days, of thankfulness for the lasting friendships made, the love of truth impressed upon them, the high ideals of faithful service called out by the spirit and teaching of the college. But now their time of preparation was over and they were looking forward to active work. They must remember that no training could really prepare them for the ministry. Much of their work would be entirely new. But when they made mistakes and felt their own inefficiency they must not be discouraged. They must believe in the Christian ministry, and reverence their calling for the sake of God whose messengers they were, and for the sake of the great need of the world. There were times, as he well knew, when the minister longed to be doing something, not merely saying something, however true. But the more they came to know of the inner life of others the more impressed would they be by the deep inarticulate longing for the realities of religious faith and life. And then he proceeded : —

"Rejoice then because the world needs you, because although men and women often seem hard and careless and immersed in pleasure, yet there is a deep underlying longing for God and love for goodness, to which we ministers are called upon to speak. We must never lose our faith in the religiousness of men and women. So far only as we reverence human nature can we bring any help. It is a cause for joy that we are called to look at men as children of God, to believe in their powers and to help them to believe in themselves. We can do nothing for them without reverence for them and faith in God. The relationship to the unseen, the sense of divine constraint upon our life, the faith in righteousness and truth, these are the most important elements in man and it is to them that we appeal.

"We have no lordship over any one; we have no right to dictate their opinions or to manage their lives. We ministers must strive to be like Emerson, the friends of those who want to live in the spirit. We must strive to be simple, free from formality and very human. We ought to rejoice that our effectiveness and influence depend not on any official sanction but on our intrinsic manhood. The minister who relies upon his office or position can do little or nothing. Less and less in our free churches does the priestly ideal prevail. We cannot eke out poverty of character or intellect, or love by insisting on our official dignity and power. It is the man behind the minister that counts. However perfect the machinery or training, there can be no real success for us except through our manhood. There is no profession where the essential qualities which mark all good men and women are so all-important. How often we ministers are told, and rightly told, that the great need is for us just to be human and real, without pretence and formality. There is no profession where simplicity, sincerity, and sympathy cover so great a multitude of sins. Be your best self, be kind, be true, let men know you can be trusted as only those can be trusted who themselves rest upon a rock, and you cannot fail of doing good. These are simple human qualities, needed by all men, but absolutely essential for the minister.

"It is a cause for rejoicing that the qualities we need are not peculiar and apart, separating us from common humanity. It is good to know that our ministry depends upon our manliness. The more deeply and broadly human we are the more power we have for good."

Having spoken further of the manifold interests of life, with every one of which the minister was concerned, and quoted the late Bishop Westcott as saying, "I am a Christian; nothing in the nature of things is foreign to me," Mr. Gow concluded :—

"'I am a Christian minister,' some people seem inclined to say, but still I like science and art and travelling and social intercourse.' 'I am a Christian minister,' we ought to say, 'therefore of course I like science and art and all this wonderful world, and long to know it better, and love to talk with people and to learn a little more of human nature. Nothing is foreign to me in the world, neither nature nor man, because I am a Christian.' Real religion has the thrill and variety and strength that constitute life; it is not respectable habits, kindly intentions, dull morality and formal discourse. It has in it romance, adventure, daring—it is full of life and joy.

"Rejoice then in the largeness, the variety, the adventurousness, the boundless opportunities of the work you have undertaken. Rejoice in the fact that there is nothing you do or think or see which may not help you in your work. Rejoice in the thought of the friendships that await you in the coming years. There is no place where a man may make so many true and lasting friendships with people of all ages and classes and types of character as in the ministry. It is one of the great joys, the great rewards of this ministry, the kindness, the sympathy, the close friendship which grow up, and naturally, between a minister and his congregation as he goes quietly about his work. Many men have to make their friends apart from their work. We ministers, so far as we are real and human, make our best friends in and through this work which has been given us to do. We enter into the life of our people and they enter into ours. 'Friends in Christ,' is a phrase often misused and slighted; but there is no friendship more real and intimate than friendship founded on religion and expressing itself through sympathy. Your ministerial work is not a thing apart from your manhood; it is inextricably involved with it. Rejoice that your work demands of you reverence for men and women, and that, as all true ministers have found, the more you respect and care for others, the more reason you will have for your trust.

"Rejoice that your work, whether in large or little ways, is so much needed, so vitally important to the welfare of the world. And, finally, let us rejoice in the love and guidance of God, who will help us in our weakness and who, even through our failures and mistakes, will bring to pass some good. May God help you, may He help all of us ministers to be faithful messengers of His holy Gospel, into whose service as a brother minister I now welcome you to-night."

THE TRUSTEES' MEETING.

The Annual Summer Meeting of Trustees was held on Friday morning in the Library, the President, Mr. W. Colfox, in the chair.

The PRESIDENT, in opening the proceedings, said that the chief interest of that meeting was in connection with the retirement of Professor Upton, and the appointment of Mr. Jacks, who, they hoped, in the course of years, would maintain the traditions of the chair, which had been so brilliant under Dr. Martineau and Mr. Upton. He noted that among the students who were to receive certificates on the completion of their course, one was an Indian and another a Japanese, and he was glad that in both cases there were to be successors. He pointed to the serious fact that in the past year the expenditure had been £444 in excess of the receipts.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, in moving a resolution of thanks to the Principal, Professors and Lecturers of the college, spoke with high appreciation of the services rendered by Mr. Upton to the college and to the churches. That his successor should in the same way win the warm affection of the students was what they all desired, and they hailed with pleasure the appointment of so capable a successor as Mr. Jacks.

The resolution having been seconded by Mr. RUSSELL SCOTT and very cordially passed, was acknowledged by the Principal.

The Rev. H. S. SOLLY moved, and the Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND seconded, a resolution of thanks to the Visitors for their services, and to the Rev. Charles Hargrove for his address, with the request that he would allow it to be published. Mr. HARGROVE acknowledged the resolution.

The distribution of certificates, prizes, and Daniel Jones Grants to the Students then followed. Mr. R. P. Farley, B.A., Mr. J. Ewart, M.A., and Mr. E. Lockett received certificates on completion of the full college course; Mr. Shinde and Mr. Toyosaki, certificates on the completion of their two years of special study at the college; Mr. J. Islan Jones, B.A., who is to be senior student next session, gained the Russell Martineau prize for Old Testament studies.

Professor Upton's Retirement.

The PRESIDENT with words of warm sympathy and appreciation moved the following resolution:—

That the Trustees of Manchester College assembled at the close of the last Session of Professor Upton's tenure of the Chair of Philosophy held by him for twenty-eight years in succession to his illustrious Teacher, Dr. Martineau, with so much honour to himself and so much benefit to the College and its students, desire to convey to him their profound sense of his inestimable services to his Alma Mater, of his deep insight and spiritual power, united with fine scholarship and intellectual grasp, and of the great personal influence which he exerted on the students as their friend by his own noble Christian character with its singleness of aim and its self-forgetful devotion to truth and righteousness.

That the Trustees rejoice that they are not bidding him farewell, but that for years they may hope that the College may have the benefit of his presence, while as Professor Emeritus he still exerts his personal influence on the students and continues to give occasional courses of lectures on subjects connected with his Chair.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL seconded the resolution, and speaking with the knowledge which fifty years of friendship with Mr. Upton gave, bore testimony to the charm and the great value of his personal influence, and the eminent service he had rendered as a teacher.

The Rev. DR. DRUMMOND said it was with very mixed feelings that he rose to support the resolution; with joy that his friend's work had been so much appreciated and deep regret that the time had come when such a resolution was necessary. It was nearly forty-seven years since he had first come into connection with Mr. Upton, when they were students together at Manchester New College, in London. There he speedily made up his mind that Mr. Upton was far and away the ablest and most original among the students of that time. He recalled the discussions they used to have after lectures round the stove in the old library, and he reckoned himself as one of Mr. Upton's students, for he owed a great intellectual debt to him. The stimulus of such converse, in which fellow students learnt from one another, was one of the most valuable things in connection with the college. From that time to this he did not remember that the smallest shade had ever fallen on their friendship. At that time the college was going through a very stormy period; but in the midst of anxious questions, as to heretical opinion, its open principle had been maintained, and they had no heresy but that of falsity of work and insincerity of statement. Every man studied and thought for himself. And they must recognise in the width of that principle that a great many things were held simply as opinions; but carefully thought out, charged with religious fire, they must be expressed with intense conviction. So it had always been with them. Their opinion had moved on; they had not been stagnant. But they learnt to see that beneath the form of all opinion there was most assuredly a deep soul of reality; opinions were not flung forth as deceptive images on a fog, they were the attempt to express and set forth the grand images of reality, which, no doubt, came to them as in a mirror, darkly, but still true and divine displayed themselves to soul after soul, generation after generation, at last to be revealed in the vision face to face. No one had contributed more in their little circle than Mr. Upton to that most desirable result. There was no one with a deeper grasp of reality, no one more cordial and kindly in the reception of opinions different from his own. With all his earnestness and anxiety on fundamental points, no student was ever repelled by his treatment of their differences; his one desire was to bring them close to the heart of reality, and make them feel the deepest truths of morality and religion.

Mr. Upton's kindliness of heart was well known. Some might think that under his calm exterior there was not a deeply sensitive nerve; but his calmness was not due to want of feeling. It was due to his absolute unselfishness, his simple modesty, his respect for others, and desire always to do simply the right thing and to do it in the right way. He retired now with faculties fully ripe and unimpaired. In his admirable exposition of Dr. Martineau's philosophy, which had been recognised as "a surprise of lucid statement," they could see the truth of that statement. Now he was to go from them, almost full of years, certainly full of honour, with the affection and respect, he might say the reverence of all who had come under his influence, who must always value the possession of his friendship.

Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON, speaking also on behalf of the Rev. H. E. Dowson, who was absent on the Continent, said that in the fulfilment of their duties as secretaries, they had found in Mr. Upton all those qualities so beautifully alluded to by Dr. Drummond. He had been struck again and again, in ways and to an extent that had been a revelation to him, with what depth of character, what simplicity of nature, what unselfishness of life could be combined with intellectual and spiritual gifts such as Mr. Upton possessed.

The Rev. L. P. JACKS said that after the noble utterance of Dr. Drummond there was nothing to add, but from the peculiar relation in which he stood to Mr. Upton, he should be glad to emphasise what had been said. Mr. Upton was one of whom they might speak, in no vain and empty sense, as an ornament to philosophy. He had made positive contributions to philosophical thought, and he was not to be regarded merely as a disciple of his great master, Dr. Martineau, but had shown both on the ethical and cosmical side of his system where considerable modifications must be made. The fruit of philosophy in Mr. Upton's case was to be seen in the singular beauty and tenderness of his character, in that noble self-effacement, which he took to be the greatest dignity of man.

The Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, who became a teacher in the college in the same year as Mr. Upton, spoke of the great value of the judgment he brought to the college counsels, the exquisite serenity of temper, which pervaded his judgment of the students, and the charm of intercourse with him in all matters of administration. He expressed the earnest desire that Mr. Upton would gather together some fruits from his large stores of philosophical learning, and enrich their literature with some further work on the philosophy of religion, that would make his name more widely known and warmly appreciated even than at present.

The Rev. C. J. STREET, as one of Mr. Upton's oldest students, added a few words of gratitude and affection, and the resolution was carried, all present rising to greet Mr. Upton.

The Rev. C. B. UPTON, acknowledging the resolution, thanked them for their most kind and too appreciative recognition. His dominant feeling at that time, he said, was of gratitude for all that he owed to Alma Mater. He was grateful to have enjoyed so much advantage and inspiration from the principle of freedom of thought and expression which had dominated the college from its origin. And he was grateful to a Beneficent Providence, that in his early years of preparation for the ministry he was at college when his great predecessor, who had done so much to harmonise religion with thought and science, was teaching there. His words kindled enthusiasm for philosophy, and if any little value might attach to what he himself had afterwards done, it was largely due to the grand germinal ideas he derived from Dr. Martineau and had since been developing. He was grateful also that his work as teacher in the college had been with such congenial colleagues. From his old friendship with Dr. Drummond, it had been a peculiar happiness to be so near to him and under the influence of his spirit. They had been years rich in comfort largely owing to his friendship, with constantly deepening respect for his character and profound reverence for his pure and holy nature. His other colleague had also been a source of great enlightenment and comfort. Their college might be proud to have brought the study of the philosophy of religion and the closely allied study of comparative religion into close connection, and thus much light was to be gained from Mr. Carpenter's teaching. Turning to the future, he looked forward, with no little hope, to the pleasure and light he should derive from association with the friend who was to succeed him. He knew enough to be assured that Mr. Jacks would prove equal to the great task that was before him. Both by reason of his ability and enthusiasm he was calculated to do admirable service. Finally, he was grateful that he might still be permitted to some slight extent to take part in the teaching of the college, which he loved so much.

The PRINCIPAL having announced that the students would reassemble for the new session at 9 A.M. on Saturday, October 17, moved a vote of thanks to the President, which was seconded by Mr. DAVID AINSWORTH, and the meeting came to a close.

PRESENTATION TO PROFESSOR UPTON.

After the Trustees' Meeting a luncheon was given in the college to Professor Upton by his past and present students. The Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, as senior of the students, presided, and there were also present as guests the President, the Principal, the Revs. W. Addis, J. E. Carpenter, J. E. Odgers, S. A. Steinthal, C. Hargrove, and Joseph Wood, and Mr. A. H. Worthington. Besides the chairman, thirty other of the past and present students were there, while letters and messages of regret for absence were received from many others. Several of these greetings, including those from India, America, and South Africa, were read by Mr. R. P. Farley.

After lunch, the CHAIRMAN, in a speech full of happy reminiscences, touched many of the chords of gratitude, sympathy and affection which his old students feel for Professor Upton, and told how they could not allow him to retire from his chair without some such united recognition as they were then offering. They asked his acceptance of an address, and of the Encyclopædia Britannica, which they had understood would be a welcome gift. He called upon the Rev. W. H. Drummond to read the address, in which ninety-six past and present students had joined, as follows:—

To the Rev. Charles Barnes Upton, B.A., B.Sc., Professor of Philosophy in Manchester College, Oxford.

DEAR SIR,—We cannot allow the occasion of your retirement from the active duties of your chair to pass unmarked by some token of our gratitude and affection.

We welcome the opportunity which it gives us of telling you how much we owe to you. As students of the college we are proud of the position which you have won for yourself among the foremost thinkers of our time upon the great themes of the Philosophy of Religion. But it is with a more personal feeling that we approach you to-day. Your thought has helped to mould ours, and when we try to instruct others, it is often the teacher who speaks through the lips of the pupil. You have given to us the high privilege of your friendship, and in personal intercourse you have kindled in many of us your own zest for the Truth, and your love for things that are lofty and and simple and pure. You have bound us to yourself by the warmth of your heart, and the unadorned simplicity of your life.

May we, with all respect, congratulate you upon the noble fruition of your labours in this college, while we pray that the Eternal Wisdom may still have many things to teach us through your written word.

We are gratefully and affectionately yours,

T. LLOYD JONES.
CHARLES DERZSI.
V. D. DAVIS.
F. W. STANLEY.
A. W. TIMMIS.
LAWRENCE SCOTT.
GEO. EVANS.
C. J. STREET.
HUGON S. TAYLER.
GEORGE BOROS.
PHILEMON MOORE.
WALTER J. EVANS.
THOMAS ROBINSON.
W. COPELAND BOWIE.
FRANK K. FREESTON.
EDGAR I. FRIPP.
R. TRAVERS HERFORD.
W. H. DRUMMOND.
NICOLAUS GAL.
HENRY GOW.
W. G. TARRANT.
L. P. JACKS.
A. LESLIE SMITH.
E. L. H. THOMAS.
PRIESTLEY PRIME.
J. H. MUIRHEAD.
T. BOWEN EVANS.
S. C. PINKERTON.
W. LYDDON TUCKER.
SOLOMON CSIFO.
E. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS.
ARTHUR W. FOX.
D. REES.
S. S. BRETTELL.
G. DAWES HICKS.
LAWRENCE GALEI.
WILFRED HARRIS.
VERNON HERFORD.
HERBERT POLE.
DAVID DAVIS.
RUDOLF DAVIS.
W. E. GEORGE.
JOHN S. MATHERS.
S. H. MELLONE.
RICHARD C. MOORE.
AMBROSE BENNETT.
J. TYSSUL DAVIS.
A. CUNLIFFE FOX.
J. WORSLEY AUSTIN.
NICOLAS JOZAN.
HARRY S. PERRIS.
JOSEPH H. WICKSTEED.
R. BALMFORTH.
J. M. CONNELL.
CHRISTOPHER R. ELIOT.
J. H. WEATHERALL.
FRANCIS WOOD.
NEANDER ANDERTON.
J. A. FALLOWS.
W. C. HALL.
J. WARSCHAUER.
W. WHITAKER.
W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE
J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.
ALFRED HALL.
PROMOTHO LOL SEN.
E. SAVELL HICKS.
JOHN HENRY WOODS.
ALEX. R. ANDREAE.
HEM CHANDRA SARKAR
CHAS. TRAVERS.
C. L. BRIGGS.
GORDON COOPER.
G. A. FERGUSON.
LYMAN M. GREENMAN.
EMELINE HARRINGTON
E. E. JENKINS.
A. HERMANN THOMAS.
F. HEMING VAUGHAN.
P. E. RICHARDS.
JOHN EWART.
R. P. FARLEY.
EDGAR LOCKETT.
J. B. MORTON BARNES.
J. WALTER COCK.
HENRY DAWTREY.
FRED HANKINSON.
HARRIET M. JOHNSON.
J. ISLAN JONES.
GERTUD VON PETZOLD.
VITHALRAMAJISHINDE
Z. TOYOSAKI.
J. PARK DAVIES.
ARTHUR GOLLAND.
ALBERT THORNHILL.
C. M. WRIGHT.

Professor UPTON, in rising to acknowledge the presentation, was received with the utmost warmth, the whole company rising amid the heartiest applause. He spoke with much feeling of the kindness he had received, and gratefully acknowledged how much he had learnt from his old students. They could not have offered him a more welcome gift. The use of the Encyclopædia would be a constant happy reminder of the givers.

The next session, as the Principal announced, begins on Saturday, October 17, and on Monday afternoon, the 19th, the public lecture at the opening of the session is to be given by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., who then takes up his duties as Professor of Philosophy, in succession to Mr. Upton. Among the new students will be Mr. V. A. Sukhtankar, of Poona, the Brahmo student from India, and Mr. T. Yoshimoto, from Japan.

THE ANGELUS. (Millet.)

THE evening's iridescent light floods all—
The sky, the far bell-tower, the cloud, the clod:
In loveliness sweet blessings fall as fall
The silent dews, and man draws nigh to God.

Lo! Heaven its jewelled gate wide open flings,
And on the startled air floats down to us
Healing from some great angel's brooding wings—
The balm of prayer! Thy gift, sweet Angelus!

E. L. H. THOMAS.

ERRATA.—In last week's note (p. 426) on the "Emerson" Bookman, for the last four lines, instead of the absurdity there printed, read, "Mr. Walter Lewin contributes a valuable centenary article, and Dr. Edward Emerson also writes concerning his father, with some delightful touches of personal reminiscence."

INTO last week's advertisement of Willaston School a printers' error crept, which struck at the foundation principle of the School. We will not aggravate the offence by repeating it here, but apologise to the managers for any trouble the error may have caused them, and ask any who may not know it to note that Willaston is an Unsectarian First Grade Public School.

REPORTS of Carmarthen College, the Home Missionary College, the Missionary Conference, and the Eastern Union Meetings, we hope to find room for next week.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the send.r.]

"HOLY COMMUNION."

SIR,—I do not myself feel the force of Mr. Street's argument, and I regret this the more because I am grateful to him for putting in a pointed and serious way a question which most of us, I fear, either treat very lightly, or more lightly ignore.

Mr. Street contends that the Communion Service, as we have it now, is hinderd by its material symbols, and in its symbolism he even sees some of the dangers of idolatry. May I ask him to say how the injunction, "Do this," is to be obeyed without the use of outward act and material object? The Lord's Supper is, as its name implies, a meal—the "common meal" of the Christian family—and to its repetition of the very movements, and its presentation of the very elements, of the meal which it commemorates, it owes its preservation through nineteen centuries of time. If it had been idealised into a memory, it would long ago have ceased as a memorial. It is its association with habits of bodily life that has saved it.

To take wider ground, why this jealous separation of the spiritual from the material? Is it not rather a relic of that exaggerated dualism out of which both science and religion have long been leading us? And where is the line to be drawn in the use of material symbolism? In social worship it is only by material symbols that we can communicate with each other, and realise our spiritual fellowship. Only on this ground can we defend such a material thing as instrumental music. Is a white flower on the Communion table less material than grains of wheat, and the juice of the grape? Devotional thought itself is compelled to clothe itself in symbolical language, and even to think of the Bread of Life is to call up an image of the material loaf. Material symbolism is surely only a more concrete form of figurative speech, and idolatrous use of it is the last error into which we are likely to fall.

There are, I venture to think, stronger objections to the traditional observance, which might have been urged, if objections were required. The express command, "Do this in remembrance of me," as it appears in the Third Gospel, is thought by many to be an early interpolation.* Moreover, in modern life the acts of eating and drinking have lost the dignified associations with which they were once connected, when they were in themselves almost a sacred rite, and were regarded as the fittest and most solemn signs and pledges of friendship and goodwill. If, then, in spite of ourselves, our modes of fellowship have changed, we might be justified in allowing that which no longer served its purpose to pass away.

* Its appearance in Cor. xii, 24 is accompanied by a statement from the Apostle that he had received it, not by tradition, but by direct revelation.

And yet unchristian exclusiveness in eating and drinking still marks the line of social cleavage. Practical Christianity depends very much on what you are prepared to "do" in this matter of meals. There is no charity in worshipping under one roof, but a great deal in sitting at the same table. "He eateth with publicans and sinners." He who felt the sting of this reproach may have resolved that Christian love should afterwards find in this same act of eating its severest test. Certainly the one loaf and the one cup for all, and on the same terms, has been since then an unbroken protest against social inequality, an unflinching encouragement of socialastic sentiment and aim.

If this thing is to be left undone amongst us, I would say let it be brought to an end consciously and advisedly. Here is a social ordinance which, because it is social, concerns primarily the society which has received it, and nominally retains it. Let a congregation collectively lay it aside, or collectively carry it out. To let it hang on as a survival, perishing with neglect, is more dishonouring than deliberate disuse. In relation to our congregational life this ordinance has become a travesty, and the earnestness of the few who try to maintain it cannot restore the reality which only congregational use can revive. It is very easy to draw imaginary descriptions of a better way. The things we are able to do once or twice in moments of exceptional fervour cannot be substantially repeated, and, for public worship, that which is to be recurrent must be that which will bear repetition. Those who pen these descriptions in phamphlet or novel, do much to dishearten the few who try to be faithful to ancient use, whilst they quite fail to say definitely and intelligibly what it is that they would put in its place.

E. P. BARROW.

RELIGIOUS TESTS FOR MANAGERS OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

SIR,—I observe in your issue of the 27th inst., the reply of Mr. Mundella to my strictures on the speech that he made at the late Annual Business Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. I can assure him that I was not annoyed that he did not reply at the time to what I said at that meeting. I was surprised that he did not do so, but this is now explained by his frank admission that he was not aware of what he had himself said until he saw the report in your columns. I am obliged to him for his apology, but there is no need of such to me; the apology was due to any who, being unacquainted with the facts, might be led away by his error. I must confess that in his speech in seconding the Education resolution before the meeting, I should have supposed that he mas "talking about the Education Act," but, of course, I had no reason to imagine that he was "thinking of the Bridport Town Council," with whose existence he might quite possibly have been unacquainted before my allusion to it. With regard to the complaint that he made, I understood it to be against the Act, which enacts, but only with regard to foundation managers, that such managers shall be "appointed under the provisions of the trust deed of the school;" but however much one may deplore the stringency of the tests, where such exist, with regard to these managers, yet the fact remains that the Act lays down no test for the other managers, but leaves the local authorities absolutely free to choose whom they please as such without regard to belief, and in contravention if they choose, as was done in my own case, of the provisions of the trust deeds.

WM. COLFOX.

Westmead, near Bridport.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

SIR,—It will be of interest to your readers to hear that since the printing of the Report of this Society, a "Friend of the Society" has generously given a donation of £50 to clear off the deficit. May I take this opportunity of mentioning that the Committee has recently been obliged to increase several of its grants, and that the income of the Society from subscriptions is altogether inadequate to meet the calls upon its funds. I shall be very grateful for any new or increased subscriptions.

THOMAS H. TERRY, Hon. Treasurer.
89, Tierney-road, Streatham Hill, S.W.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

SIR,—We are directed by the Assembly to announce, with your kind permission, that the following have been elected as the General Committee for the enusing year:—

Rev. T. B. EVANS, Mr. J. R. BEARD.
Rev. C. PEACH. [M.A. Mr. H. P. GREG.
Rev. C. ROPER, B.A. Mr. P. LEIGH.
Rev. W. R. SHANKS. Mr. D. A. LITTLE.
Rev. T. P. SPEDDING. Mr. H. RAWSON.
Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL. Mr. R. ROBINSON.
Rev. C. J. STREET, M.A. Mr. G. W. R. WOOD.
Rev. J. J. WRIGHT. Mr. S. B. WORTHINGTON

Thanking you for allowing us the use of your columns for the purpose of this announcement.

DENDY AGATE, President.
R. TRAVERS HERFORD, Secretary.
June 23, 1903.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION: COUNTRY HOME.

SIR,—May I, through your paper, inform those who are interested in the Blackfriars Mission that the country home in connection with it has again been open since Whitsuntide, at the same place on Mitcham Common as last year, and that contributions towards it will be thankfully received? The visitors greatly enjoy the fresh air and fine views, and no better situation for providing a thorough change from town life could well be found.

SARAH E. MARTINEAU,
Hon. Treasurer.
4, South Road, Clapham Park, S.W.,
July 1, 1903.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following: A.B.; J.J.B.; R.B.B.; P.P.; C.R.; J.R.; L.E.S.; J.E.H.T.; A.H.W.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Blackley (Presentation).—At the Unitarian Chapel, on Sunday evening, June 14, a presentation of a timepiece and a pair of flower vases was made to Mr. Wm. Duncan, late chapel secretary, in appreciation of his services during the last twelve years. Mr. Thos. Knott, in making the presentation on behalf of the subscribers, spoke in feeling terms of the good fellowship that had always existed between Mr. Duncan and those who had the pleasure of working with him for so many years in connection with chapel affairs, and said that though they had lost his services as secretary, he would still take an active part as a member of the chapel committee. Mr. Duncan suitably responded, and the proceedings terminated.

Denton (Appointment).—The Rev. Henry Rawlings, M.A., of York, has accepted the invitation of the Denton congregation to become one of their ministers.

Gateshead.—On Sunday, June 28, the anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. John Page Hopps. The church was well filled by the morning congregation, and the evening service was held in the Co-operative Hall, where a still larger congregation assembled. On Monday, there was a public tea meeting, followed by a social gathering, and both were well attended. The speakers were Revs. Francis Wood, of Sunderland, and J. Lonsdale Dowson, who is on a visit from America. The secretary of the church presided. Music was provided by Mr. Fred Sutcliffe and the Smith quartette party. The ladies' committee and officers worked hard, and success crowned their efforts.

Liverpool: Ullet-road.—On the occasion of the monthly afternoon service, on Sunday, June 28, Mr. James Burton, M.A., occupied the pulpit, and delivered an eloquent address to a large congregation of scholars, workers, and friends, who had met to take leave of him, before his taking up the work of the ministry at Poole. Immediately after the service, a largely attended meeting was held in the Church Hall, for the purpose of presenting Mr. Burton with a well-bound copy of the "Eneyclopædia Biblica," and "Dr. Martineau's Life and Letters," subscribed by members, workers, and friends of the Sunday-school. The chair was taken by Mr. W. H. Thomas (superintendent), who was supported by members of the council and congregation. In making the presentation the chairman referred in feeling terms to their appreciation of the long and devoted service which Mr. Burton had rendered the congregation during his membership of nearly thirty years. He said that as regards the quality and success of Mr. Burton's work, particularly amongst young men and women, it was true to say that that work was only second to the work of the pulpit itself. In fact Mr. Burton had been their lay minister. The testimonial which they asked him to accept was intended as a mark of their love and esteem for him personally, of their high appreciation of the good work he had done, and of their best wishes for his continued happiness and success. Mr. C. Sydney Jones, as representing the chairman of the council who was unable to be bepresent, desired to be associatedwith the Sunday-school in doing honour to Mr. Burton, whose departure would leave a void which would be difficult to fill. Mr. Burton made grateful acknowledgment of the gift.

London (Bell-street).—Three very interesting flower services were held at the Domestic Mission on Sunday. Beautiful flowers were sent, and were artistically arranged by active workers at the mission. In the evening, the choir gave an excellent rendering of the anthem, "Seek ye the Lord" (Hague Kinsey's setting). The plants and best cut-flowers were subsequently sent to the neighbouring children's Hospital on Paddington Green.

London (Rhyl-street).—The first open-air service was held on Sunday, June 28, after the usual service indoors, which was somewhat shortened. The open-air service consisted of two hymns to open with, an address of fifteen minutes, and two hymns to close with. A sheet of beautiful hymns, set to popular tunes, has been specially prepared for this work. Although it cannot be said very many people gathered round, it was generally felt that the service was successful for a beginning. Once it is known that such a service is being held and that the teaching is different from that of the usual open-air service, good results are looked for. The address by Mr. Wilson was on, "Why this is not a Christian country." The reasons were two, namely, because Christianity had been badly presented to the people, it was not taught as Christ himself had taught it, but something very different, hence the turning of many away from all interest in moral and religious realities. Another reason was in the kind of life to which Christianity calls us, namely, a life of love and goodness, and that, owing to the fact of our inheritance from the animals, was a difficult thing; here it was hard to be a Christian; but surely if men once accepted the hopeful and inspiring faith that God was their Father, and that they had divine possibilities within them, being a Christian would not be found to be such a hard thing; but even if hard, it was hard for a good purpose, to bless, to discipline, to raise man to the level of the angels, nay, to the level of God Himself.

London: Wandsworth (Presentation).—On Sunday, June 28, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., completed twenty years of ministry at the Unitarian Christian Church, having entered on the charge of the newly formed congregation on leaving Manchester New College in the summer of 1883. On Monday evening, a congregational soirée was held in the church, when there was a very full attendance of members and friends, and the occasion was marked by a presentation of gifts from the congregation to Mr. and Mrs. Tarrant. In the course of the evening the chair was taken by Mr. A. W. Biggs, who, in introducing the proceedings, said that as soon as the suggestion was made of a presentation to Mr. Tarrant on the completion of his twenty years of ministry, it was very warmly taken up by the congregation, and he felt sure that the knowledge of that fact would be more to Mr. Tarrant even than the gifts themselves. They had hoped to be able to hold that meeting on July 2, which was Mr. Tarrant's birthday, and also the anniversary of his wedding day; they had got as near to the day as possible, and on behalf of the congregation he offered to Mr. and Mrs. Tarrant their most cordial good wishes. He then made the presentation, which consisted of a gold watch for Mr. Tarrant, a diamond ring for Mrs. Tarrant, an album containing the names of the contributors appended to an address, acknowledging in grateful and affectionate terms the debt of the congregation to their minister, and a cheque for the remainder of the amount contributed. Brief speeches were then made by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, who expressed the sympathy of Mr. Tarrant's brother ministers in London, the Rev. V. D. Davis, who spoke both as a minister and a member of the congregation, and Mr. H. B. Lawford, secretary of the congregation, who mentioned that two friends whom they had hoped to see that evening, Mr. David Martineau and Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., had written to say how much they regretted their enforced absence, and how warmly they participated in the congratulations and good wishes of that occasion. Mr. Tarrant, acknowledging the gifts on his own and his wife's behalf, spoke with much feeling of the kindness that had been shown to them, and of the very happy relations which from the first had subsisted between them and the congregation. He gave an affectionate pledge that so long as the congregation wished it, it was his wish that their union should remain unbroken. At the conclusion of the speeches musical items were contributed by several friends, adding to the pleasure of a very delightful evening.

North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association.—The quarterly conference was held at Kendal on Saturday, June 27. Unfortunately, the weather was wet, and the attendance was small. Delegates and friends from Kendal, Preston, and Southshore (Blackpool) were present. The day was spent in visiting Kendal Museum, the Abbot Hall exhibition, and the parish church. After the meeting of delegates in the evening, the Kendal friends gave an admirable concert, which was much appreciated.

The Assembly of West of England Presbyterian Divines met at George's Meeting, Exeter, on Wednesday, June 17. The Rev. Jeffery Worthington, B.A., was elected Moderator. The Rev. T. W. Chignell presided at the dinner at the Royal Clarence, in Cathedral-square.

NEW RICHES FROM OLD MINES.

Who would value raw grains if all the arts of milling and preparing them were lost?

Similarly, nuts (which are foods of enormous value) have been unappreciated because the art of preparing them has been neglected.

HUGH MAPLETON, Colonial House, Ardwick, Manchester, is now making from nuts, rich, nourishing, digestible foods. Write to-day for descriptive price lists.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, July 5.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton. Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M., Mr. J. A. WILKES.

Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 A.M., Boys' Own Brigade Service, "The Value of Character," and 7 P.M., Concluding Service of Mr. Allen's Ministry at Stamford-street.

Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M and 7 P.M., Rev. F. W. STANLEY.

Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. R. H. U. BLOOR.

Deptford, Church-street, 11.15, A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. J. MARCHANT.

Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON, 12 A.M. Communion, 3.15 P.M. Floral Service.

Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.

Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.,

Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. Gow, B.A.

Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.

Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. E. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS.

Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.

Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.

Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.

Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. S. PERRIS, M.A.

Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Rev. JOHN ELLIS.

Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. G. CARTER.

Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.

Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. S. FARRINGTON.

Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. C. A. GINEVER.

Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.

Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M., Mr. J. C. PAIN, and 6.30 P.M., Mr. E. WILKES SMITH.

Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, Easthill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. G. PRICE.

Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Dr. MUMMERY.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M; Rev. J. M'DOWELL.

BEDFORD, Library (side room), 11.15 P.M., Rev. ROWLAND HILL.

BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.

BLACKPOOL, Unitarian Church, Masonic Hall, South Shore, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. C. C. COE.
BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. M. LIVENS.
BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET.
CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., J. REMINGTON WILSON, M.A.
DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.
GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. GARDNER PRESTON.
HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30, Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. HARGROVE, M.A.
LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. ERNEST PARRY.
LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. J. JUPP.
LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A.
NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. E. PIKE.
OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. C. B. UPTON, B.A., B.Sc.
PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.
PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 P.M., Mr. THOMAS BOND.
SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. OTTWELL BINNS.
SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.
SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.
SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.
STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church, Tyler-street, 7 P.M., Rev. ARTHUR RYLAND.
TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.
WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M., Mr. D. DELTA EVANS.

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH.
SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F. Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS.

SOUTH-PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY
SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.—July 6, at 11.15 A.M., REV. JOHN M. ROBERTSON, "Lord Kelvin on Providence."

ETHICAL RELIGION SOCIETY, STEINWAY HALL, PORTMAN SQ., W.—July 6, at 11.15 A.M., Dr. WASHINGTON SULLIVAN, "Some Moral Elements Overlooked by Jesus."

PULPIT SUPPLY.—Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY, 28, Downshire-hill, Hampstead, N.W.

SUPPLY.—Rev. E. S. LANG BUCKLAND, 3, Guildford Park-road, Guildford.

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.
Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

In Cloth, Price 1s.; Stout Paper, 6d.

THE HUNGARIAN UNITARIANS.

Some Account of their Origin, Vicissitudes, and Present Condition.

Compiled from various sources by M. LUCY TAGART.

"Miss Tagart has done well to collect a number of most interesting papers and sketches bearing upon the history and the existing state of our Unitarian brethren in Hungary and Transylvania. . . . The booklet excites and keeps attention from beginning to end."—Christian Life.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING OFFICE, 5, Furnival-street, Holborn, E.C.

BIRTH.

WILSON.—At 5, Claremont-road, Cricklewood, London, N.W., on Saturday, June 27th, the wife of the Rev. William Wilson, of Rhyl-street Domestic Mission, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

BASS—DEARDEN.—On June 24th, at Bank-street Chapel, Bury, by Rev. J. C. Odgers, B.A., James Wason Bass, Minister of Chesham Unitarian Congregation, Bury, to Henrietta, second daughter of Thomas Dearden, of Bury.

WINTSCH—ELLIS.—On July 1st, at Chapel-lane Chapel, Bradford, by the Rev. John Ellis, brother of the bride, Henry Martin Wintsch to Frances Sarah Ellis.

DEATHS.

BACHE.—On Sunday, 28th June, at Montreux, aged 57, after five days' illness from liver complaint, Constance, youngest child of the late Rev. Samuel Bache, of Edgbaston, Birmingham, and sister of the late "Brother Musicians," Francis Edward and Walter Bache. Funeral at Montreux, Tuesday, 30th June.

COOPER.—On June 29th, at her residence, 20, Newmarket Road, Norwich, Maria Cooper, the last surviving daughter of the late David Cooper, of Norwich, in her 82nd year.

DALBY.—On June 25th, at Colwyn Bay, in her 34th year, Mary Jane, the beloved wife of George Dalby, of 22, Devonshire-road, Birkenhead. Friends please accept this the only intimation.

Schools, etc.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN,
NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON
(Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

WILLASTON SCHOOL,
NANTWICH.
AN UNSECTARIAN FIRST GRADE PUBLIC SCHOOL.

HEADMASTER.—GUY LEWIS, M.A.

Opened September, 1900. Foundation Scholarships.
Next Entrance Examination, July 15th.

LIDGETT PARK SCHOOL for GIRLS.
North Park Avenue, Roundhay, LEEDS.

Principals, Miss SHUTE, B.A., and Miss BLOK (Training College, Leyden).

House healthily situated. Boarders taken.

WAVERLEY SCHOOL, 24, HAMILTON ROAD, SHERWOOD RISE, NOTTINGHAM.

PREPARATORY TO THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
HEAD MASTER, Mr. H. T. FACON, B.A.(Lond.).
Prospectus on application. BOARDERS received. Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, Essex House, Campden-hill, W.

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
14 & 15, SOUTH MARINE TERRACE, ABERYSTWYTH.

PRINCIPAL ... MRS. MARLES-THOMAS.

This School is splendidly situated in one of the healthiest parts of Wales, overlooking Cardigan Bay, and close to excellent golf links. Pupils have passed the London and Welsh Matriculation; Cambridge Higher Local; Senior and Junior Cambridge Locals, besides the usual Theoretical and Practical Music Examinations. Scholarships have also been obtained at the Welsh University Colleges.

Gymnasium, Swimming, and excellent Hockey Club.

READY JULY 1, Royal 8vo., 216 Pp.

NUMBER FOUR OF

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL

A Quarterly Review of Religion, Theology, and Philosophy.

Price 2s. 6d. net. 10s. per annum, post free.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS OF NUMBER FOUR.

The Character of Jesus Christ, by Rev. Francis G. Peabody, D.D., Plummer Professor of Christian Morals in Harvard University. Are Indian Missions a Failure? By Rev. William Miller, C.I.E., D.D., LL.D., Principal of the Madras Christian College, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Madras. The Philosophy of Authority in Religion, by Wilfred Ward. Do we Believe in the Reformation? by Rev. W. F. Cobb, D.D., Rector of St. Ethelburga's, London. The Liberal Catholic Movement in England, by Philip Sydney. The Growing Reluctance of Able Men to take Orders, by P. S. Burrell, M.A. Physical Law and Life, by J. H. Poynting, Sc.D., F.R.S., Professor of Physics in the University of Birmingham. Pressing Need of Old Testament Study, by the Rev. Canon T. K. Cheyne, D.D. Zoroastrianism and Primitive Christianity, by Rev James Moffatt, D.D. The Purpose of Eusebius, by Walter R Cassels. Discussions by Rev. Prof. Alan Menzies, R. Hoernle, Rev. G. Galloway, Rev. Prof. W. B. Smith, Miss E. E. C. Jones, and G. T. Deas. A Number of Signed Reviews, and also a Bibliography of Recent Books and Articles in Theological and Philosophical Periodicals.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-st., London, W.C., and 7, Broad-st., Oxford.

Reckitt's PARIS BLUE.
THE BEST IS THE CHEAPEST.

Board and Residence.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged.—Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

BOURNEMOUTH.—"ARNEWOOD." Occupies a splendid position at the corner of West Cliff Road, and affords all requirements for Health, Comfort or Convenience. Sea views; close to the Winter Garden Pavilion, Unitarian Church, pier and promenade. Terms, &c., on application to Manageress.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Most comfortable private BOARDING-HOUSE; close to sea; sheltered among the pines; south aspect. Billiard-room (full-sized table). Terms moderate.—Address, Miss CHALDECOTT, Stirling House, Manor-road.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

NEWQUAY, CORNWALL.—Hazell Mount, Bay View Terrace. Sea and country view. APARTMENTS.—Mrs. VICKERS.

KINGSCOTE, WOKINGHAM.—To be Let, furnished, from Michaelmas, for a year or so, 3 Sitting Rooms, 9 Bed and Dressing Rooms, 3 Acres of Ground. Rent from 3 to 6 guineas per week.

SUSSEX.—To Let, from the fourth week in July, for two months, a neatly furnished Cottage, in a quiet locality. Good outlook; dining, drawing, three bedrooms, bath (h. & c.) Would suit students or others seeking health and quiet. Terms 2½ guineas per week.—Apply, Miss H., The Hut, Hayward's Heath.

TO LET, cheap, for August, Minister's House, nine rooms, bath-room, garden. Beautiful country, two hours from sea for cyclist. Supply duty might be arranged.—EDWARD PARRY, Ilminster, Somerset.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH, DEVONSHIRE.

An ALL-THE-YEAR-ROUND HOLIDAY and HEALTH RESORT for YOUNG LADIES or SCHOOL GIRLS.

Sea and Moorland. Home comforts. Walks, games, excursions, sketching, music, bathing, picnics, &c.

Weekly terms. Prospectus and Guide Book from THE PROPRIETOR.

Woman's Delight!

THE "DALLI" BOX IRON.

The "Dalli" is the best Box Iron, doing away with the worries of the old system. No gas, no fire, no smell. Hot in a few minutes, and remains hot. No changes of irons. Self-heating with smokeless fuel. Can be used anywhere without interruption, even out of doors, doing double the work in half the time. More economical than any other iron. Price of the "Dalli" is 6-. Price of the "Dalli" Fuel is 1 9 per box of 128 Blocks. To be had of all Ironmongers. If any difficulty apply to— The Dalli Smokeless Fuel Co., 27, Milton St., London, E.C.

Beware of worthless imitations.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17, Mincing-lane, E.C.
Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.
F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.
Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.
STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS

By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

DAILY MEDITATIONS

(Fourth Edition Revised.)

NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.

Cloth, red edges, 6d.; roan gilt, 1s.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

HOLY COMMUNION.

JUST PUBLISHED.

For OPEN BROTHERHOOD,
For the CHRISTIANITY OF JESUS,
AND
The KINGDOM OF GOD WITHIN US.

BY

H. RAWSON & Co., New Brown St., Manchester.

PRICE 2d., OR BY POST 3d.

LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE SOCIETY

FOR THE

PERMANENT CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

RESPONSE TO APPEAL.

Mrs. R. Moore, Richmond-hill	£0	10	0
Mrs. Heys, Heaton Chapel...	1	0	0
"In Memory of F. H. S.," Ilkley ...	1	0	0
Mrs. Temple, Croydon (2nd don.) ...	0	10	0
Miss M. Hall, Highbury (2nd don.) ...	1	0	0
Miss Booth, Liverpool (2nd don.) ...	10	0	0
	£14	0	0

THE PRESBYTERIAN FUND.

The Managers desire to give notice of the following Scholarships which are open to Theological Students of all denominations:—

1. Three Graduate Scholarships of £40 a year for three years, with free instruction for the B.D. degree of the University of Wales, tenable at the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen.

2. One Undergraduate Scholarship of £50, tenable at any recognised University College in the United Kingdom. Applications must be made before 20th July, 1903.

For particulars and forms of application apply to

G. HAROLD CLENNELL, Secretary.

Presbyterian Fund, 6, Great James-street, Bedford-row, London, W.C.

Situations, etc.

AS HEAD NURSE, or MATRON, or for any POSITION of TRUST. A Widow, 41, seeks re-engagement. Highly recommended from last situation, and also by Mrs. RICHARD ROSCOE and Mrs. WALLACE BRUCE.—Address Mrs. PARSONS, 16, Kemplay-road, Hampstead, N.W.

NURSE (SUPERIOR) wanted middle of July, for 3 children, 6¼, 3 years, and 5 months. Good wages.—Mrs. PHILIP ROSCOE, 82, Denning-road, Hampstead, London.

SUMMER ENGAGEMENT WANTED in an English family, by preference near Bristol, by a French young lady, musical, who would teach French and German in return for board and travelling expenses paid. Apply to JEAN REVILLE, 4, Villa de la Réunion, Paris, Auteuil.

WANTED, a situation as Ladies' Companion, age 18. Not been out before.—Apply to The Parsonage, Conigre, Trowbridge, Wilts.

FOR SUMMER VACATION.—Mutual terms. Lady, speaking French and German, seeks light work. Good references.—Address, WASA, INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

GOVERNESS.—Lady recommends young Lady, L.R.A.M., bronze and silver medallist, and teacher's certificate R.A.M.; has also a thorough knowledge of French and German languages, acquired abroad; would take situation as resident in private family or good school, either England or Colonies. Excellent testimonials. Open to holiday engagement.—Reference, Miss E. HOLT, 36, Alexandra Drive, Liverpool, S.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses.—For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOINSON, Pier-street.

MICROSCOPES, second-hand, excellent condition, from one-third original cost. Slides, great variety, best makers, from 3s. per doz. Write for particulars, THE NEW AGE PRESS, 8, John-street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

FREDK. LONG & SON,

AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,

4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2½% repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES

Purchased and sold for customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD, 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.:— Saturday, July 4, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3185. NEW SERIES, No. 289.] LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 11, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 457
ARTICLES—
The Public and Publicans 460
Public Worship: Is it a Duty? 461
In Praise of Holland 465
LITERATURE—
Articles in the Reviews 458
Charles Darwin 459
OBITUARY—
Rev. T. B. Broadrick 462
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 463
POETRY—
The Ladybird 463
LEADERS—
The International 464
The "Hibbert Journal" 464
MEETINGS—
Carmarthen College 467
The Eastern Union 467
Unitarian Home Missionary College .. 468
The Missionary Conference 468
CORRESPONDENCE—
Sustentation Fund 461
Sunday Schools at Holiday Resorts .. 462
Sir Michael Foster and Vivisection .. 462
International Meetings at Amsterdam .. 466
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 479
ADVERTISEMENTS 471

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

TWO more of Mr. Carpenter's delightful Italian articles we still have in store. One on "The Fountain at Perugia," we hope to publish next week, and in the following week another on "The Etruscan Tombs."

IT is a great satisfaction to record the successful visit of the President of the French Republic to our English capital. Moments of tension there will doubtless be in Anglo-French relations in the future, as in the past. But the underlying good-will which was, after all, the deciding factor, preventing war over Siam or Fashoda, must be present in reserve henceforth in far greater force as the result of the interchange of courtesies between the two nations. Nothing could have been happier than the ground chosen by the President in his speeches at the French Embassy and the Guildhall. The increased sympathy and interest felt by the one country for the other will undoubtedly tend to "the advancement of humanity." The more we know of French courtesy, "solidarity, love of work and commercial probity," the more we shall feel the superior attractions of friendship and co-operation with France over jealousy and rivalry.

IT is good, on the other hand, to know that the French Republic "cannot forget how much England has contributed to securing the triumph in the modern world of her principles of liberty, which are everywhere regarded to-day as an essential condition of social development." It is just because the regard of Republican France of necessity bases itself on our traditional love of liberty that a rapprochement with her seems fraught with welcome possibilities of a reflexive improvement in the tone of our own internal politics. We all tend, happily, when we hear a good opinion of ourselves expressed by those we esteem, to increase our endeavours towards its justification. From the mouth of M. Loubet this praise is particularly grateful. Lovers of France know him not merely as the accidental figurehead of France, but as the statesman who has guided the Third Republic through perhaps the most critical period of its history—a period during which the most desperate and insidious attack upon it has been met, to all appearances, with final and signal defeat.

THE Wesleyans have just sustained a loss that will be very widely and deeply felt in the death of Dr. Pope, ex-President of the Conference, and author of the Compendium of Theology, well known to all Methodist students. He was many years ago theological tutor at the Wesleyan College in Didsbury.

THE Passive Resistance Movement grows daily. It is easy to issue summonses for unpaid rates and to secure magisterial orders for their payment. It is easy, if a trifle unpleasant, to follow these up by distraining on the objectors' goods, provided it can be done without the public getting wind of the operation. It is when the time comes for the public sale of the goods distrained that the real difficulty begins. We do not ourselves feel the obligation to carry opposition to the support of sectarian dogmas out of the rates to the point of lawbreaking—at least, till we have tried and failed to secure the repeal of the law by constitutional means. But we do recognise and respect the loyalty to conscience which leads others to hold and to act upon a different view of their duty in this matter. For resort to physical violence at distress sales on the part of sympathisers with the movement we have no defence to offer—not even Mr. Balfour's historic plea that the limits of human endurance have been reached. But even without physical violence—and there has been less of it than the critics of the movement would have us suppose—it appears likely that popular indignation may make the sale of the goods of all the thousands of resisters a practical impossibility.

MEANWHILE there are at least two points of law raised by the resisters upon which sticklers for law and order in the matter should be as anxious as anyone to secure an authoritative decision. Can a local authority levy and recover rates in support of elementary education before the Act placing elementary education under their control has come into force? If, as seems likely on the face of it, the reply is in the negative, the rates—paid and unpaid—already levied over a very large area, will prove to have been demanded without legal authority. The second question is of scarcely less importance. May a bailiff, in making a distraint for unpaid rates, refuse tender of the portion due for other purposes than sectarian education? May he, again, as in the case of the aged Mr. Moon, refuse to take the goods tendered in satisfaction of his claim and himself select other goods, the loss of which must cause greater discomfort to the resister? These certainly are questions which the local officials, if they were wise, would themselves decide in the negative. To accentuate the martyrdom of the law-breakers without cause is gratuitously to add fuel to the fire they are seeking to stamp out.

IT is to be hoped that no national pre-occupation with questions of tariff changes and sectarian education will be allowed to interfere with an effective protest against the monstrous increase of the privileges of the liquor monopoly now proposed by the champions of the trade in Parliament. Next Friday (July 17) a National Convention, convened by the National Temperance Federation and the United Kingdom Alliance, is to be held in the Albert Hall "to protest against the excess of liquor licences, and against the creation of a vested interest therein, as proposed by Mr. Butcher's Compensation Bill and Sir W. Hart Dyke's Bill to suspend the discretionary power of the magistrates to refuse renewals of licences." The Bishop of London is to preside in the evening and Sir Wilfrid Lawson in the afternoon, and the speakers are to include Mr. Arthur Chamberlain, Lord Monkswell (Chairman of the L.C.C.), Sir Robert Reid, and the Earl and Countess of Carlisle. This is clearly a question which concerns all citizens quite apart from their views on the uses of alcohol as an item of diet. The proposal, as the conveners of the Convention point out, is to "give every holder of an annual licence a new and perpetual right of renewal unless fully compensated out of a fund designedly made so small as to check even the present rate of decrease." Such a proposal must be defeated at all costs.

MEADVILLE

WE have referred in a leading article this week to the great success of the Hibbert Journal, noting, however, at the same time that the response from our own people to its appeal has not been such as might have been expected. A marked exception to this slackness we have great pleasure in recording. One of our ministers in a large provincial town, with great enthusiasm, made it his business to bring the Hibbert Journal before the notice of his people, and thus obtained thirty-five subscribers. That is an example worthy of emulation, and not in the matter of the Hibbert Journal alone.

THE July Unitarian World reprints from the Scotsman a report of Principal Story's remarkable speech on the Confession of Faith in the Church of Scotland, concerning which, we last week published a comment by the Rev. R. B. Drummond, and also part of a scathing leader in the Scotsman of May 28, of which the following passage is a sample:—

If Dr. Story speaks truth—and the Assembly did not separate itself from him yesterday—surely the cup of the Church's iniquity is full and overflowing. It is all very well to denounce the Confession as a creed outworn, and as a fetter on the liberty of the ministers. Let the ministers take care of themselves. They know very well how to exercise their liberty. They subscribe the Confession of Faith with mental reservations and qualifications, and believe no more of it than they like. That is their position. Dr. Scott is satisfied with it, though he cannot understand—nor can we—how Dr. Story got into the Chair of Church History over the barrier of the Confession. The Rev. James Murray, of Kilmalcolm, "maintains strongly that the honesty of their position can be thoroughly defended, but," he adds, "only by arguments too fine and subtle to appeal to the ordinary intelligence." The man in the street, he says, will go on saying that they profess to believe what they do not believe. That is quite true, and the man in the street, whether his face or his back is to the Church, has his own opinion of them. But it is not the position of the ministers, or their wrigglings of conscience, or the sophistries by which they benumb their honest instincts that chiefly concern the people. It is the fact that the Church and these very ministers who want liberty to disbelieve the creed of the Confession persist in teaching that creed to the children. The doctrines denounced by Principal Story are set forth in all their nakedness in the Shorter Catechism, which the young people of our Presbyterian Churches are made to learn by heart in the Sunday-school and in many, probably most, of our Board schools. It is true that the Catechism is falling somewhat into neglect and disuse. But no thanks to the clergy for that. We do not remember hearing Principal Story denounce the teaching of the Shorter Catechism to children. He may have done it, but he certainly has not made any such noise about the atrocity of teaching to the children the doctrines he thinks so horrible as he makes about the ethical perplexity of his own position as a subscriber to the Confession of Faith.

OF "Emerson" sermons there has naturally been an abundant harvest. Dr. M. J. Savage's sermon on "Emerson the Preacher" is published in the Messiah Pulpit of May 29. The July Seed Sower has an address by the Rev. Joseph Wood on "Emerson the Man," and the "Open Brotherhood" has printed the Rev. C. J. Street's sermon on "Emerson: Seer, Heretic, Hero" published by H. Rawson and Co., Manchester, 2d.) The Christian Register of June 18, published Professor William James's address at the Concord celebration on May 25, on "Emerson as the Champion of the Individual," from which we quote these sentences:—

What gave a flavour so matchless to Emerson's individuality was, even more than his rich mental gifts, their singularly harmonious combination. Rarely has a man so accurately known the limits of his genius or so unfailingly kept within them. "Stand by your order," he used to say to youthful students; and perhaps the paramount impression one gets of his life is of his loyalty to his own one personal type and mission. The type was that of what he liked to call the scholar, the perceiver of pure truth; and the mission was that of the reporter in worthy form of each conception. . . . This duty of spiritual seeing and reporting determined the who trend of his life.

. . . . . .

The matchless eloquence with which Emerson proclaimed the sovereignty of the living individual electrified and emancipated his generation, and this bugle-blast will doubtless be regarded by all future critics as the kernel of his message. The present man is the aboriginal reality, the institution is derivative, and the past man is irrelevant and obliterate for present issues. Emerson's belief that the individual must in reason be adequate to the vocation for which the spirit of the world has called him into being is the source of those sublime pages, hearteners and sustainers of our youth, in which he urges his hearers to be incorruptedly true to their own private conscience.

IT is interesting to hear from Mr. Balfour that the Government have not altered their views as to the desirability of a diminution of Naval Armaments by agreement among the Powers. But the comfort to be derived from the statement is sadly qualified by his refusal to admit the wisdom of this country taking the initiative in re-opening the question. It is scarcely to be denied that since the failure of the Tsar's proposals in 1889, Britain has taken the lead in the race in shipbuilding, a race in which other countries have been left far behind; and that very fact surely throws upon us the onus of being the first to call a halt in the mad onrush. The contention that the other fleets of the world could not claim to be, like ours, mainly of a defensive character, is scarcely diplomatic, even if true. Certainly it does not help the cause of disarmament.

THE Rev. J. A. Mitchell, B.A., Principal of the Nottingham Theological Institute, has been unanimously nominated by the General Committee of the Congregational Union to succeed the Rev. W. J. Woods as secretary of the Union. The election is to take place at the autumn meeting of the Union, at Bournemouth, in October.

THE June number of the Mill Hill Pulpit contained a sermon for Trinity Sunday. This month the subject is "The Real Presence," in which the doctrine of the Divine Immanence, in its more universal spiritual sense, as held by Unitarians, is contrasted with the Roman Catholic doctrine celebrated in the feast of Corpus Christi.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THIS month's reviews are naturally largely occupied with Mr. Chamberlain's proposed fiscal revolution and with the Servian murders. Reason and sarcasm both are powerfully directed against the proposal to tax the people's food and the prospect of a war of tariffs. Not the least powerful is Viscount Goschen's article in the Monthly; most amusing is the editorial article in the same review on "Gulliver's Last Voyage." There also we find another of Dr. A. N. Jannaris's eccentricities of New Testament criticism, who considers that he has established beyond a doubt that the Theophilos of the introduction to St. Luke is the apostle John, and that the third Gospel was written after the fourth, apparently to comfort the aged apostle with the knowledge that others also were handing down the true story of the Master. The preceding article, "Ex Oriente," gives a vivid description of the meeting of an intelligent American Christian with a follower of Beha Ullah (who died at Acre in 1892), the successor of the Persian Bab. Students of the philosophy of religion should attend to the discussions of "The Veil of the Temple," though it will be more satisfactory to do this when they can be read as a whole in book form.

"The Survival of the Soul" is the subject of a very timely article by Professor Muirhead in the Contemporary, in appreciation, but also with weighty criticism of the late F. W. H. Myers's monumental work on "Human Personality, and its Survival of Bodily Death." Full recognition is given to the value of the investigations of psychical research, but a very wholesome warning is added against the danger of giving way to what is after all a species of attenuated materialism, in seeking to establish faith in the life after death on the supposed communications of disembodied spirits. The distinction drawn between the kind of evidence adduced in that connection, and the inward conviction of the spiritual reality of life, is particularly noteworthy. Two other articles of special interest in the Contemporary are Mrs. Russell's "Four Days in a Factory," and Captain Fletcher-Vane's "Fruits of the War in South Africa." The writer has intimate knowledge of the subject. He fought through the war on the British side, and thus pleads with the more weight for a truer appreciation of the Dutch, and for justice for sufferers under martial law in Cape Colony.

In the Nineteenth Century and After Sir Oliver Lodge writes on "Radium," one of the latest wonders of science. There are valuable articles on "Germany and the Danes of North Schleswig," and on "Constitutional Government in Hungary." Mr. George Shann points to the parallels between "St. Luke and Buddhism," thinking it extremely likely that Buddhist missionaries had been active in Syria, and strongly influenced the views of the writer of the Gospel.

The World's Work is a special summer number, largely devoted to motor-cars and camping out, but the frontispiece is an admirable portrait of President Loubet. "Life in the Country on Limited Means," "In Kew Gardens," and "Fruit and Flowers in Guernsey," are three of the most attractive articles.

LITERATURE.

CHARLES DARWIN.*

THESE volumes, it need hardly be said, are much more than a collection of letters. To the student they form not only a record of the formation of great theories, but an appendix to the life-work of Darwin, rendered encyclopædic by an admirable index of some hundred and twenty columns. To have made such a notable addition to the permanent literature of science is much. But the volumes are even more than this. To the layman, who has neither wish nor ability to enter into the intricate details of dimorphism and sterility, their fascination and value consist in the revelation they make of a personality as genial and lovable as it was great.

In the preface to the "Life" (1887), Mr. Francis Darwin wrote that his choice of letters was determined by the wish to illustrate his father's personal character. How admirably that choice succeeded in its purpose has long been known, but not until the publication of the present volumes have we understood the immense difficulty of the choice. For, of the 782 additional letters now published —only a few of which are from other correspondents — there is scarcely one that does not contribute something fresh to our knowledge of the man, of his simple nature, his habitual considerateness, and his uniformly high aim. It is hard to say whether these qualities are more apparent in letters to old and tried friends like Hooker and Huxley, or in those to strangers, to young and unknown naturalists and to critics: In all alike we see the same candour, the same shrinking from giving trouble, and gratitude for the smallest services rendered, that so attached the servants at Down to their master, the same gleams of playfulness that kept sweet and human a life devoted to the most abstruse research.

A stranger to Darwin's habitual tone would say that his modesty bordered on affectation. Here, for example, in a letter to Mr. Rivers, of Sawbridgeworth, in 1866 (seven years after the publication of the "Origin," is a sample :—

> I do not know whether you will forgive a stranger addressing you. My name may possibly be known to you. I am now writing a book on the variation of the animals and plants under domestication, and there is one little piece of information which it is more likely you can give me than any man in the world if you can spare half an hour from your professional labours and will be so kind . . . (I., 251.)

The tone is that of a first-year student to a savant. Again, Mr. J. Scott writes in criticism of the work on Orchids, and the reply may be taken as a fair specimen of Darwin's attitude towards criticism :—

> I thank you most sincerely for your kindness and for your very interesting letter. Your fact has surprised me greatly, and alarmed me not a little, for if I am in error about Acropera I may be about Catasetum. . . . Botany is a new subject to me (!) . . . I hope you will continue your very interesting observations. (II., 307.)

* "More Letters of Charles Darwin : A Record of his Work in a Series of hitherto Unpublished Letters." Edited by Francis Darwin, Fellow of Christ's College, and A. C. Stewart, Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. In two volumes. Illustrated. John Murray. 1903. 32s. net.

These extracts will doubtless seem absurdly simple compared with the vast wealth of wisdom the volumes contain. To us they have a significance that can scarcely be overrated. Couple with them the following sentence, written by R. H. Hutton within a few days of Darwin's death : "No scientific man of our century has covered so large a field of research, has surveyed it with so fair, so wide, so patient, as well as so acute an insight, has paid so careful an attention to all the objections to which his own theories are exposed, and exhibited so rare a candour in withdrawing anything in his conclusions, which, on a subsequent investigation, he has discovered to be ill-founded." (Spectator, April 22, 1882.) Without assuming metaphysical distinctions we would say that the marvellous intellect of Darwin drew its life-sap from moral depths even more profound than the vintage was rich and abundant. Kant's famous tribute to the stars and the moral law must find a similar response in every admirer of Charles Darwin. To eulogise such simplicity would be presumptuous. It is too profound. But it is well to bear in mind, especially to-day, that soundness of mind and greatness of heart are, at least in this eminent instance, as fruit and soil.

To enumerate all the departments through which this vivid personal interest runs is, of course, impossible here. The classification adopted by the editors is a subjective one, but chronologically the letters fall into groups according to the principal recipients of the writer's confidence. Thus we have at first the Henslow group. It was to Henslow that Darwin, while hesitating about taking "orders," fortunately owed his appointment as naturalist on the Beagle, and the letters to him during the voyage—some of them read before the Royal Society—form a fascinating supplement to the "Journal of a Voyage." They contain no hint that Darwin then doubted the immutability of species. It is when we pass into the Hooker group that we find a steady approach to the conviction now universally associated with the name of Darwin. That it should be so associated was not in any way due to Darwin, as we see on coming to the Wallace group. There is scarcely a nobler passage in the history of science than the self-abnegation of these men. In 1865 Wallace writes to Darwin :—

> I shall always maintain it (the theory of Natural Selection) to be yours and yours only. You had worked it out in details I had never thought of years before I had a ray of light on the subject, and my paper would never have convinced anybody, whereas your book has revolutionised the study of natural history.

Nothing disturbed the harmony between the co-discoverers till Wallace found it necessary to dissent from the intellectual and spiritual application of the theory, and then Darwin, annotating the former's article "With a shower of notes of exclamation," writes him :—

> If you had not told me, I should have thought your remarks on Man had been added by someone else. As you expected, I differ grievously from you, and I am sorry for it.

There is no need to describe for the general reader the literary style—if anything so artless can be called "style"—of the letters happily rendered familiar in the "Life." Were we to attempt the more difficult task of briefly expressing the intellectual impression these volumes leave upon us, we should say it is that of an almost incredible breadth of grasp; a wide-angle lens of intellectual vision enabling the seer to include all the evidence contributed on any one question by all the departments of natural science in a single survey. This was no doubt Darwin's distinctive power.

Reverting, in conclusion, to the personality in which this marvellous power developed, we gladly welcome certain passages which did not appear in the autobiographical fragment published in 1887. The first of these consists in some notes of his early years, written in 1838 (when 29), and found during the removal of his books and papers from Down. This narrative, which runs from his fourth to eleventh year, shows him a born observer and collector; its chief interest, however, consists in an amusingly candid application of his methods to his own retrospect. His earliest recollection, he tells us, was when (about four years old) sitting on his sister Caroline's knee, while she was cutting an orange, "a cow ran by the window which made me jump so that I received a bad cut, of which I bear the scar to this day." Much of what we suppose to be early memory is, no doubt, tradition told us by others. Mark, however, the characteristic observation: "I think my memory (of this) is real . . . . because I clearly remember which way the cow ran, which would not probably have been told me." Another recollection belongs to his fourth year. "I have an obscure picture of a small shop, where the owner gave me one fig, but which to my great joy turned out to be two; this fig was given me that the man might kiss the maid-servant." This, certainly, could scarcely have been oral tradition, but what faculty for observation! Here, again, is a curious bit of psychology :—

> I was in these days a very great story-teller, for the pure purpose of exciting attention and surprise. I scarcely ever went out walking without saying I had seen some strange bird. These lies I recollect vividly, not connected with shame, though some I do, but as something which, as having produced a great effect on my mind, gave pleasure like a tragedy. I recollect when I was at Mr. Case's (a Unitarian school at Shrewsbury), inventing a whole fabric to show how fond I was of speaking the truth!"

This was the boy who wrote in 1863, "Accuracy is the soul of Natural History. He who modifies a hair's-breadth will never be accurate. Any deviation from absolute accuracy is ruin!"

With one other omission from the '87 volumes, we must conclude our survey. We refer to his very beautiful tribute to his wife, who was still living when the previous memoirs were published :—

> You all know your mother, and what a good mother she has ever been to all of you. She has been my greatest blessing, and I can declare that in my whole life I have never heard her utter one word I would rather have been unsaid. She has never failed in kindest sympathy towards me, and has borne with the utmost patience my frequent complaints of ill-health and discomfort. I do not believe she has ever missed an opportunity of doing a kind action to anyone near her. I marvel at my good fortune that she, so infinitely my superior in every single moral quality, consented to be my wife. She has been my wise adviser and cheerful comforter throughout life, which without her would have been during a very long period a miserable one from ill-health. She has earned the love of every soul near her.

Higher praise cannot be accorded the work of the editors than by saying that the volumes, as an evidence of scrupulous care and editorial courtesy, form a fitting shrine for such a memory. Indeed, throughout the excellent biographical notes about many of the men to whom the letters are addressed there is something gratefully reminiscent of the high qualities of which we have tried to speak. It was an admirable thought, too, to render the letters still more vivid by excellent portraits of the principal correspondents.

T. J. Hardy.

THE PUBLIC AND THE PUBLICANS.

It is becoming evident that a great struggle is impending between the English public and the English publicans; between the nation as a whole and a class which has been allowed to acquire influence and privileges whereby it is not only corrupting the social life but threatening to control the politics of the country. That is a large statement, but to those who are familiar with the deadly influence of the ordinary public-house in a crowded town population and have noted the promptitude with which distinguished politicians answer to the whip of "The Trade," it will not seem an exaggerated one.

Let it be said at the outset that the writer is not a "life-long abstainer," nor is he inspired by the zeal of a recent convert. He is one of those who hold that the reasonable use of alcoholic liquor is a luxury permissible to those who can afford it, and has not been convinced that the terrible effects of its abuse are a sufficient reason for its total prohibition. That, however, is not the point which he desires to discuss here. What is now to be considered, what must be most gravely considered by all who take any rational interest in public affairs, is the claim of the publicans to a practically permanent tenure of their privileges so long as they abstain from certain statutory offences, or, in the alternative, to compensation at the public expense.

From a purely legal point of view it is generally admitted that, except in a limited class of cases, there is no ground for such a claim. But the publican takes higher ground. He appeals to us on the ground of equity. Such an appeal can not be disregarded, but it must be closely examined. There are two maxims known to English jurisprudence, which should be borne in mind in considering this appeal to equity. "He who seeks equity must do equity." "He who comes into Court must come with clean hands."

How far have the publicans as a class acted equitably? How far do they come into Court with clean hands? How far can a class of persons whose profits have been to a considerable extent won at the cost of the misery and degradation of their fellow men be said to have clean hands? For, that the liquor traffic as at present conducted is directly responsible for an immense amount of crime, poverty and disease, is a proposition which does not need further argument. We have at least got so far.

"The Trade" tells us from time to time, in a somewhat sanctimonious manner, that drunkenness and drunkards are its worst enemies. What it really means is that drunkenness and drunkards detected by the law, with the consequence of an imperilled license, are its worst enemies. For if all its customers drank only in moderation; if the public-houses of this country became what they are intended to be—places for the reasonable satisfaction of reasonable wants only—it follows that the consumption of intoxicants must be enormously reduced, and with that reduction would go a corresponding reduction in profits. There is no getting over the fact that a large proportion of the profits at present drawn by the trade is directly dependent on excessive drinking, and won at the cost of the degradation and misery which are attributable to such drinking.

When thus the trade proclaims its zeal for sobriety, this question may be fairly put: "You deplore the evils of excessive drinking; are you, then, prepared to concur in measures which would have the effect of reducing the consumption of drink, say, by one-third, with its consequent reduction of your profits? That proportion is probably not more than represents the excess to which so much mischief and misery are due. Will you prove your sincerity by giving it up?"

If we may judge from the steady efforts to extend the traffic and to draw people into these houses and retain them there by various accessory attractions, and from the panic outcry of the trade when the magistrates seemed to be waking up to their responsibilities, we may guess what the answer would be.

No serious curtailment of the evil can come about without a curtailment of profits. It is this direct connection between the profits of one set of men and the wretchedness and degradation of another, that bars any equitable claim for compensation by the publicans as a class. Licenses are given for the public good and convenience. They are largely abused to the public detriment and inconvenience, and the claim for compensation is, at least, as good against as on the part of the licensees.

Mr. Arthur Chamberlain has put the case well in one of his recent speeches. "Magistrates tell me sometimes," he said, "that they hesitate to take away a house because they feel so strongly the hardship they are inflicting on the man whose so-called property it is. I wonder if they ever feel the hardship they are inflicting on the much more numerous body of our people who live under the shadow of those houses, and I wonder how they feel it when, as in the case I have given, they have to pass sentence on people who by giving way to drink often give way to crime. Do they refuse to carry out the law because they feel so strongly the misfortune of the man? No. Then why feel so much sympathy for the financial interest of somebody who has begged and prayed to be allowed to go into this trade? I think there is a great deal to be said for the claim of the public against the publican."

If it is argued that not all license holders are bad men, that among them are to be found many who in other departments of life are excellent, good parents of families, good neighbours among friends, nay, further, that many houses are well conducted and not a source of evil, all this may be readily conceded. But they elect to stand together as a class strongly banded together for mutual assistance and defence, and as members of that class they must suffer for the wrong it does. As a class they are injuring England, and in self-defence England must deal severely with them.

Who are these publicans? The common representation of a bloated individual in his shirt sleeves, serving out gin and beer to besotted men and women, rises to our minds, but is no fair answer to the question all who are directly engaged in the trade are not of that type. Many are not to be distinguished, in such a way, from other men who in other walks of life have been misled by the false idea that in the pursuit of wealth, in the struggles of business, the strickest rules of morality do not hold good. Otherwise possibly excellent men, they say to themselves, "Business is business, and must not be mixed up with sentiment." Let us not judge them personally too hardly, having regard to the standards of conduct prevalent elsewhere, though in the national interest it may be needful to deal with them severely.

Nor is it behind the "bar" or in the "snug" alone that we must seek an answer to our question. We must look in Parliament and in the pews of the churches, in the offices and drawing-rooms of the rich, in the ranks of the learned professions, also, for the publicans of to-day. We must trace the profits of the trade to the pockets of those who receive them, and there proclaim and fix responsibility for its sins. In these days of tied houses in the hands of great companies, it is to those who complacently own the shares and receive the dividends of those companies that we must point saying, "Thou art the man!" It is idle to stop short at the nominal licensee, who is often a mere figure-head receiving but little of the gain and too great a share of the odium. Behind him stand the great body of persons who draw an income from the trade, though keeping at a convenient distance from its unpleasant details. They may suffer from any great reform. They will deserve to suffer, for they have cared but little how others suffered that they might thrive. To compensate these people would be to ignore the fact that the investment of money has its moral as well as its financial responsibilities, and that the loss, which is admittedly an appropriate penalty for lack of prudence, may be but a light one for the lack of moral insight and sensitiveness.

The best conscience in the world soon becomes valueless, and useless, and silent, unless there be a will proceeding from a formed character to carry out its decrees. —Dr. Schofield.

PUBLIC WORSHIP: IS IT A DUTY?

"IT was supposed that as men would not come to church they would go to the hall of science. Not a bit of it. Of the two they would perhaps prefer the church, but what they really want is to be left alone." So writes Mr. Charles Booth in his great work on "Religious Influences." What they really want is to be left alone. That is the fact. But what are the causes that give rise to the fact? Some of them are obvious. The dissolution of orthodoxy; the crushing pressure of our industrial life; the imperative need of rest and recreation; the "week-end" habit; the unreality and deadness of conventional worship; the absence of a courageous forward movement towards a bolder conduct and a more daring faith; the extension of the life of personal culture in which men find satisfactions such as those of letters and art which the popular religion does not provide—these are certainly among the causes that make for the anti-social desire to be let alone.

But the root of the matter lies deeper. The truth is that the old sanctions which made public worship a duty have broken down, and unless we can convince people that public worship is not only a joyous privilege, but a positive duty, nothing can avail to restore it to the dignity of a permanent function of civilised society. The Jewish Sabbath has gone beyond recall, and the Puritan Sunday has followed in its train. Time was when attendance at public worship was felt to be a condition of salvation. Heaven could not be entered without waiting on this means of grace. Are there, then, no constraining considerations still left to make public worship a duty? "Duty? Duty is so cold," someone will say. Indeed, not long ago the writer was told, "Surely the worship of God is the last thing that should be observed from a dry sense of duty." The retort is immediate. Surely the last and deepest desecration is its observance as a means of self-indulgence. It is precisely this revolt against duty, this refusal to recognise the place of commandment and obedience in the moral life, this disintegrating assumption that we may in all matters please ourselves and consult our own private inclinations—it is this more than anything that lies at the root of the modern neglect.

It is time to give up the attempt to coax and cajole "congregations of regular absentees" to come to worship. A higher and a harsher note must now be struck. No polite deference to those who claim to know their own business must be allowed to restrain us from telling them the blunt truth that it is their own inexcusable selfishness that keeps them away. They must be made to understand that a good man attends chapel not only for what can be got out of it by way of satisfactions, but also for what he can put into it by way of service and spiritual life. We know that everyone is a telepathic agent, and every soul contributes to the total influence of worship. To attend is to bring moral force and religious energy into the common stock; to absent oneself is to rob the congregation of spiritual sustenance. It is the plainest and most straightforward duty to make the highest function of our common life alive and strong, warm and appealing. The question which an unselfish life asks respecting worship is not "What pleasure can I personally get out of it?" but "What good can I contribute to it by my presence, by the merging of myself to enrich the spiritual totality?"

Nor should we forget to press upon parents their duty to attend as an example to their family. Very often the first step on a downward path to ruin is withdrawal from public worship. At the lowest, public worship is a good and salutary custom which brings children and young people into the wholesome society of earnest men and women. It puts them in the way of the good life. It keeps them in mind of the higher duties and the deeper solemnities of existence, and we owe it to them to start them on a right road by giving them helpful companions, worthy interests, and pure ambitions which belong not to the insulated personal life, but to the social communion. It is no light or guiltless thing to give children an example of abstention from the supporting atmosphere of a church life.

And surely it is a duty to give public testimony to our convictions in matters of morality and religion. This applies with special force to ourselves. We believe in freedom of religious inquiry; we believe in a liberal theology; we are workers in a great constructive reformation movement whose significance cannot be measured by the number of its professed adherents. Every life tells. This movement can be helped by personal presence, by open and organised identification with its ideals and purposes. The opportunity to do this constitutes an undeniable duty. That duty cannot be fulfilled by proxy or by a cheque. If we believe, however broadly, in the things for which our Churches stand, it is our solemn duty which only self-sophistication or moral transgression can evade, to attend and in the presence of God and of the people give open testimony to our belief in the larger faith. Then we shall be in a position to go to others like-minded and say, "You have an opportunity to put heart into those who are fighting an unequal contest with sin and superstition and error, and that opportunity lays on your soul a duty which you cannot escape without guilt."

We should lay stress on this duty of attendance on the ground that thereby spiritual help is given to others. "From each according to his power, to each according to his need," is one of the finest generalisations of morals. When we look around the churches and see their empty pews, can we dare affect to be ignorant of the bracing and stimulating influence that every fresh worshipper can bring to the congregational life? Can we pretend to be unaware of the inspiring help that every additional heart and mind can give to the workers, to the minister, to all? By attendance we in part create the church life that gives wings to our prayers and fervour to our songs.

And, finally, can we—whatever our thought of God—believe that He is indifferent to all this? Every duty comes to us with the imperative authority of the Most High, and our duty to the lowest is also a duty to God. The question of public worship has too long been approached solely from the side of personal need. But how if that personal need be unfelt? Better point out and pillory the impious ingratitude of men towards their fellowmen and the Power that has given us tongues for praise. Better preach sternly without mitigation and without effort to conciliate, the plain duty, and so bring back something of the old Judaic and Puritan strength of the Law. Public worship is, indeed, more than a duty: but it is at least a duty, and not something lower than a duty. God wants us, needs us, commands us. He still speaks, as He ever speaks, with judgment as well as with appeal, "Give me your hearts." When we obey, we shall find duty swallowed up in joy. We may then, but not until then, become happier and more reposeful in spirit, our burdens will become lighter, our sorrows more full of peace, and our whole life stronger, sweeter, more abundant and more melodious.

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

SUSTENTATION FUND.

SIR,—The latest annual report of the Sustentation Fund stated that its means would not suffice to maintain the annual grants-in-aid of ministers' stipends at the same rate as last year, unless it should be increased by the generosity of friends.

No adequate response has been made to this appeal, and at its meeting on June 24 last, the Board felt unwillingly obliged to reduce the amount and number of its grants. One or two, that seemed least necessary, were discontinued, and it was determined that all grants exceeding £20 should be diminished at the rate of 10 per cent., unless the funds required to maintain them at their usual amount could be obtained in this, and, necessarily also, in future years. It was therefore resolved to appeal through your columns to the friends and supporters of this fund to provide the managers with an increased income, which the treasurer estimates should be at least £200 a year.

At the recent National Conference, the Rev. Joseph Wood estimated that a very much larger amount would be required to raise the stipends of ministers, in England and Wales only, to £150 a year; and the managers sincerely hope that this more modest appeal for the whole of the United Kingdom will meet with such a response as to enable them to maintain their grants in this and future years at the same rate as those made last year. It hardly needs repeating that the grants they distribute are highly valued and are always cordially acknowledged, sometimes with very touching expressions of gratitude for the welcome and much-needed aid.

Subscriptions and donations will be thankfully received and acknowledged by the Treasurer, E. Chatfeild Clarke, Esq.,

63, Bishopsgate-street Within, London, E.C.

HARRY RAWSON (President).
A. W. WORTHINGTON } Hon. Secs.
FRANK PRESTON }

P.S.—Donations amounting to upwards of £25 were promised at the meeting of the Board.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS AT HOLIDAY RESORTS.

SIR,—As superintendent of a Sunday-school in one of our holiday places it has been a pleasure to receive scholars from inland towns, and at the close of the school to give them a note certifying attendance. Occasionally ministers and teachers have agreed to give addresses; then we have had a service instead of the usual classes, and the change has been appreciated. We need to make our Sunday-schools attractive, instructive, and musical, a kind of social religious home for the young. If we are to retain our adult scholars more men and women must help in this delightful work. Remember someone interested themselves in us, or possibly we should not have been workers in the religious vineyard. When our scholars budding out into manhood and womanhood see so few men and women labouring in our Sunday-schools it is only likely they grow indifferent, and feel they are getting too big and old for the Sunday-school. We shall want in due season someone to take hold of the government of our churches; and the Sunday-school is the right training ground for such. Come and help to imbue the young with the grand truths necessary to an upright and useful life. The delight of seeing our scholars take hold of the church work, and filling honourable positions, is a rich reward for our services in the Sunday-school.

Blachpool. T. UNDERWOOD.

SIR MICHAEL FOSTER AND VIVISECTION.

SIR,—The member for London University is, I believe, not quite sure to which political party he belongs; he is, however, at any rate, quite sure that vivisection is to be unflinchingly supported, and did his best the other night in Parliament to ward off attacks made upon that branch of research and those conducting it. May a mere outsider be permitted to subject his speech to a cursory examination?

(1) The sensitiveness exhibited by vivisectors, in the face of any unfavourable criticism of their methods, is truly pathetic. They inflict tortures of the most excruciating description, yet resent their laboratories being designated "torture dens"; they devise instruments of torture which, if wielded by the Holy Office, we should have no hesitation in calling diabolical in their ingenuity—yet such a harsh term must not be applied to the physiologist. Personally I have no particular desire to use over-emphatic language; but one may remind Sir Michael that it was a pro-vivisectionist witness before the Royal Commission, and a medical man to boot, the Rev. S. Haughton, M.D., who said: "I would shrink with horror from accustoming large classes of young men to the sight of animals under vivisection. I believe that many of them would become cruel and hardened . . . . Science would gain nothing, and the world would have let loose upon it a set of young devils." (Q. 1,888.)

(2) Sir Michael asked, indignantly, "Did the Committee think the medical profession consisted of devils?" I reply, We do not even think the medical profession consists of vivisectors. It is a stale device of the vivisecting fraternity—a small body of men, though armed with terrible powers of mischief—to identify themselves with the honourable medical profession, than which there exists no body of men more worthy of the affectionate esteem of the public. It is high time that device were discontinued, or, at least, seen through. The average medical man knows very little of vivisectional experiments, and is in nowise the accomplice of the experimenters, save in so far as he may, from a mistaken sense of professional etiquette, forbear openly ranging himself against his "leaders." A few vivisectors are, unfortunately, practising physicians and surgeons.

(3) Sir Michael assured the House that the descriptions heard of experiments—presumably from anti-vivisectionists—were not true descriptions. If that is so, we must ask vivisectors to send more accurate reports to their publications, for it is from the Journal of Physiology and kindred papers that the anti-vivisectionist draws his most effective illustrations. If vivisectors do not want us to know what they are doing, they should either not publish reports of their work, or devise a private code.

(4.) It is surely remarkable that Sir Michael Foster, in defending a method of research upon which, according to him, the whole future of science depends, cannot specify any one disease the cure of which can be definitely traced to that method. Instead of this, he contents himself (a) with vague statements of the approved pattern; (b) with reference to the discovery of the malaria bacillus, which, so far as I am aware, is not due to vivisection; (c) with promises, easy to make, that if only the vivisector is not interfered with, possibly his experiments may some day lead to the discovery of a cure for cancer. Why not tell us what vivisection has done?

(5.) But the part of Sir Michael's speech most damaging to the cause he is seeking to defend, is the frank surrender of the pretence that the vivisector is aiming at the discovery of a remedy for any specified ailment—is, indeed, aiming at more than the general advance of science, with a pious hope that in the course of his experiments something useful may turn up at some time or another. Let the public realise what this means: These men, one of the most eminent among whom (Dr. Klein, Royal Commission, Q. 3,629) did not scruple to declare that "a physiological inquirer has too much to do to think about the sufferings of the animals," are asking for a charter to inflict every kind of agony upon sensitive creatures, on the ground that, as the result of all this carnage, "something is sure to turn up." This is what I ventured to call the other day by the name of scientific Micawberism.

(6) Sir Michael asks "Cannot the licensed persons (i.e., the vivisectors) be trusted? If they cannot be trusted, then let that be said, and vivisection be discontinued." That is precisely our point, and we may feel thankful to the hon. member for putting it so plainly. We say that in the light of experience, and on their own showing, these "licensed persons" are not to be trusted to work their will upon dumb and defenceless animals; we say that no "safeguards," meaning restrictions, can be effective to deal with the situation; and hence we say, by all means let vivisection be discontinued.

J. WARSCHAUER.

Bristol, July 1, 1903.

OBITUARY.

REV. T. B. BROADRICK.

WE deeply regret to announce the death, at the early age of 56, of the Rev. Thomas Bennett Broadrick, which took place at his residence in Bridgwater on July 1. Mr. Broadrick had a serious illness about a year ago, but his health had greatly improved, and many of our readers will remember seeing him at the recent Whit-week meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in London. Mr. Broadrick was born October 18, 1846, at Dukinfield. He was educated for the Unitarian ministry at the Home Missionary College, Manchester, 1869-1872, and was minister at Burnley, Nantwich, and Lye, about two years at each place, 1872-1879. He then settled at Ipswich, where he remained from 1879 to 1891, and did excellent work there, particularly in connection with very successful series of people's services.

After a brief ministry at Dewsbury, he was appointed district minister by the committee of the Western Union, assisted by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in the year 1893. During the past ten years he laboured with quiet earnestness among the small and isolated congregations in the West of England. He was warm-hearted, cheery, diligent, and business-like, and he soon made his way and gained the confidence of the people among whom he laboured. He settled at Yeovil, afterwards removing to Bridgwater, making each of these places in turn a centre from which he carried on multifarious enterprises for the welfare of the churches. Of all the experiments made in the appointment of district ministers, his was one of the most helpful and successful. He was not a scholar, nor an eloquent preacher, but he possessed qualities of mind and character which impressed themselves upon all with whom he came in contact; and his industry and zeal in his calling and work were always conspicuous. Few men who passed through the Home Missionary College were greater favourites with their fellow students than he. The same qualities of patience, devotion, unselfishness, and a truly sunny, generous nature were manifested in the labours of his several pastorates. Himself a convinced Unitarian, and ever ready to defend his Church, there was little of the controversialist about him, and not a bit of bigotry. Religion, as he understood it, is deeper than all forms of faith, vitalising and irradiating them all. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at that Mr. Broadrick had many friends amongst all the churches, and that he won respect for his own by his consistency, and his broad humanity and liberality.

To his congregation in Bridgwater his loss is regarded as a calamity; to his fellow workers in the Western Union his place will be hard to fill, for he held himself at the disposal of all the churches, which he served with rare devotion and self-forgetting zeal. In that work he had the most efficient help of his wife, both in the pulpit and in many other ways. To her, and to their son and two daughters, in their great sorrow, we would offer our most earnest sympathy.

The funeral took place on Saturday afternoon, July 6, at Bridgwater. The attendance was a large and representative one, and included the Mayor, the Vicar, many ministers of our own and of other churches, with townspeople of all churches and parties, offering a remarkable manifestation of esteem and goodwill to Mr. Broadrick's memory. The service, which was singularly impressive, was conducted by the Rev. Jeffrey Worthington, B.A., and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A.

Memorial services were held on Sunday last in Christ Church; that in the morning was conducted by the Rev. J. M. Dowell, of Bath; the evening one by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, of Bristol. There were large congregations present on both occasions.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A CONQUERED GIANT.

RIGHT away in the far west of North America, in the State of California, there is a very wonderful place called the Yosemite Valley: It is beautiful and grand, too, as well as wonderful, and the formation of it is so curious that the geologists have not quite made up their minds how the rocks came to be just in the shape and position in which they now are. It is a valley about eleven miles long, and from one to three miles wide. To get into the valley, you have to go down from the high land, along which you have been driving—2,000 ft. down a zig-zag road, at every turn of which you get different views of the valley, with its beautiful pine trees, its grand cliffs of solid granite, its wonderful waterfalls, and the lovely river Merced, flowing placidly along to meet you. As you look along to the upper end, you see on either side cliff behind cliff, all nearly sheer down, of heights ranging from 2,000 ft. to 5,000 ft., and of most wonderful variety of shape. On the left, as if guarding the entrance to the valley, is the most massive of all, 3,000 ft. high, and perhaps a quarter of a mile long, which used to be called by the Indians, by a name meaning "The Great Chief of the Valley." Its modern name is "El Capitan." Beyond, on the same side, are three peaks, rising one behind another, the tallest behind, bending over the heads of those in front, as if looking to see what is going on in the valley beneath, while opposite them, on the other side of the valley, there is a similar group. These are called "The Three Brothers" and "The Three Sisters." One grand rock has two pinnacles like spires rising up, one from each side, and is called "The Cathedral Rock"; and a tall narrow peak still further, standing up stiff and solitary, is called "The Sentinel."

Then the waterfalls! A beautiful one, close to the entrance, 900 ft. high, which becomes all spray for the lower 200 or 300 ft., and blows about from one side to the other, looks so graceful and lace-like, that it is called "The Bridal Veil Fall."

But at the far end of the valley are two very curious mountains called the North Dome and the Half Dome, and the last is the most curious of all, and what I want especially to tell you about. The name describes it exactly; it looks just as if it had originally been a complete dome, and someone had cut it right down the middle, and taken away one half, leaving the other half standing. Well, that is probably just what did happen, only, instead of being cut in two with a knife, it was done by an earthquake, which is not at all an uncommon occurrence in California. The straight side of this Half Dome is nearly 5,000 ft. high from the base to the top, and at the very top there is a piece of level land, about seven acres in extent, and somehow this has become covered with a thin covering of soil, where seeds must have been blown up by the wind, and grass grows, and seven gnarled and stunted old pine trees have taken root.

For many years, this mountain was considered quite inaccessible, but about 28 years ago, a Scotchman, named George Anderson, determined that he would not be beaten by a mountain, however difficult, and he made up his mind that he would get to the top. He knew it would take time and patience and perseverance, but he was prepared to spend all these on the undertaking, so he thought out his plan carefully, and set to work. He climbed up as far as he was able, which was only a very little way, and when he could go no further, he set to work with the tools he had carried up with him, and drilled a hole in the solid granite rock. Into this he fixed an iron bar, with an eye-bolt at the top, and into the eye-bolt he fixed a rope. By means of this he could reach a little higher to drill another hole, and fix in another iron bar, and so get higher still. Of course, it was hard work and slow work, but he had made up his mind to that, and was prepared to spend many weeks, and even months, in accomplishing his purpose. Then, at last, when he had driven in many bars and fixed his rope rail, he was able to pull himself up the almost perpendicular side and round the mighty shoulder of the granite giant, and there he stood on the top—a conqueror! What intense satisfaction he must have felt as he stood there on the seven-acre plot of land, realising that his hard work was over, and that his efforts had been successful; that he had really done what he set himself to do, and done it, too, in the face of so much difficulty. It was a wonderful instance of patience and perseverance, and it must have been all the more difficult from the fact of his having to work alone.

Every difficult task that we perform, every bad habit overcome, every good habit formed, all are like Anderson's ascent of the Half Dome, and all need just as much patience and perseverance as he put into his task.

Charles Kingsley tells us what slow progress it is; like George Anderson, we have to "build the ladder by which we rise," and we can't do that quickly, for every conquest over ourselves is only like fixing in one of the iron bars up the side of the great Half Dome. But every effort we make is a step upward, till at last we reach the summit. This is how Charles Kingsley expresses it:—

Heaven is not reached by a single bound,
But we build the ladder, by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And we mount to its summit, round by round.
We rise by things that are under our feet,
By what we have mastered of good and gain,
By the pride deposed, and the passion slain,
And the vanquished ills that we hourly meet.

O. M. RAWLINS

LADYBIRD.

LITTLE ruby ebon-spotted,
Ladybird with names so odd,
Odd it is how far you've trotted,
Though you've wings how hard you plod.

Never was there ruby greater
To true lover of the rose,
Oh! you emerald devastator,
Scourger of his greenfly foes.

How you scorn that brown old gravel,
How you hasten on on high,
Up a blade of grass you travel,
Speeding onward to your sky.

Does adventure, all romantic,
Take you up that emerald road?
Is't an Eiffel Tower gigantic,
Or your ladyship's abode?

On the very tip you're perching,
Widest view, no doubt, to snatch,
With your dot-eye keenly searching
My neglected garden patch.

Of a sudden, wide, wide open
Were your ruby casements dashed—
Telegram of grave ill-omen
Sure to your address was flashed.

Such a dream of pearly winglets
Gleamed a moment in the sun,
Like that famous fairy kinglet's
Sweet Titania's Oberon.

Was't a blossom up there swinging,
Apple-blossom did you see?
Oh! above it far you're winging,
Far above my apple-tree?

"House on fire!" exclaimed I sadly,
"And your children do they roam?"
So you left me, crying madly,
"Did you, did you fly away home?"

E. L. H. THOMAS.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., acknowledges with many thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mr. John Warren, £1 1s.; Miss Warren, £1 1s.; Mrs. Samuel Hollins, £1; Mr. Charles Freeston, 5s.; Mrs. Evans, 10s.; Mrs. Wood, 10s. 6d.; Miss Tribe, 10s. 6d.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, JULY 11, 1903.

THE INTERNATIONAL.

EVERYTHING points to the happiest renewal at Amsterdam in September of the experience which was so full of inspiration and delight in the meetings in London two years ago of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers. To any of our readers who do not yet know, or have forgotten, the true significance of those meetings, we commend the volume on "Liberal Religious Thought at the Beginning of the Twentieth Century" (published by Mr. PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand), which contains a full record of the proceedings.

The object of the Council, which was inaugurated at the seventy-fifth anniversary meeting of the American Unitarian Association at Boston, May 25, 1900, is now well known :—

> To open communication with those in all lands who are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty, and to increase fellowship and co-operation among them. . . . It is designed to bring into closer union, for exchange of ideas, mutual service, and the promotion of their common aims, the scattered liberal congregations and isolated thinkers and workers for religious freedom in many lands.

At the meetings in Amsterdam (September 1-4) there is to be no official language. The Presidential address by Dr. OORT, and the sermon by the Rev. J. VAN LOENEN MARTINET (editor of De Hervorming) will be given indeed in Dutch, but an English translation will be in the hands of visitors from this country and America, and German, French, and English will be used as well as Dutch, for papers and in discussions during the week. No one need be afraid, we are assured, that English will not carry them through all the exigencies of the visit. At the same time a little knowledge of the language of the country will undoubtedly add to the pleasure of the occasion, and bring visitors into closer and more sympathetic touch with their hosts.

This is how the title of the Council reads, with the statement of its primary object :—"Internationale Raad van Unitarische en andere Vrijzinnig-Godsdienstige Denkers en Werkers: Het doel van dezen Raad is in verbinding te treden met hen die, waar ook wonend, er naar streven echten godsdienst en volkomen vrijheid te vereenigen, om zo broederschap en samenwerking onder hen te vermeerderen." And in the preliminary programme, issued by the Rev. C. W. WENDTE, the general secretary of the Council, and Professor EERDMANS, the local secretary, we find the following further sentences of explanation :—"Het doel van dezen Raad is allen die op den gemeenschappelijken grondslag staan van het 'vroom en vrij' in nader aanraking te brengen, opdat broederschap en onderlinge samenwerking vermeerdere. Voor vrijzinnigen—die bijna overal als minderheid hebben te strijden—is een dergelijk streven van hooge beteekenis.

"For Liberals, who almost everywhere have to fight in a minority, such an effort is of great importance." So it was found two years ago in London, and we are confident that the Amsterdam meetings will likewise prove to be full of stimulus and encouragement.

The letter, which we publish this week, from Mr. ION PRITCHARD, who has kindly undertaken to facilitate the arrangements for English visitors, gives full particulars as to the journey and hotels at Amsterdam, and we publish also the first of a series of articles "In Praise of Holland," which should quicken interest and add to the pleasure of those who may arrange a more extended holiday in conjunction with the international meetings.

The programme of the meetings, so far as it is settled (and we hope shortly to be able to publish it in full), promises the happiest blending of serious conference, social intercourse, and enjoyment of the interests and beauty of the country.

Monday, Aug. 31, and the greater part of Tuesday, Sept. 1, are devoted to the meetings of the Dutch Liberal ministers, the "Vergadering van Moderne Theologen," but on Tuesday evening the International meetings begin with a religious service, at which the Rev. J. VAN LOENEN MARTINET is to be the preacher, to be followed by a reception of the delegates. On Wednesday morning. Dr. OORT, of Leiden, will give the presidential address, and the day will be devoted to the reading of papers, followed in the evening by a steamer trip on the Amstel. The work of the Council will be continued on Thursday and Friday mornings, the afternoons and evenings being left free for excursions. Harleem is to be visited on Thursday, where the Cathedral and its great organ form the chief attraction. There is to be a rendering of old Dutch religious songs by a noted quartet, and there will be a garden concert in the evening. For Friday excursions are proposed to some places on the Zuiderzee and to Leiden.

Among those who have promised papers for the meetings, with their subjects, are the following :—

AMERICA.
- Rev. S. A. Eliot, D.D., "Liberal Religion in America."
- Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D., "American Ideals in Education."
- E. D. Mead, "Holland and the Peace Movement."
- Rev. C. W. Wendte, "The Centenary of R. W. Emerson."

BELGIUM.
- Rev. J. Hocart (Brussels), "The Difficulties of Liberal Religion in Belgium."

ENGLAND.
- Professor J. E. Carpenter, M.A., "The Place of Christianity among the Religions of the World."
- Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., "The Revived Interest in Mediæval Religion."
- Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., "God as the Soul of all Souls."

FRANCE.
- Professor Jean Réville, D.D., "Religion and the Modern Conception of the Order of Nature."
- Rev. E. Roberty (Paris), "Christian Mysticism and the Liberal Protestantism of France."

GERMANY.
- Dr. A. Kalthoff (Bremen), "The Influence of Conditions of Life upon Religion."
- Professor O. Pfleiderer, D.D., "The New Testament Jesus in the Light of Religious History."
- Dr. Schieler (Danzig), "Fears and Hopes in Respect to Religious Questions in Germany."

NETHERLANDS.
- Professor Dr. A. Bruining, "The Aggressive Character of Liberal Religious Faith."
- Professor Dr. T. Cannegieter, "Personality and Religion."
- Professor Dr. S. Cramer, "Do Liberal Religious Believers want to be Organised as a Church?"
- Professor M. A. Gevessen, "The Evangelical Awakening in Holland about 1834."

SWEDEN.
- Professor O. E. Lindberg (Goteburg), "Liberal Religious Faith in Sweden."

SWITZERLAND.
- Dr. Schoenholzer (Zurich), "Liberal Religious Life in German Switzerland."

Professor MONTET, of Geneva, is also to read a paper, and Hungary, Denmark, India, New Zealand, and Japan will also be represented at the Council. Thus it will be seen how truly international the meetings will be, and how rich the feast offered for those who are able to attend.

THE "HIBBERT JOURNAL."

WITH the July number just published the Hibbert Journal has completed its first year. Its success has been most remarkable, and, as CARLYLE would say, "is significant of much." Men who wished it well, estimated before its first appearance that its circulation could not exceed 750 copies. Of the first number 2,000 copies were printed at once and quickly sold out. We believe that 2,000 additional copies of the first number had to be printed, and since then 4,000 copies of each succeeding number have been printed.

In every issue articles of importance have appeared which the world of religious thought and scholarship must read. The Hibbert Journal has made itself a position which is probably unique in the history of theological quarterlies. Both in this country and in the United States it is finding its way into public libraries and country parsonages, it is read by Catholics and Protestants, by Unitarians and Trinitarians. The editor and the sub-editor must indeed be congratulated. It is very largely due to the editorial energy and judgment, and especially to the understanding of the needs and opportunities of the times, that the Hibbert Journal has gained such rapid recognition and success. Mr. JACKS would be the first to say that it is the spirit of the age which has helped him. and that so far as the Hibbert Journal is a success it is because he has seen what is wanted and has supplied a great and growing need. The age wants liberal thought without labels, without sectarianism. Men of all Churches are prepared, are even anxious to discuss problems of the Church, problems of the Bible, problems of philosophy in a free and reverent spirit. They will do it boldly, fearlessly, without restraint, but not under a sectarian flag. Many are feeling what Dr. Hunter has recently expressed. We are on the eve of a theological reconstruction which can only be paralleled in importance by the work of Luther nearly four hundred years ago. What this reconstruction will actually become men are wise enough to know they cannot say. It must be worked out by free religious thought, by men of many schools and many types expressing honestly their thoughts and their ideals. It must be, like all real advance, the result of open, manly conflict and discussion. No man can say what the end will be. Still less will any wise man try to describe it by a name. We only know the way. The way is that of strong, sympathetic, scholarly thought, tolerant towards others but speaking out without hesitation or compromise whatever convictions we have attained. "No complete reconciliation between opposing aspects of truth can ever be made," says the Master of Balliol, "unless each of them is drawn out to its utmost consequences and set in clear antithesis to the others." It is evident that there is growing feeling at the present time in favour of such a course. The spirit of Imperialism is abroad. That spirit does not mean merely wide relationship and large sympathies; it means also more local self-government, more opportunity for individual development and for racial or territorial patriotism, but always in the presence of the larger whole, to the strength and worth of which all self-expression of individuals and communities must tend.

So, too, is it in the intellectual life. We want wide relationships and large sympathies, but not merely this. Men have too often lost their own convictions in a vague sympathy for everybody's thoughts. The intellectual Imperialist belongs somewhere and believes something. He recognises the duty of self-expression and of local patriotism, but he lives in the presence of the larger whole of Imperial truth, which includes all thinking men.

The tendency to which we refer is a union of apparent incompatibles. On the one hand, men are determined to break "the conspiracy of silence" and speak out: they will no longer be content for the sake of peace to hide their own thoughts, or for the sake of sympathy to give up their own convictions. On the other hand, they want to unite with others on this principle of honest outspokenness; they feel that this method leads towards truth, the common end they all desire, and they want to unite as lovers of truth amidst all their divergencies. It is this need which the Hibbert Journal has met, and which has gained for it so significant a recognition. The one discouraging fact in its short history is the comparatively slight interest and support which it has aroused among members of our own churches. There seems to be an idea that it is mainly technical, and fit only for theological specialists. Nothing could be more untrue. There are articles in every number which deal with subjects interesting to every serious mind and which can be understood by everyone of ordinary intelligence,

We do not write in the spirit of the advertiser, but we feel deeply that the foundation principle of the Hibbert Journal is the principle on which our churches and our colleges are based. We believe in finding truth through free and reverent inquiry. We believe in the possibility of religious union without doctrinal agreement. We often fail in making the world understand our position: we often fail to realise our hopes. In the Hibbert Journal the theological world has to some extent understood and gladly accepted our principles. We see in it the beginning of the recognition of a great ideal which has been the inspiration and strength of our best and noblest men throughout our history.

Now is that glorious resurrection time
When all earth's buried beauties have new birth!
Behold the yearly miracle complete,—
God hath created a new heaven and earth!
Hast thou no time for all this wondrous show—
No thought to spare? Wilt thou for ever be
With thy last year's dry flower-stalk and dead leaves,
And no new shoot or blossom on thy tree?—Mrs. H. B. Stowe.

IN PRAISE OF HOLLAND.

I.

MY friend the Editor has done me the honour to appeal to me as one who has a strong affection for Holland and its people, and who has been over a good deal of the country, to give his readers, at not too great length, some idea of what can be seen and done during a short stay in that low-lying neighbour of ours.

To enjoy fully a sojourn in a strange land, among the essentials is to know beforehand some of the characteristics which go to make up its strangeness. To be set down in a new country even with the best of guide-books in one's hand, but without the guiding spirit of some knowledge of the people, their ways, surroundings and story, is to ensure half appreciation and half enjoyment, whilst a mere nodding acquaintance beforehand, with a few striking features of land and folk, will do much to convert straggling unconnected glimpses of queer sights into a pleasant memory-picture bearing the stamp of both truth and beauty. So my first paper shall give a general account of what Holland is as a whole.

It seems curious that the average cultivated Englishman, even the Englishman who has travelled much, knows and wants to know very little about our next-door neighbour Holland. He is probably not aware that even the name he gives the country is not the name its people give it. Holland is the name of two provinces, North Holland and South Holland, the whole country is "Nederland," The Netherland. And as to the people, they do not know themselves as "Dutch," a name given by them to the Germans, but they themselves are Netherlanders or Hollanders. Travellers to the Continent use the Netherlands as a stepping-stone to what they think is something better; they cross over from England to the "Hoek van Holland" or to Flushing, and then at once rush through to Germany or beyond. The traveller landing at Flushing on the way to Berlin or Cologne does not know that he has only to cross an open field or two to be in a stately little old-world town which is but little altered either in outward appearance or dress since the days when little De Ruyter played about its streets; that the first station on his way will be Middelburg, in parts scarcely altered from the Middelburg known to Chaucer's merchant "with the flaundrish beever hat." Goes, Breda, and Hertogenbosch are to him merely queerly sounding names of railway stations as he flies along, and his sum total of Holland would be a flat land scarce of tree but abounding in water.

It must never be lost sight of that in speaking of Holland we are speaking of eleven provinces, two of which, North and South Holland, have lent their names to the rest for purposes of identification by foreigners. Each of these provinces is separately distinguishable by domestic architecture, dialect, occupation, costume, and in some cases by religion, from its neighbour. The long-pitched roofs of black glazed tiles are peculiar to the farm-houses of North Holland, light green and white window shutters abound in South Holland; fear of water encroachment sets many of the houses in Friesland on mounds; you can recognise a Limburg farm by its large doorway dividing living rooms from cattle sheds and barn. To a Frieslander classic Dutch is almost a foreign tongue; an Englishman sounds more familiarly to him, and he would be quite at home in the very north-westerly corner of Germany. One province will make butter, another cheese, and another is given up to the cutting of peat. In province after province the size and shape of the headdress varies as does the form and colour of the bodice, the number, size and shape of the gold and silver ornaments which so much abound. But all are united, sentimentally, by a fight for freedom and even existence, and a strong affection for the ruling House of Orange, and physically, by good roads, abundant railroads and still more abundant canals.

Netherland's motto Luctor et Emergo—"I keep my head above water, but it is a struggle"—corresponds to the facts of its existence. If you looked on a map of the Netherlands, tinted to show the level of the land according as it is above or below sea level, you would be surprised to note how much of it is actually a hollow land (which some think explains the name Holland) or basin, which, unless protected, the sea would easily fill. The whole of the Netherlands is low-lying land to some extent formed of the mud coming down the rivers Rhine and Maas; enough perhaps to give a semblance of justification to Napoleon's claim to the land as being French land out of place. But two enemies mightier than Napoleon or the armies of Spain have waged, and are still waging, a war eternal against the inhabitants, two land grabbers, pilfering stealthily or making furious onslaughts on the land, sometimes gaining inch by inch, sometimes seizing whole miles at once. Wind and Water, the country's enemies, the Dutch have made their useful slaves. The wind which lashes the water into a battering ram, which knocks down puny obstacles, and then spreads desolation over fields and villages, also blows together into shifting mounds the fine sand of the shore. When heaps of sand are thus formed the Dutchman comes, and with care and trouble plants tufts of bent-grass which retard the shifting; and now the wind brings more sand, and sand heaps grow into dunes sometimes 200 ft. high, and keep the water off. Where dunes are not, dykes are made. A long, gently inclined bulwark is built first of stones of basalt, from Norway; then rows of wooden posts are driven in, and the upper part of the slope is thatched with straw. The waves are thus made to expend their fury by running up a hill, as it were, instead of having a perpendicular mass of earth to wear away or knock down. And when the Dutchman wants to empty the huge basins of water, the result of former encroachments, he builds a dyke round the water, and then sets the wind to pump it out for him. And to carry his goods and himself to and fro he tames the water by putting it into canals as in a strait waistcoat, and so it becomes his servant of all work. And this struggle is under the management of a department of the State, and means an expenditure of great patience, much thought, and large sums of money, which is hourly and daily going on. Well may the Netherlands be represented by a lion rampant, free to boast—Luctor et Emergo!

This land, so precious to them, the Dutch have had to defend against other than natural enemies. To tell of the ups and downs to which this little land has been subject in its long past is the work of many writers. Buffeted about like a ball at a game of rounders, fate had put it under the harsh tyranny of Catholic Spain, and the one episode of its history never to be forgotten is the fierce struggle which ended with the overthrow of the Spanish yoke. Men, women, and children all took part, and even the waters were commandeered to protect a country they were so ready to destroy.

There is no country where the principle of civil and religious liberty is better understood than in Holland. Firm to stolidness in their own beliefs, they have apparently learnt at the persecutors' hands a hatred of persecution. Religious sects of all kinds exist unmolested, and divisions and sub-divisions of churches flourish. Jews have found a shelter there when it could not be obtained elsewhere, and our Puritan forefathers and the French Huguenots alike sought refuge in troublous times in Holland.

By the retention of many of their local government rights each province enjoys a large share of home rule, and the electoral qualification for the Lower Chamber of the Parliament approaches manhood suffrage; and these privileges are used for the maintenance and furtherance of civil liberty.

In the matter of education, Holland has not arrived at finality in its system. It has not yet made education either compulsory or free, but full school provision is made in all districts corresponding to our parishes, and poor parents receive assistance in the education of their children. In the parish schools, sectarian religious teaching does not appear, but denominational schools exist and are aided with public money. Secondary education is well provided, and the passage from the elementary schools to the universities has no barriers either of religion or class. One result accruing from this care for education is that almost every educated Dutchman has a speaking acquaintance with the English, French and German languages. They will tell you that they are obliged to learn other tongues because no one will take the trouble to learn theirs.

With this sketchy introduction to a land, the home of a people whom their young Queen, on taking on herself the reins of Government, called "small in number but great in courage, great in nature and in character," I hope in future papers to tell of places that may be seen and are worth seeing in this country of dune, dyke, canal and windmill. ROTATOR SENEX.

THE Salvation Army, according to official reports, is doing mission work in 49 countries and colonies, and in 31 languages. It has 7,500 centres of work, and nearly 14,000 officers and cadets. It has besides 45,000 local officers, who gratuitously devote their spare time to the work.

Give me beauty in the inward soul, and may the outward and inward man be at one.—Plato.

INTERNATIONAL MEETINGS AT AMSTERDAM.

SIR,—Friends who are looking forward to their visit to Amsterdam, and I may say that the number of names given in exceeds a hundred, will be glad to hear that the preparations for our stay, reception, and proceedings generally are nearly completed.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie and myself have just returned from Amsterdam, where we had an opportunity of conferring with the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, who has kindly undertaken the duty of arranging the hotel accommodation for the reception of the many guests expected from all parts of the world. We visited the various hotels, received from the several managers their tariffs of prices, and were shown the rooms which would be placed at the disposal of visitors coming from England.

Our party will probably be divided up among the following hotels: the Bible, American, Victoria, and the Haesji; the terms varying according to rank of hotel and position of room. I may say that all the hotels are good, but that the three first are better fitted and a little more expensive. Full particulars as to the charges will be included in the circular to be sent out to all who have applied to me. Roughly speaking, meals and hotel charges need not exceed 10s. a day, and will be less at the Hasji Hotel.

As regards the travelling arrangements, the Zeeland Steamship Company offer return tickets to Amsterdam viâ Queenborough and Flushing, available for 14 days or any shorter period, for £1 5s. 6d. second class rail, first class on board the boat. Day service.

The party will leave on Monday, August 31, from the Viaduct Station, Holborn, by train, leaving 9.25 morning, reaching Amsterdam at 11.30 same night. The return journey can be made on Saturday at 6.30 a.m. from Amsterdam, arriving in London at 7.18 p.m.

It is most important, especially owing to our late arrival, that every visitor should know definitely beforehand the hotel where he is expected, and to enable the management to arrange this and to secure the requisite accommodation, it will be necessary that friends going should send in their names and requirements before July 25. A circular with application form attached will be sent out next week to all who have applied for information.

The reception committee are issuing Membership tickets, price 4s. 2d., which will be obtainable at Essex Hall; the remittance of this amount should accompany the application when names are sent in. These tickets will admit to meetings, excursions, receptions, and will be found useful in various ways.

I may add that English is spoken at all the above-named hotels and at the chief shops, where, too, the sovereign is taken at the full rate of exchange of 12 gulden.

ION PRITCHARD.

Essex Hall, Essex-street, London.

LIFE is only bright when it proceedeth
Towards a truer, deeper life above;
Human love is sweetest when it leadeth
To a more divine and perfect Love.

—A. A. Procter.

THE EASTERN UNION.

THE annual assembly of the Eastern Union of Unitarian and other Free Christian Churches was held at Norwich on Thursday, June 25, and as a new departure took the form to a large extent of a holiday meeting, which was very successful and greatly enjoyed. Members were present from Lynn, Bury St. Edmunds, Bedfield, Framlingham, Yarmouth, Long Sutton andIpswich, in all numbering sixty-nine, who together with the Norwich friends formed the largest gathering ever held under the auspices of the Eastern Union.

In the morning the Castle Museum was visited, under the guidance of Mr. James Mottram, and after lunch at the Blackfriars Hall, the cathedral, where Mr. G. A. King acted as guide. Business was briefly transacted after lunch, and in the evening a short service, chiefly musical, was held in the Octagon Chapel, followed by a meeting.

Mr. W. J. SCOPES, of Ipswich, President of the Union, presided at the luncheon and conducted the business. In an opening address he said that at the last annual meeting a strong feeling had been expressed that something must be done to create, if possible, a stronger interest in their Churches throughout the district, and particularly to enlist the sympathies of the younger people in their church life and work. They were indebted to Mr. F. W. Smith for the first suggestion of a meeting of the kind they were holding that day, and they might congratulate themselves on the result.

Some reports having been rapidly submitted and passed without discussion, officers for the ensuing year were elected, the new president being Mr. A. M. Stevens, of Norwich, who was the first secretary of the Union, when it was resuscitated some twenty-five years ago. Mr. Stevens having acknowledged the honour of his election and expressed his deep interest in the Union and loyalty to the cause of liberal Christianity, the Rev. Alfred Hall gave a brief address, and concluded by welcoming the Rev. John Birks, Mr. Rump, and Mr. Newell to the fellowship of the Union, on their settlement at Yarmouth, Hapton, and Framlingham, respectively.

The evening service at the Octagon, which was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall, included a rendering by the choir of Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," and was followed by brief speeches by Miss Helen Brooke Herford, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Revs. Lucking Tavener and A. Hall.

Miss HERFORD made a plea, addressed especially to the young, for more interest in the great historical antecedents of Unitarianism, more enthusiasm in the work of the churches, and a more unswerving loyalty. In these times, she said, they heard a great deal about young people standing up for themselves. They desired their independence, and a very laudable desire it was. But although young people thought early about standing up for themselves, they somehow preferred to wait till late in life before they began to pay for themselves. She rejoiced to hear of young people taking an active part in church life, but she rejoiced still more when, in addition to workers, they became subscribers, and made those sacrifices without which no church could be carried on. There was one thing in particular which they could learn from some of the other churches. They were proud of their nonconformity, and they were proud of it for the very simple reason that they knew their Church's history. In this necessary knowledge some of our young people were sadly lacking, but if they would take a little trouble and read a few simple books, they would find they were heirs of no mean tradition, and were following in the footsteps of a very noble race of men.

In conclusion, referring to the results of the Education Act, she thought Providence had sent it for their sins; but it would do good after all, if resistance to injustice in the spirit of those who refused to pay church rates, brought a little recrudescence of the old enthusiasm. "We talk sometimes," she concluded, "about the blood of the martyrs being the seed of the church. Our Church tends sometimes to be a little high and dry. A little watering of that sort cannot hurt it."

The Rev. LUCKING TAVENER, of Ipswich, then spoke on some considerations that will be helpful for our religious life. He said the belief that God is the source of all good life is a common thought discovered in all devotional literature. God would have men long to be filled, and is also anxious to fill. This truth accounts for the fact that we all find below our hereditary element of life a deeper seed of nobler life. This has come from God, and it seeks to germinate and develop until it realises for mankind a friendship with God. In nature we see how the hidden essence of life is seeking to clothe itself in lovely forms. It is that same life principle which we find working in the heart of man and ultimately developing into the fruit of good deeds. Hosea represents God as saying to the earnest heart, "I will be as the dew." We usually think of God as the strong sun rather than as the gentle dew. The dew suggests dampness, clouds, shadow. God is our cloudless day. But we need the shade sometimes. God knows how to hide even His great light from us when we are not able to bear it. No grass, we imagine, could develop in the unbroken sunlight, and man certainly needs the dews of disappointment and the clouds of sorrow. By these and other experiences, we learn that our main motive in life should be to let His great spirit have full possession of our hearts and consciences, so that we may individually produce the characteristics in which God may delight.

The Rev. ALFRED HALL said the gathering of the day was mainly designed to promote a sense of union and fellowship among the members of their churches, and so to stimulate the spirit of loyalty. But it was curious that any Unitarian should be lacking in loyalty to a denomination which had produced so many great men, and who had been so prolific in strength and virtue.

The meeting concluded early in the evening, so that the Ipswich party might leave by the 6.50 train for home.

CARMARTHEN COLLEGE.

THE annual distribution of prizes at the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, took place on Thursday, June 25.

The chair was taken by the Rev. G. DAWES HICKS, M.A., Ph.D., who, in opening the proceedings, congratulated the students on the conclusion of the two days' examinations. The first and second year men, he said, had done excellent work, but the third year men showed a falling off, that was much to be regretted. On this he remarked:—"I am told that what St. Paul called the foolishness of preaching has much to do with this unfortunate result, and, although I sincerely sympathise with the men who have to labour under these difficulties, I cannot help remarking it is a cause for unmeasured regret that those who ought to be concentrating their efforts to gather the ripe fruit of the College course and to fit themselves for the great conflict they are about to enter, should be heavily handicapped in this way, at the most precious period of their student career. Once engaged in the actual fight of life, without the proper weapons, it will be too late for them to run back and fetch weapons; and, although I trust they will never cease to be students and to think over the problems which have occupied them here, it is never an easy thing, in any branch of industry, to recover lost ground."

Having commented on the work of the past session, Dr. Hicks spoke at length on the value of knowledge and understanding to the minister of religion. "The religion that can give no account of itself as true, that merely reiterates conventional beliefs and dogmas without having first turned them inside out to test their validity, is bound sooner or later to prove itself inadequate and miserably to fail as a gospel either for ourselves or others. The world in which you will have to minister is becoming more and more an educated world. You will have to speak to a generation for whom the great discoveries of science have changed the whole aspect of nature, for whom the great thoughts of modern thinkers are gradually becoming more and more familiar, for whom especially great social questions, such as the relation between capital and labour, are becoming more and more pressing. And if you are to interpret the mighty facts of God and Duty and Immortality for men and women touched ever so little by the spirit of this new culture, and in a way that will be helpful to them, you must know more of the strength of religion than its severest critics can tell of its weakness, and be able to convince by the reasonableness of your plea minds that are often agitated by doubts and perplexed with difficulties. No mere reflection of what you can get from the well of Scripture will enable you to serve your fellow-men as prophets of the Most High, for, unless you have yourselves wrestled with their doubts and difficulties, you will soon find that you have 'nothing to draw with, and the well is deep,' that you have not received of that 'living water,' which springs up now as in the olden time 'unto eternal life.' It is, then, to provide the equipment needful for so onerous a mission that this college exists and its curriculum is framed. You were led here no doubt by just that instinctive persuasion of divine things and yearning to be the witness of them to others, of which I have spoken; and the teachers here have been largely engaged in converting that early inspiration into assured principle and that instinctive persuasion into rational conviction. They have been trying to impart what Plato finely called 'the first and fairest thing that the best of men can ever have,' viz., education of soul. And to some extent, at all events, they must have brought you to the threshold of an immense and glorious world—the world of natural law and human experience, of the vast tracks of history and the thoughts of the men who made them famous, and have been helping you to a clearer discernment of the personality and a deeper understanding of the teaching of him, who for nearly 2,000 years has been the guide and leader of our pilgrim troop in quest of the spiritual land."

Dr. Hicks further emphasised the need of adequate training for ministers by the example of the questions raised in men's minds by such a book as Myers' "Human Personality," and concluded with an earnest exhortation that in their ministry they should give of their best, and maintain a high standard in their devotion to the truth of God.

Mr. Harold Baily and the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor also spoke on the subjects in which they had examined, Mr. Baily also referring to the mischievous effect of the new Education Act in stirring up afresh religious animosities in a spirit utterly contrary to that of their College.

After further speeches from Mr. Talfourd Ely, the Rev. J. H. Woods, and Principal Evans, Mrs. Hicks distributed the certificates and prizes, the latter including several special prizes presented by Miss Emily Sharpe, Dr. Hicks, and Mr. Baily.

Professors Jones, Weatherall and Keri Evans subsequently spoke, and the Rev. E. U. Thomas closed the meeting with prayer.

We are glad to add that one of the students, Mr. J. L. Roderick, B.A., has been one of the eight successful candidates in the first B.D. examination of the University of Wales.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

The annual public examination was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, July 1. Most of the day was spent in the reading of selected answers and the preaching of sermons.

In the afternoon, at 5 o'clock, the senior visitor, the Rev. Philemon Moore, delivered his address. He said their studies had covered a great deal of ground. The time for the study of ancient literatures, especially Greek, had been increased. Both examiners were gratified with the evidences of hard and honest work in all subjects. They had heard no approach to a bad answer during the two days. If any answers were better than others they were those dealing with Textual Criticism and Biblical Theology. The sermons also had been both well prepared and well delivered. Speaking of the business of the minister, he said his mandate was that he be, according to his powers, a man of thought and knowledge. He would find difficulties in his path. It was not easy to combine thought with action. A man of action was valuable, but if he be nothing more his action will lack elements of permanence. That man is effective who allows thought to precede action. He referred the students to the post graduate theological degrees which the students of other theological colleges obtain. He had for ten years been one of the examiners, during which time he knew of only two students from their colleges presenting themselves, and they did not pass. The candidates came from the Lancashire Independent College and Mansfield College He urged them to consider the advantages of working for those degrees.

Principal Gordon apologised for the unavoidable absence of the President, Alderman John Ward, the Lord Mayor of Leeds. Announcing the successes of the students, Mr. Gordon said that Mr. McLachlin came out first-class in all his Owens College examinations, taking the Prize in English History, in Honours Roman History, and sharing the Prize in another Honours course of History. In connection with the Home Missionary College Examinations, Mr. Simon Jones, B.A., had taken the Sharpe Prize for Biblical subjects, and the Bibby Prize for Greek. The Principal awarded a special Prize to Mr. Evans, B.A., for general proficiency. Certificates were presented to Messrs. Worthington, Davies, and Evans. Mr. Evans commenced his duties last Sunday as Assistant Minister to the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., of Bolton.

In the evening a Valedictory Service was conducted in Cross-street Chapel by the Rev. James Drummond, LL.D., the Principal of Manchester College, Oxford.

In the course of his address, Dr. Drummond said there were two very different moods in which they could approach religious questions. They might have the simple desire of enlarging their knowledge, or of nurturing their religious life. In the one case the intellectual element was distinctive, and in the other the emotional element. If cultivated men were indifferent to religion at the present day it was because it had not got into relation with other forms of thought. Although by no means underestimating the value of learning, he said that knowledge might puff up and hide from their view the very thing they desired to know. The knowledge born of sympathy was better than all the learning of the schools. They might know all that science had to teach them and yet never commune with the Maker of all things. It was possible to measure the orbits of the stars, and yet never enter into a sense of their magnificence. They might know all that commentators have told concerning the Bible, and yet its truths might remain hidden from them. While engaged in the anatomy of the flesh they might miss the incarnated word. Zeal in the construction of doctrine and argument might divert them from the higher truths they sought to gain, and in the end leave them with a formula instead of God. Whatever they acquired in the way of learning they must not allow the spiritual eye to grow dim. Christ spoke with authority because he spoke of things he had seen and known, and drew the sublimest truths from the deep wells of his own experience.

The singing was led and the anthem sung by the choir of Brookfield Church, Gorton, under the direction of Mr. Earnshaw, the organist.

THE MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

The annual meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday, July 2nd. The proceedings opened with a Communion Service, conducted by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin. This was followed by a Devotional Service, conducted by the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, M.A.

At 11 a.m. the President, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., took the chair, and in the course of his address dwelt upon the necessity of their speaking as ministers from the actual experience of their own souls. We thank God, he said, for the dead, who are, in all the real life of them, alive for evermore. In us as well as for us may they live! But we are living, too, and of our own life no doubt can defraud us, being sober-minded and in health. The aim of a living Church must be to bring men closer to God in being closer to each other, in better understanding, more cordial esteem, clearer judgment and happier co-operation. The duty of the preacher is to show how safely and, indeed, profitably we may all live this mutually open life, by being first of all himself the unreserving revelation of his honest life endeavour. Two great calm facts keep me calm: 1st, That my flurry will not alter the divine will; and 2nd (which ought to come first), that the will of the good world is divine. We must guard against the snare of abstractions. To understand Christianity is to understand Christian men, or it is not. If not, I know neither what Christianity is nor how to get at it at all. Apart from men essentially like ourselves, I cannot find it. The rites of religion are men's devices and arrangements. The Scriptures are men's scriptures. The creeds are round-table averages, drafted and trimmed by saintly or semi-saintly wire-pullers. The Church is truly a body of individual believers—more or less. We must come to individual persons for that out of which all the rest springs, all creeds, schemes, philosophies, theologies. The more a man sanely knows of himself the more he knows of all men and of all men's moods. Paying heed to my own nature and experience, I know not only why Isaiah trembled at the vision of the worshipping cherubin and the Lord of Hosts; but also why Buddha gave up worshipping the gods, and Luther defied Rome. I know how it is that men love each other much, and really trust each other a great deal, and help each other more and more.

The Gospel is the assurance of God in me. Tell me that Christ died for men. He did; he died for me and you. But tell men so by your love and all your keen vitality, so that they also may live as he did, not in scraps of sentiment and fragments of tradition, but from the God within. Tell men the Bible is full of inspiration. It is. Were it twenty times as faulty as men find it, there is no book like it to touch my heart. I have left off counting the cracks in the cup, I am too thirsty for the water it holds. If there be no Christ in me, how shall I know Christ anywhere? Tell men as nearly as you can what Jesus and Paul were like; but rather tell us of your own birthright of divinest life. Tell us, my brother, to be of courage, not so much because we are helped, as because we can help.

You cannot flatter our truth and our love. There is ever a serious and reverend angel at the threshold of the holy of holies. His face takes on something, the best thing, of the features of all the sweetest, noblest souls known to me in my life, shown to me in history, or imagined as of worlds to be. There is nothing in his looks to frighten me; but something to soften and subdue, while it comforts and blesses me. In good John Bunyan's words: "It breaks my heart and fills me full of joy." To meet that angel as I go to my preaching is to feel all my mind in a flame that burns up the dross and leaves the pure gold of the gospel there. I think him then to be an angel indeed, one sent. What if I were pure enough in vision to see that which is the sender too!"

The above are only portions of a striking and helpful address.

The new members enrolled were the Revs. D. Davies, John Evans, W. Harris, E. S. Hicks, C. Smith, T. P. Spedding and J. Worthington, to whom a welcome was extended by the Rev. D. Agate.

The annual report dealt with the work of the past year, including the holding of services at Windermere and Colwyn Bay. Similar services have already been started again this year at Windermere, and it is expected that another series will be held at Colwyn Bay. The President elected for the ensuing year was the Rev. J. A. Kelly, of Dunmurry, Ireland. Treasurer, the Rev. T. P. Spedding; secretary, the Rev. W. R. Shanks. A hope was expressed that next year services might be conducted again somewhere in the Isle of Man.

At the afternoon session short papers were read on "Changed Conditions and New Needs" by the Revs. W. E. Atack, A. H. Dolphin, and J. A. Pearson.

The Rev. W. E. ATACK thought that the changed conditions in life generally during the past few years had something to do with the decline or the insufficient attendance at and interest in public worship. Conservatism in method is worse than conservatism in expression of belief, if a true religious gathering together be the end in view. The conditions of life to-day have made it absolutely necessary that strong emphasis should be and must be laid upon the social problem, the conditions of life under which people have to work and live. "What is the use of preaching the Gospel to a hungry man?" is not an impertinent question. He did not suggest that preachers should become political economy lecturers, but he thought they ought to emphasise the fact that religion was life. It was painful to know that hundreds of those interested in uplifting man from bodily and mental serfdom were separated from or even opposed to religious organisations, because they felt that the religion taught was indifferent or opposed to their highest instincts for the development of manhood. What they had to do was to show by their teaching and in their methods that religion was for man in all circumstances, and that it had its part in uplifting man in body, mind, and spirit.

The Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN said conditions were changed owing to the new and increased knowledge of man's surroundings. The prejudice against new ideas was lessening, and there was a kind of expectant attitude for new things. That was their opportunity. First a reconstruction was necessary. Criticism was going on not merely amongst the cultured, but also in the workshops and homes of the people generally. But the needs of the human soul could not be satisfied by the affairs of the intellect alone. A living gospel must be of character and life as well as of opinion. They must be consecrated to serving the world and doing good.

The Rev. J. A. PEARSON said that organisation was needed for the attack on the world of ignorance and wickedness which were often found together. Instead of stopping in their pulpits, ministers should hold open air meetings, and demand that the laity should go with them and declare the truth that is in them. Counting the cost was an art in which Unitarians were about perfect. In the sister art of taking risks they were, after more than a century of life, largely without experience. As ministers their business was to put men on their mettle, to urge them to go into public life, to serve their fellows. As a Church they must take their share in life, and no longer leave it to individual responsibility. Armchair, fireside Christianity would never achieve those things. Men still need the assembling of themselves together, the nervous encouragement, the strenuous inspiration of numbers and of an impassioned minister.

A discussion followed, in which a number of the ministers present took part. Afterwards all the members had tea together, and then spent a very pleasant hour in speaking to the usual sentiments and toasts.

UNITARIAN sermons, if we are to judge by the circulation they obtain, are not popular reading with our laity, nor, it is to be feared, even with those whose chief business it is to preach. People will tell us that they are too busy for such kind of literature, which is of course but another way of saying that they have little or no interest in it. To the German Emperor it would seem that time is as abundant as interest is universal, and amid his multitudinous occupations he can spare a few minutes for the perusal even of a sermon by an English and Unitarian minister. A German member of the Leeds congregation having lately sent to Admiral Hollmann the April number of the "Mill Hill Pulpit," entitled "Revelation, Past, Present, and to Come," received from him an acknowledgment, together "with what will be no doubt very welcome news to you, that His Majesty the Kaiser, to whose Highness I handed the sermon, has read it with interest and was much pleased with it"—"und über den Inhalt sich gefreut hat."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following: A.L.B.: J.B.: J.E.C.: W.J.E.: R.T.H.: W.H.: C.R: R.R.: T.P.S.: Q.U.: A.M.W.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

APPEALS.

London: George's-row Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers writes:—"I should be much obliged if you would kindly allow me to appeal to friends who would contribute to our convalescent and excursion funds, which much need help. I should be glad to receive donations sent either to the Domestic Mission, George's-row, St. Luke's, E.C., or to 4, Durley-road, Stamford Hill, N."

London (Deptford).—Mr. George Ward, 101, Effingham road, Lee, S.E., secretary of the Sunday-school, pleads on behalf of the children for help towards their summer treat. The Church helps, but members cannot do all that is needed. Contributions may be sent to Mr. Lee or to the Rev. A. J. Marchant.

Glossop.—A garden fête and sale of work was held on Thursday, July 2, in the grounds of the Deputy-Mayor, Councillor H. Partington, J.P., in aid of the liquidation of the debt on the church and parsonage. Favoured with glorious weather the function was a complete success in every respect. Nothing had been spared by the host to minister to the enjoyment and comfort of the 500 visitors who paid for admission. The extensive and beautiful gardens were very artistically decorated, and among the numerous attractions were selections of music by a brass band and a company of mandolinists and guitarists. Tea was served at small tables arranged on a spacious lawn in front of the house, while another lawn was utilised as the market-ground. Here there were six stalls beautifully draped, and laden with multifarious wares, the whole of the articles having been given by three generous friends of the congregation, viz., Mrs. Edward Partington, wife of the mayor, Mrs. Herbert Partington, and Mrs. Isaac Jackson. The financial result of the fête, which lasted six hours, is a sum of £205. Since 1899 over £1,000 has been raised by the congregation by similar efforts for the same purpose, this being the third bazaar within the period. About £500 is still required to clear the whole debt, which, when the new church was opened in 1896, stood at the disconcerting figure of £1,770. Great praise is due to the congregation for the manly spirit with which it has faced this heavy burden, and the great and sustained effort it has put forth to remove it.

London: Little Portland-street.—The first of a series of open-air services was held in Regent's Park on Sunday evening last by the minister, Rev. H. S. Perris, M.A., instead of the ordinary evening service in the chapel. About twenty connected with the chapel attended, including several members of the choir, and some forty or fifty others joined in and listened quietly and attentively to the proceedings. Three hymns were sung, there was a short reading and prayer, and an address was given by the minister, pointing out that whereas official orthodoxy made demands with which many of them were unable to comply, the ethical and religious teaching of Jesus set up a standard to which all might rally. The short service was felt to be encouraging, and the experiment will be carried further. The meetings will take place each fine Sunday evening of July at 7 P.M. on the ground set apart for public speaking, not far from the Gloucester Gate entrance to the Park.

Hinckley.—The Sunday-school anniversary sermons at the Great Meeting were preached on Sunday afternoon and evening by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A. The attendance was numerous, a pleasant feature being, as usual, the presence of many well-wishers from other communions. The goodwill of all concerned was shown in the collections, which gave a total of £25 2s. 6d. Mr. Tarrant's sermons were very helpful, and a charming effect came from one of his own hymns, "If I were a Blackbird" (suitably set to music by Mr. Hugh Atkins), sung by the very youngest of the scholars, and by them only. The whole of the music was heartfelt and good, especially so some vocalised sentences, "Take heed to yourselves," &c., and the duet and chorus "I Waited for the Lord" (Mendelssohn).

Manchester District Association.—The Governing Body paid its tenth monthly visit on Saturday, this time at the invitation of the Monton congregation, and was supported by a considerable number of friends from the district churches, The worship of a large congregation was conducted by the Rev. W. E. George (Swinton), and the sermon was preached by the Rev. George Evans (Gorton). Mr. Evans took for his text Romans xvi. 3, "Salute Priscilla and Aquila my fellow-workers in Christ Jesus," and engaged the serious attention of his hearers. Following the custom, tea was served immediately after service, and then, in the interval before the public meeting, the visitors wandered about the churchyard, or gazed on the remarkable stained-glass windows glorious with the light of heaven for a background, or sauntered gently in Broadoak Park. Few, however, were enticed away from the meeting for which, along with the service, they had come, and fully 260 persons gathered to listen to the earnest speeches of earnest men, and sit under the presidency of that veteran in religious and social work, Alderman Harry Rawson. The chairman had gladly acceded to the wish that he should preside. Rev. Ambrose Bennett was at one with the objects of the Association, and hoped that the visit would leave strong marks behind it in the renewed vigour of his vigorous congregation. Mr. R. C. Law encouraged the workers of all the churches to a more faithful service. Rev. H. J. Rossington touched the heart of the meeting by his impassioned utterance, and Mr. Dendy made every one in the audience humbly anxious to be worthy of the great gospel we have to declare among men. The speeches were crisp and to the point, and left time for a quartette from the choir to delight the gathering with some well-chosen musical items. With the hymn "Now on land and sea descending," and the Benediction, friends separated, thankful for another opportunity of worshipping and meeting together.

Ainsworth.—The annual Sunday-school sermons at the Presbyterian Chapel were preached on Sunday afternoon and evening by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, B.A., of London. Anthems were rendered at each service by the choir, under the direction of Mr. James Mason. Mr. A. J. Wilson presided at the organ. The collections amounted to a little over £34.

Liverpool Sunday-School Society.—The annual summer meeting and service was held on July 4th at Birkenhead, about fifty members and friends responding to the cordial invitation which the Society had received. It was a beautiful day, and the afternoon was spent in rambles of varying lengths. Tea was served in the schoolroom at Bessborough-road, after which a service was held in the church, conducted by Rev. James Crossley. Rev. W. J. Jupp gave a very interesting and helpful address on "The Natural Religion of Childhood," in which he urged the development by simple methods of the latent religious feelings natural to all children. It is to be regretted that, presumably owing to the number of engagements at this season, many of the schools connected with the Society were either wholly unrepresented, or represented only by a very small proportion of the teachers on the books, as all who were present felt that such meetings promote good fellowship and increased zeal for the work in which all are engaged.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas's-street.—On Friday week the annual choir excursion took place to Arundel. The sum of £1 2s. was collected on the previous Sunday in aid of the local hospital.

Cirencester.—The anniversaries of church and school just held were attended with great success. The sermons on Sunday last were preached by the Rev. J. Worsley Austin, M.A., special anthems being given by choir and children.

Accrington.—A friendly controversy with Father Edmund Lester, S.J., arising out of a course of Lenten sermons preached at the church of the Sacred Heart has just been concluded by the Rev. W. H. Burgess in the local press. It has served to put clearly before the public the respective Catholic and Unitarian positions on some fundamental points, and it is hoped that some misunderstandings may have been removed. On Sunday, July 5, flower services were held. The Rev. J. Morley Mills (Bootle), preached afternoon and evening, and conducted a young people's service in the morning. The choicest flowers were afterwards sent to the Cottage Hospital.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday-School Union.—The annual picnic of the Union was held at Glossop on Saturday last. The ministers present included the Revs. A. C. Fox, W. C. Hall, C. E. Oliver, H. Bodell Smith, and N. Green. One hundred teachers and friends partook of tea in the schools, after which a ramble, under the leadership of Rev. A. C. Fox, was taken over Whiteley Nab. On the hillside a halt was made, and several Whitsuntide Hymns were sung, Mr. W. Woolley acting as conductor. At an informal meeting held afterwards, Mr. A. Slater presiding, a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the Glossop friends for their hospitality. The Chairman gave details of the work of the schools in connection with the recent bazaar in Manchester. The Cheshire stall was at the head of individual stalls, and a total sum of £175 was handed to the bazaar treasurer. The weather, which was threatening during the morning, proved excellent for walking, and the whole picnic was enjoyed by all present.

Cardiff.—The Sunday-school anniversary was held on June 28, when there was a full muster of scholars, and Mr. Harwood preached appropriate sermons. The school treat, combined with a congregational outing, took place on Wednesday, July 1, at Barry Island. Delightful summer weather prevailed, and everything passed off successfully. Mr. Harwood was present, and altogether 260 sat down to tea. The teachers are to be congratulated upon the success of their efforts.

London: Stamford Street.—(FAREWELL PRESENTATION.)—A well-attended meeting was held on Wednesday, July 1, to bid farewell to the Rev. and Mrs. Frederic Allen, the chair being occupied by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards. A hymn having been sung, Mr. A. W. Harris read letters of apology for non-attendance, and expressing good wishes from Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, Mrs. Midlane, Miss L. Martineau, Miss Preston, Messrs. C. F. Pearson, W. H Abraham, John Harrison, R. J. Gregg, and others. The chairman spoke of the deep regret felt at the severance of the connection between the church and Mr. and Mrs. Allen and Mr. F. Edwin Allen, and testified to Mr. Allen's excellent work there and elsewhere. A resolution of grateful recognition and good wishes, proposed by Mr. James Welch, seconded by Mr. George King, and supported by Revs. G. Carter, A. J. Marchant, Edgar Daplyn, R. H. Greaves, and F. Summers, and Messrs. E. S. G. Warren and J. Bredall, was unanimously carried by acclamation. After an interval for refreshments, Mr. James Welch, on behalf of a number of subscribers and friends, handed Mr. Allen a purse and an illuminated address, the latter being subscribed:—"This address, together with a purse containing fifty guineas, was presented by subscribers and friends attending the Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel to the Rev. and Mrs. Frederic Allen at a farewell meeting, as a token of appreciation of their earnest labours during Mr. Allen's ministry, and as a record of the high esteem in which they are held. Accompanying the address and purse a tea service was presented to Mrs. Allen. Messrs. A. W. Harris, J. C. Pain, and F. W. Welch having spoken, the Rev. F. Allen acknowledged, with much feeling, both the gifts and the kind expressions of appreciation. On the preceding Friday presentations had been made on behalf of the Band of Hope and Mercy to Mr. F. E. Allen, and on Sunday, June 28, Mr. Allen received a gift from his Bible-class. On Thursday, July 1, the members of the mothers' meeting, at their excursion, gave Mrs. Allen a beautiful gold brooch, while on Sunday last Mr. F. E. Allen received gifts from both scholars and teachers in the school. At the concluding services of Mr. Allen's ministry on Sunday there were excellent congregations. In the morning he spoke more especially to the Boys' Own Brigade and other young people upon "The Value of Character." In the evening there were many signs of deep feeling at the parting between minister and people.

Walmsley.—The annual sermons were preached last Sunday, afternoon and evening, by the Rev. A. R. Andrew, B.A., of Gee Cross, and the scholars' service in the morning was conducted by Alderman Wm. Healey, of Heywood. There were large congregations all day, and the collections with donations amounted to £52.

Chowbent (Atherton).—Very large congregations assembled here on Sunday last, when the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, preached the Sunday-school sermons. The collections on the day in aid of the school funds amounted to £65 15s. 9d.

Saffron Walden.—On Sunday the 84th anniversary of the General Baptist Sunday-school was commemorated with special services, hymns, &c. The Rev. J. A. Brinkworth preached in the morning on the "Teachers' conception of the Word of God," in the evening on "Home life and influence." The musical part of this service was most efficiently conducted by the Excelsior Band of the town, the members of which entered with heart and soul into the occasion. The building was filled in every part, and the collections were good. Mr. Brinkworth has been presented by three Sunday-school scholars in America with "The Royal Scroll Pen Pictures from Genesis to Revelation," issued in Chicago. It is a very portable case, 17 in. by 16 in., forming a stand for itself when opened; inside, mounted on rollers, are 156 pictures, reproduced from the master paintings of the world, some large, some small. By winding the rollers with the key supplied these are exhibited in succession. There is descriptive letterpress for each picture, and both a general index and one for the pictures.

Scarborough.—The Congregational and Sunday-school picnics were held on Friday, June 26, and Saturday, July 4, respectively: the first to Thorntondale, a picturesque seventeen miles drive to what is said to be the loveliest village in Yorkshire; the second to Swainton by rail, when Mr. H. J. Morton, J.P., the oldest member of the Church, who has always taken a great interest in the children, generously undertook to bear the whole of the expenses. Both days were extremely enjoyable.

Pentre (South Wales).—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, June 28. The preachers were the Rev. Lewis Williams, Ciliau Aeron, and the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans, Cwmbach. The first sermon in the evening was delivered in English by the Rev. D. Jenkins Evans. The morning congregation was a meagre one. The afternoon congregation nearly filled, and the evening congregation quite filled the chapel. Owing to recent heavy calls, the collections were not as good as those of last year. On Monday, the 29th, the annual tea party was held, which passed off most pleasantly. The profits are expected to be substantial.

Birmingham: Hurst-street Mission.—A specially interesting gathering was held at this mission on Saturday last, when representatives from the various mission agencies met to say "Good-bye" to Miss Newman, who, owing to her approaching marriage, has resigned the post of assistant missionary, which she has held for the last three years and a half. On behalf of the mission workers and his own, Mr. W. J. Clarke paid a high tribute to the value of the services Miss Newman had rendered, to the gracious and kindly spirit in which her work had been done, and to the place she had won for herself in the hearts of all who had had the privilege and the satisfaction of labouring with her. He asked her to accept from the various mission agencies a number of beautiful gifts as tokens of grateful remembrance and loving goodwill—gifts which might be regarded as poor enough when measured by their material value alone, but which were priceless when measured by the love and the fellowship of spirit they were meant to convey. The gifts, which were eight in number, from as many agencies associated with the mission, each bore a suitable inscription, and they were accompanied by an illuminated and framed address from the mission workers generally. Miss Newman, who was too deeply affected to make any speech in reply, begged that all would accept the assurance of the love and gratitude which words failed her to express, together with her heartfelt hope that God's blessing would ever rest upon the mission and the work it was striving to do for God and man. On the following Monday, the 6th inst., the annual Sunday-school excursion was held at Alvechurch, about 450 of the scholars, teachers, and friends spending together a truly happy and enjoyable day.

Hope, the paramount duty that Heaven lays,
For its own honour, on man's suffering heart."—Wordsworth.

AT the great meeting to be held in the Albert Hall this (Saturday) afternoon, organised by the Evangelical Free Church Council, to protest against the London Education Bill, there are to be 10,000 seats free, and none are to be reserved after 3.30 p.m. Dr. Clifford and Mr. Lloyd-George, M.P., are among those announced to take part.

THE time is short; the more the reason then
For filling it as full as it can hold
With thrills of beauty, yearnings for the truth,
And joys of love and labour manifold.
Then, should it chance, as we would fain believe,
Life's glory waits us in some other sphere,
Its first great joy shall be we did not miss
God's meaning in the glory that is here.
—T. W. Chadwick.

THE longer I live, the more obvious it is to me that the most sacred act of a man's life is to say and to feel, "I believe such and such to be true."—T. H. Huxley.

CHEERED by the presence of God, I will do at the moment without anxiety, according to the strength which He shall give me, the work that His providence assigns me. I will leave the rest; it is not my affair.—Fenelon.

Sweet as a Rose, where "Sanitas" goes.

"SANITAS."
BEST OF ALL
DISINFECTANTS,
AND THE ONLY ONE FIT FOR DOMESTIC USE.

"SANITAS."
FRAGRANT, NON-POISONOUS,
CLEAN AND NATURAL.

"SANITAS."
1/- Pint Bottles and 1/- Tins, Powder.
3d. Bars Soap.
Of all Chemists and Stores.

"HOW TO DISINFECT" BOOK FREE.
"Sanitas" Co., Ltd., Bethnal Green, London, E.

Contractors to H.M. Government.

NEW RICHES FROM OLD MINES.

Who would value raw grains if all the arts of milling and preparing them were lost?

Similarly, nuts (which are foods of enormous value) have been unappreciated because the art of preparing them has been neglected.

HUGH MAPLETON, Colonial House, Ardwick, Manchester, is now making from nuts, rich, nourishing, digestible foods. Write to-day for descriptive price lists.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, July 12.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton. Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M.; Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, M.A.
Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.
Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 7 A.M., Rev. A. THOMPSON, "Can Man control his Fate?"
Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M and 7 P.M., Rev. F. W. STANLEY.
Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Deptford, Church-street, 11.15, A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. J. MARCHANT.
Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M., Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, M.A., and 7 P.M., Rev. GORDON COOPER, B.A.
Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.
Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. A. FARQUHARSON.
Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. Gow, B.A.
Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. EDWARD CAPLETON.
Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.
Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.
Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M., Rev. H. S. PERRIS, M.A., 7 P.M. in Regent's-park.
Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. G. CARTER.
Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.
Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. S. FARRINGTON.
Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. C. A. GINEVER.
Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.
Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS.
Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, Eastthill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. V. D. DAVIS, B.A.
Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. DELTA EVANS.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M; Rev. J. M'DOWELL.
BEDFORD, Library (side room), 11.15 A.M., Rev. ROWLAND HILL.
BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.
BLACKPOOL, Unitarian Church, Masonic Hall, South Shore, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS.
BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. C. C. COE.
BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. M. LIVENS.
BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET.
CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., J. REMINGTON WILSON, M.A.
DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.
GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. GARDNER PRESTON.
LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. HARGROVE, M.A.
LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. ERNEST PARRY.
LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. J. JUPP.
LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. D. ROBERTS.
LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M. "Belief and Life," Rev. Frank K. FREESTON.
NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. E. PIKE.
OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A.
PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.
PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 P.M., Mr. THOMAS BOND.
SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. OTTWELL BINNS.
SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.
SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.
SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.
STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church, Tyler-street, 7 P.M., Rev. ARTHUR RYLAND.
TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.
WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M., Mr. J. ISLAN JONES, B.A.

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH.,
SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS

SOUTH-PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.—July 12, at 11.15 A.M., HERBERT BURROWS, "Dante, Italy, 1300—England, 1903."

ETHICAL RELIGION SOCIETY, STEINWAY HALL, PORTMAN SQ., W.—July 12, at 11.15 A.M., Dr. WASHINGTON SULLIVAN, Babel and Bible: "Delitzch on the Genesis of Hebraism."

PULPIT SUPPLY.—Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY, 28, Downshire-hill, Hampstead, N.W.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses. —For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOINSON, Pier-street.

MICROSCOPES, second-hand, excellent condition, from one-third original cost. Slides, great variety, best makers, from 3s. per doz. Write for particulars, THE NEW AGE PRESS, 8, John-street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

FREDK. LONG & SON,
AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,
4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

MARRIAGE.

CARPENTER—BROMLEY.—On June 30th, at the New Gravel Pit Church, Hackney, by the Rev. F. Summers, Albert Hemsley, youngest son of the late Thomas Daffern Carpenter, of London and Dewsbury, to Rose, second daughter of Ronald Bromley, of Stamford-hill, London, N.

DEATH.

MITCHELL.—On the 3rd July, at 41, Upper Addison-gardens, Kensington, Charles Thomas Mitchell, barrister-at-law, of 3, New-court, W.C., and Anlaby House, Aldeburgh, of heart failure after an operation, aged 60. No flowers.

Board and Residence.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged.—Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

BOURNEMOUTH.—"ARNEWOOD." Occupies a splendid position at the corner of West Cliff Road, and affords all requirements for Health, Comfort or Convenience. Sea views; close to the Winter Garden Pavilion, Unitarian Church, pier and promenade. Terms, &c., on application to Manageress.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Most comfortable private BOARDING-HOUSE; close to sea; sheltered among the pines; south aspect. Billiard-room (full-sized table). Terms moderate.—Address, Miss CHALDECOTT, Stirling House, Manor-road.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH, DEVONSHIRE.

An ALL-THE-YEAR-ROUND HOLIDAY and HEALTH RESORT for YOUNG LADIES or SCHOOL GIRLS.

Sea and Moorland. Home comforts. Walks, games, excursions, sketching, music, bathing, picnics, &c.

Weekly terms. Prospectus and Guide Book from THE PROPRIETOR.

EASTBOURNE.—Comfortable private BOARDING HOUSE, close to sea and Devonshire Park. Terms moderate.—Mrs. FRANK HARRIS, Falconhurst, Jevington gardens.

BOARDING HOUSE.—THE FELL, TROUTBECK, WINDERMERE, is situated 550 feet above sea-level, and about 2½ miles from the station at Windermere. Every home comfort.

Situations, etc.

WANTED, a situation as Ladies' Companion, age 18. Not been out before.—Apply to The Parsonage, Conigre, Trowbridge, Wilts.

FOR SUMMER VACATION.—Mutual terms. Lady, speaking French and German, seeks light work. Good references.—Address, WASA, INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

GOVERNESS.—Lady recommends young Lady, L.R.A.M., bronze and silver medallist, and teacher's certificate R.A.M.; has also a thorough knowledge of French and German languages, acquired abroad; would take situation as resident in private family or good school, either England or Colonies. Excellent testimonials. Open to holiday engagement.—Reference, Miss E. HOLT, 36, Alexandra Drive, Liverpool, S.

WANTED.—Capable Lady Help, servant kept, no small children.—Full particulars to C., West Dene, Pendennis-road, Streatham, S.W.

NURSE (SUPERIOR) wanted for 3 children, 6¼, 3 years, and 5 months. Good wages.—Mrs. PHILIP ROSCOE, 28, Denning-road, Hampstead, London.

SITUATION WANTED for a Lad indoors. Apply to Mrs. CONWAY, Brooklands, Ringwood.

Just Published. Crown 8vo. 2s. net.

THE PAST, THE PRESENT, AND THE FUTURE.

By MARTIN R. SMITH,

Author of "What I Have Taught My Children."

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

"The basis of my contention, easily stated and perfectly comprehensible, is that birth into the present life is NOT the genesis of the Spirit, but merely one of the myriad experiences and opportunities of its upward career."

LONGMANS, GREEN, AND CO., 39, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

JOHN PAGE HOPPS' MONTHLY.

THE COMING DAY.

ENLARGED. PRICE THREEPENCE.

Contents for JULY.

A Study of Emerson as Teacher.
Personal Prayers.
Christian Missions in India.
A Dialogue between a Missionary and Three Chinese Converts.
A Lunatic's Will.
Concerning Spiritualism—What is the Use of it?
A Lover's Fancy.
Notes by the Way. Notes on Books, &c.

London, Edinburgh, and Oxford: WILLIAMS and NORGATE, and all Booksellers.

In Cloth, Price 1s.; Stout Paper, 6d.

THE HUNGARIAN UNITARIANS.

Some Account of their Origin, Vicissitudes, and Present Condition.

Compiled from various sources by M. LUCY TAGART.

"Miss Tagart has done well to collect a number of most interesting papers and sketches bearing upon the history and the existing state of our Unitarian brethren in Hungary and Transylvania. . . . The booklet excites and keeps attention from beginning to end."—Christian Life.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING OFFICE, 5, Furnival-street, Holborn, E.C.

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS

By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

DAILY MEDITATIONS

(Fourth Edition Revised.)

NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.

Cloth, red edges, 6d.; roan gilt, 1s.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

HOLY COMMUNION.

JUST PUBLISHED.

For OPEN BROTHERHOOD,
For the CHRISTIANITY OF JESUS,
AND
The KINGDOM OF GOD WITHIN US.

BY

H. RAWSON & Co., New Brown St., Manchester.

PRICE 2d., OR BY POST 3d.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2½% repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES

Purchased and sold for customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Schools, etc.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN, NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON (Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.
AN UNSECTARIAN FIRST GRADE PUBLIC SCHOOL.

HEADMASTER.—GUY LEWIS, M.A.

Opened September, 1900. Foundation Scholarships.
Next Entrance Examination, July 15th.

SINGLETON SCHOOL, DUBLIN, FOR TRAINING GIRLS FOR DOMESTIC SERVICE.

Required in October, or earlier, a Lady of experience and special training in domestic science, to act as Principal of the Singleton School. Salary £60, with board, residence, &c., and assistance in the duties. Apply to Rev. G. H. VANCE, Hon. Sec. to the Damer Governors, Ashfield Park House, Harold's Cross-road, Dublin, &c.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress, Miss ESTHER CASE, Certificated Student of Girton College, Cambridge, Classical Tripos.

2nd Mistress, Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc.

In the arrangement of each pupil's work, the aim is to secure thoroughness in all that is undertaken without undue pressure and strain.

The house stands on high ground in a good open position. A few boarders received.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17, Mincing-lane, E.C.
Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.
F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.
Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.
STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD, 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate. — Saturday, July 11, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3186. NEW SERIES, No. 290.] LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 473
ARTICLES—
The Fountain at Perugia 481
In Praise of Holland—II 482
Channing's Influence 484
Domestic Mission Work 485
For Efficiency 485
LITERATURE—
Studies in Theology 475
Is the Family Ideal also the Social Ideal? 476
More Abbey Sermons 477
Short Notices 477
OBITUARY—
Mrs. Dornan, Oldham 478
Mr. Charles T. Mitchell M.A. 478
Mrs. C. D. Badland 479
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 479
POETRY—
Cleabarrow 478
The Old Chapel 484
"The Gleaner" 486
LEADER—
The Completed Census 480
CORRESPONDENCE—
Hibbert Journal 478
Good News from Brussels 478
Passive Resistance 478
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 486
ADVERTISEMENTS 487

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AFTER July 21, and during August and September, the Editor requests that all correspondence may be addressed, not to his house, but to 3, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

WE hope to publish next week the address on "What our Young People can do for their Churches," given by the Rev. J. J. Wright at the service in Ullet Road Church in connection with the annual meeting of the National Conference Guilds' Union on April 21. This address should be in the hands of all members, and Guild secretaries are asked specially to note this publication, and to secure sufficient copies for the members of their Guilds.

THE Circular, with full particulars for intending visitors to Amsterdam for the International meetings, September 1–4, and the preliminary programme, of which we gave particulars last week, has now been sent out, with a form for definite application for tickets, &c., to all those who have asked for such information. The application forms are to be returned to Mr. Ion Pritchard, at Essex Hall, not later than July 28. Any other friends who think of joining the party should therefore send at once to Essex Hall for copies of the papers.

ON Saturday, one of the hottest of dog-days, the Albert Hall was crowded with the largest meeting in its records. It was not pleasure, but grim earnest, that brought some 18,000 people within its walls, while multitudes were turned away at the doors for lack of room. Of course, the occasion, like all others in history, furnished food for the kind of mocker who is just now well represented on the "leading journals." How absurd to get so hot in weather so fervid of itself! How humorous to talk of conscientious objection to a Bill voted for by so large a majority of anti-Boers! And how especially inept to burden Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, or whoever else is to lead the Liberals in the next Parliament, with the task of undoing the mischief of last year's Act! In such wise the ready writer sat in the seat of the scorner. But the London Nonconformists saw and see things otherwise.

No doubt the counsel of those who have experience in these things is justified. Some abatement may be made on the score of "worked-up enthusiasm." And even then the occasion seems to us one of the most significant in our times. The protesters of this year will be the passive resisters of next, if the London Education Bill passes. The final stages of this Bill are now reached; and the Government, like some of our more or less famous generals, hopes to "muddle through" with it somehow, in spite of its amazing blunders in the earlier stages. If last year's Act were not on the statute-book, how readily, we imagine, they would run away from this inglorious field! But the destiny of Governments, as of men, streams over their heads from their past; and we can expect nothing quite so useful to London, and so humiliating to Mr. Balfour, as the surrender of the Bill. Well, let him pass it, as he can; but last Saturday's vast and determined throng assures him and the country that grave and persistent, if not even dangerous, troubles are ahead.

THE suggestion made by not a few at the present time, that Mr. Chamberlain's fiscal programme had been announced—it has hardly been defined—with the view of drawing the red-herring across the trail, seems not over-sagacious to anyone who remembers how thoroughly the Colonial Secretary has in recent years forsaken his old domestic policy in the pursuit of high imperialism. Of course, he is a dexterous electioneer, teste the unscrupulous campaign that gave Mr. Balfour his huge majority. But it is superfluously suspicious to attribute to him the notion that Nonconformists will somehow forget their wrongs in the hubbub of a difficult economical discussion. We suppose him to be genuinely anxious to weld our colonies into vital union with the mother country, and to be not unworthily fascinated by the vision of a greater empire than the world has ever seen. In pursuit of such vision, however, men's feet may easily trip; and it would appear that, in spite of the cheaply won support of the "glory"-loving mob, well dressed and otherwise, there is rising against him the just indignation of moderate-minded and yet serious people, who mark the levity with which he tramples on principles, not only dear to himself in former days, but dear to those very citizens of Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, to secure whose good-will he is ready to risk so much.

IT is appalling to think that at this stage of our economic and educational history it should be necessary to restate, in the language of the schoolroom, but for the benefit of our adult enfranchised citizenhood, the very elements of the science on which our policy of unfettered trade is based. Since, however, the fact of that necessity is unfortunately beyond doubt, one must be grateful that there are men who, like Mr. F. W. Pethick Lawrence, have the patience and the ability to restate and enforce by arguments what one had supposed to be axiomatic, and to do so in a simple and concise manner, calculated to bring absolute conviction to any mind not already poisoned by the bias of trade or class interest.

IT is the supreme merit of Mr. Lawrence's pamphlet on "Free Trade or the Zollverein" ("Echo" office), that he has compressed within sixteen pages, and within the price of one penny, the whole of what it is essential to say, either in defence of Free Trade or in condemnation of the so-called Zollverein. Mr. George Herbert Perris's shilling book on "The Protectionist Peril" (Methuen & Co.) will, however, be welcomed by many for the greater detail and fuller statistical analysis which its size and scope allow him in his discussion of Mr. Chamberlain's proposals. Both publications are wholly admirable both in conception and execution, and it should be matter of no small pride to readers of THE INQUIRER that two such able journalists have been reared in our own household of faith.

EVIDENTLY the Church of Scotland is not to be allowed to blink its creed. The Disestablishment Council, following up a characteristic counterblast by Dr.

Hutton, has issued a manifesto on the "Scottish State Church and its Statutory Obligations," in which the Church is very sharply brought to book. Referring to the decision of the last Assembly it says:

The General Assembly of 1903 has itself, in so far as it has power to give effect to its decisions, given liberty to all its ministers and elders to believe and teach, not necessarily according to the terms of the Confession and subscription to it, but permissively, in the light which God, as Lord of the Conscience, and through the Holy Spirit, may give to them on the meaning of the Holy Scriptures as the supreme standard.

The State took from the Church its freedom to believe and teach, save in accordance with the Confession and in terms of subscription to it, when it established it, not on an indefinite, variable, individual interpretation of Scripture as the supreme standard, but, as it designed, on a definite, fixed, subordinate standard, defining the sense of Scripture, inscribed in the statutes of the realm. The establishment has now taken from the State its security that the privileges and emoluments given in return for the fulfilment of its statutory obligations shall be henceforth used for that purpose, by liberating itself collectively, and its ministers individually, from the necessity of fulfilling these statutory obligations.

The State cannot continue the establishment and endowment of the Church on a basis which has neither definiteness nor stability; and the Church cannot honestly retain its establishment and endowment, while undermining its statutory basis, and asserting, without consent of the State, its spiritual independence.

The Council calls for the repeal of the Statute Establishing the Church in Scotland, but apart from the question of disestablishment the situation is significant.

As the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock Place, on Wednesday afternoon, the busts of Emerson and Martineau, given by Mr. Passmore Edwards, were unveiled by Mr. Choate, the American Ambassador, and Mrs. Humphry Ward, in the presence of a large gathering. The busts, which are in white marble, are the work of Mr. George Frampton, R.A., and are both striking likenesses. Emerson is represented with a gleam of humour lighting up his face, perhaps hardly the happiest conception for a permanent bust of the great seer, but very pleasant to look at. The profile of the Martineau bust is very noble; a first view of the full face we did not find so satisfying, yet the likeness is unmistakable.

MR. PASSMORE EDWARDS, who presided at the unveiling, recalled his early memories of both Emerson and Martineau. He quoted a sentence from a sermon of Martineau's, which he heard in Liverpool nearly sixty years ago, and which had remained in his memory; "Whatever we may do solely for ourselves perishes with us: what we do disinterestedly for others lives for ever"; and he told of Emerson's giving three lectures in Exeter Hall at his request in 1847, in aid of the Early Closing Association, then sorely in need of money, and of £200 gained thereby.

MR. CHOATE, having unveiled the bust of Emerson, read an address full of warm appreciation of "one of the greatest Americans," and repeated, with happy effect some of the best known of his verses, including the Fable of the Mountain and the Squirrel. Emerson, he said, was a Puritan of the Puritans, and in early life became a Unitarian minister. But even the gentle trammels of that mild communion could not long contain his independent soul; he gave up his sacred office and retired to his ancestral village of Concord, where he devoted himself to plain living and high thinking for 40 years, and to the deep reading, writing, and lecturing by which he obtained his livelihood. In his teaching, Mr. Choate said, Emerson appealed always to the highest motives, instincts, and passions of our nature, moral, intellectual, and spiritual, and was never content to discover and repeat what other men had said and thought on the subject in hand, except to illustrate his own thoughts and conclusions, which he evolved fearlessly from his own inner light. The subjects he treated embraced the whole range of human life, conduct, and aspirations, and his mission was to arouse, to stimulate, and elevate the public and private life of America to a higher and nobler plane. He rescued American literature from the sluggish and torpid stream in which it had been long confined, and lived to see it flowing in a broad and ever-widening current which refreshed and animated the whole of their national life. An admirable report of this address and Mrs. Ward's will be found in Thursday's Times.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD unveiled the bust of Dr. Martineau, and said that nothing could be more fitting than its presence in the hall of that Settlement, of which he was one of the founders, that the calm and noble presence of that "Knight of the Holy Spirit" should shine among them and give a touch of poetry and dignity to all they did. Mrs. Ward then told of Dr. Martineau's early interest in the Settlement and of his intercourse with Emerson. The power of both, she said, was poetic; though Emerson, perhaps, was more poet than philosopher, and Martineau more philosopher than poet. Yet they were both more than poets, they were soldiers of liberty, soldiers, in Heine's sense, of the Holy Ghost, and life-long seekers of the truth.

MR. ARTHUR SHERWELL gave an address at a special meeting of the Garden City Association on July 9, at Exeter Hall, on "The Liquor Traffic in Garden City." As Garden City is intended to be managed in accordance with the wishes of its inhabitants, the drink traffic can be municipalised only if the community as a whole desires it. But Mr. Sherwell advocates that course as the best, and proposes that the income resulting from it should not be used in reducing rates, because thereby the ratepayer might be led to believe that it was to his interest that the consumption of intoxicants should be large. He is convinced that the first charge upon the profits should be the provision and maintenance of adequate counter-attractions to the public-house, such as social institutes, polytechnics, concert halls, and gymnasia.

DR. WHITON, in his last Daily News column (July 7) on "Religious Life in America," recorded the speedy termination of Dr. Heber Newton's engagement as University preacher at the Leland Stanford University, California, and his return to New York. It was not, it seems, that the preacher proved too liberal for his new environment; his ministrations met with a very warm response, and the man who in New York promoted "religious conferences in which Unitarians and Jews participated" was proving how well he could use his great opportunity in the University; but unfortunately the position was still dominated by the will of a despotic woman, Mrs. Stanford, the widow of the founder of the University, and this Dr. Heber Newton found intolerable.

DR. WHITON'S concluding paragraph on "Burying the Hatchet" we quote in full:—

Among the movements toward Church union that are mooted from time to time, the occasional conferences between Unitarians and Congregationalists in New England have a peculiar significance. The Church founded by the Mayflower Pilgrims at Plymouth, and all but one of the oldest Churches of the Puritans in Massachusetts, became Unitarian. The controversy was very bitter for half a century. But in the theological readjustments enforced by modern science and criticism, that upheaval of volcanic peaks was followed by a period of subsidence, and mutual appreciation dawned again. One tie between the parties was never disrupted—the Massachusetts Convention of Congregational Ministers. Organised in the Colonial period, this still meets yearly to listen to a sermon preached by a Trinitarian and a Unitarian in alternate years, and to transact benevolent business. At the recent May meetings of the American Unitarian Association in Boston, large audiences were addressed by representative men of both wings on the subject of reunion. They admitted that they now differed less from each other than they differed from their grandfathers, who originated the "present separation." Transformed ideas of the universe, and consequently of God, had brought them nearer together. Such a situation may not be fairly appreciated in England, where antipathy to Unitarians is far more pronounced than in New England. The inner significance of it is simply this, that in degree as the results of modern science and criticism are understood and accepted by religious men, the theological controversies of the past are superseded.

READERS of THE INQUIRER will be interested in the article by Mrs. Bosanquet in the current International Quarterly on the "Administration of Charity in England," wherein she very earnestly renews her plea for better organisation, and for the avoidance of outside competition in the legitimate sphere of the operations of the Poor Law Guardians. There is, as she truly remarks, so large a field of supplementary and pioneer work open to voluntary charity, that it is deplorable that it should "waste its energies and resources in doing less efficiently the work which the machinery of the Poor Law has been created to do."

To many philanthropic workers who are striving to save the deserving poor from the pauper taint, or to raise the undeserving poor to a position in which they also may be saved, Mrs. Bosanquet's views as to the unwisdom of many of their activities will seem unnecessarily harsh. But it must be borne in mind that the Poor Law itself, in its treatment of children, old people, and those handicapped by illness and infirmities, has become vastly more human than it once was, and that the reasons why sensible people should eschew its aid for themselves or for those in whom they are interested are rapidly disappearing.

As for the able-bodied poor, no one contends that they are all without the power to benefit from extra-parochial aid. But, it is certain, nevertheless, that, where charity is unorganised and passes through inexperienced hands, at least as much harm is done by encouraging shiftlessness, and standing between the natural pauper and his workhouse task, as good by putting really "deserving cases" on their feet again. Opportunity of work rather than doles is what is needed, and the problem of how to provide this is unfortunately a deeper one than can be solved by the judicious bestowal of a few annual subscriptions.

THE hospital out-patients' departments are, according to Mrs. Bosanquet, among the worst offenders in the matter of competition with the system of Poor Law relief. The parish doctor, supplemented by the club doctor and the doctor of low fees, would, she very reasonably contends, do far better for the people, in nine instances out of ten, by visiting them in their homes, than can the over-taxed staffs of the big hospitals, who can at best give their casual callers but a few seconds of their time, and can obtain in most cases no real knowledge of the constitution and environments of their patients. Mrs. Bosanquet's remedy is the old one of a Central Hospitals Board working in co-operation with the Poor Law Authorities, as a branch, ultimately, of an all-embracing "Charities Board."

OUR memory of the genial presence of the Rev. Ernest Fontanes at the meetings of the International Council in London two years ago adds to the sorrow with which we record his death. Only last year he retired from the active duties of his ministry in Paris, where, after earlier settlements at Montpellier and (for thirty years) at Havre, he began to preach in 1887. The paper read by M. Fontanes at the International meetings on "The Contribution of France to Religious Progress" will be remembered; and it is included in the volume of Proceedings. As a preacher he exercised a deep influence, as a pastor and friend he was held in the warmest affection. To those most nearly touched by the sorrow of this parting, we would offer the expression of our heartfelt sympathy.

This week has also brought news of the death of Mr. W. E. Henley and of Sir Joshua Fitch.

LITERATURE.

STUDIES IN THEOLOGY.*

FOR THE NEW BIRTH OF RELIGION.

THIS is a book rare indeed in the sustained quality of its excellence and in its essential unity, the more remarkable because it is simply a collection of essays and addresses produced at different times in the course of seventeen years, and not by one mind, but by two. Of the highest value in itself, it is at the same time a beautiful monument of the friendship of two kindred minds, knit together in early college days, and through the deepening experience of many years enriched by ample knowledge and the finest spiritual discernment, fitted as few others of their generation for the great work of teaching in the things pertaining to the higher life of man.

"Shadows we are, and like shadows depart," the publishers' sign on the title-page declares, but the authors have added a better motto for their book, marking the character of their aspiration and their faith by two sentences from the New Testament (printed in the original Greek): "Every perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of lights, &c." "For we also are His offspring." Not as groping among the shadows with little hope, but as bringers of light, these two men are known among us, as those to whom some vision of the Highest has been granted. Standing in the morning of the new day, seeing what knowledge has achieved and what its significance must be for religion, for the perfecting of our ideal of human life with God, they have become for us interpreters and prophets of the abiding things of the Spirit.

It was a happy thought which led to the gathering up of these essays and addresses, college lectures, and one sermon, into a permanent volume, and the dedication is no less happy: "To Otto Pfleiderer and Henricus Oort." Brother scholars in all simplicity offer this tribute to representative teachers of liberal religion in Germany and Holland. From their great schools of thought and research English scholars have learnt much. This volume bears witness that they have not learnt in vain.

The volume contains four of Mr. Carpenter's public lectures as professor of Ecclesiastical History and the History of Religions in Manchester College, the earliest, on "Three Ways of Salvation," having been given in London at the opening of the session in 1884, the latest on "The Education of the Religious Imagination," at Oxford in 1898. There is also the opening lecture on "Sociology and Theology," given in 1888 by Mr. Wicksteed, as Dunkin Lecturer on Sociology in Manchester College. Each author contributes an Essex Hall Lecture, that by Mr. Carpenter in 1895 on "The Relation of Jesus to His Age and Our Own," and that by Mr. Wicksteed in 1899 on "The Religion of Time and the Religion of Eternity"; and similarly we find the two papers read at meetings of the National Conference, Mr. Carpenter's at Sheffield in 1897, on "The Place of Immortality in Religious Belief," and Mr. Wicksteed's at Leicester, in 1900, on "The Fear of God and the Sense of Sin."

Mr. Carpenter includes the address on "The Liberal Faith" which he gave as President of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at the London meeting in 1901, and Mr. Wicksteed's other contributions are his annual sermon before the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in 1892, on "The Significance of Unitarianism as a Theology," an essay on "The Place of Jesus in History" (1887), and an essay on "Religion and Society," published originally in a volume by various authors, issued in 1891 by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Of the rich contents of this book we shall not attempt here any review. On one point in Mr. Wicksteed's last essay on the constitution of society, we are glad to append to this notice a criticism, which we trust will draw from him a further elucidation of the subject; but for the rest, we are content simply to call attention to the fact that these writings, with which many of our readers have long been familiar, are now gathered together in a volume which may be thankfully added to the collection of one's choicest books, and which, we must hope, will go out far and wide to find many new readers among earnest seekers of the light.

In a recent notice of Mr. Carpenter's "Bible in the Nineteenth Century" we noted the great help for the interpretation of the religion of the Bible derived from his abundant knowledge of other ancient religions. In the College lectures here republished this interest is largely enforced, and it furnishes one of the most striking features of the book, another being the insistence of both writers on the rital concern of present day religion with the social ideal and problems of social reform.

A complaint sometimes made against Unitarians has been of the shallowness of their rationalism and the poverty of their spiritual life. If there are any who seriously believe such faults to be inherent in Unitarian methods of thought and life, let them read what Mr. Wicksteed has to say in the first lecture on the "Religion of Eternity," and with this ponder also his sermon on the significance of Unitarianism and the essay on "The Fear of God and the Sense of Sin." Only the most superficial dogmatist could deny that here are profound searchings of the things of the spirit, with a most reverent touch, and an insight which can minister to the seeking soul of the divinest realities of life. Note on p. 101 the passage on the fear and the love of God, and on p. 165 the final interpretation of the sense of sin. One passage from the first lecture we will quote:—

It were indeed a vain and presumptuous thing to say that any one of us can establish himself in a life which shall be independent of all that Time can give or take away; but, none the less, just those things that Time cannot touch constitute our dearest wealth. Just in so far as we have love which shall survive, though that to which it clings be taken away from us—in so far as we have wisdom which shall abide, though the knowledge from which it was gathered fade away—in so far as our fruition has brought us to a sense of the worth of life which will triumph over any downfall or wretchedness that may be in store for us—in so far as our sorrow has brought us into the wide fellowship of human suffering and anguish, and given us a tenderness that shall endure though years of placid comfort should flow over us—in so far as we have reached a life not subject to change or the workings of Time, so far we have some sense of eternal realities, so far we may feel that we see God, and may, though with awe-struck humility, ask whether haply in some measure we are seeing as God sees.

* "Studies in Theology," by J. Estlin Carpenter and P. H. Wicksteed. London: J. M. Dent & Co. 1903. 5s. net.

To this we will add one other quotation, that the joint authorship of the book may be visibly represented here, and as a fitting conclusion to this notice. These are the closing sentences of Mr. Carpenter's lecture on "The Education of the Religious Imagination":—

That God is, may be said to be the perpetual discovery of the whole race. What God is, we know by His self-disclosure in the holiest souls, in proportion as we can repeat afar off their experience through its quickening power upon our own. To be the medium of this vivifying influence is the calling of the teacher of religion. If you undertake it you must strive to be loyal to its conditions; you must arm yourself against its difficulties and dangers, as well as look forward to its privileges and joys. Gravest of difficulties, most subtle of dangers, is the secret mistrust of the worth of the divine vision within you. It will seem so strange that others cannot recognise what you behold, or are indifferent to what kindles you with hope and love. The hour may come when you may have to stand alone. There is a Calvary, or something like it, once at least in most men's lives, when the oppositions of evil are too strong for us, and purposes are broken, and resolution falters and dies. The glory that has lighted other days may set in gloom. Take refuge, then, in the faith of Jesus, and the vast multitude whom that faith has upheld, and you will know in God's good time that He is sure. Through them He will tenderly quicken your souls afresh; the might of trust will rise in new unconquerable life; and you will front what seems like moral chaos, and not quail.

Whoso has felt the Spirit of the Highest,
Cannot confound nor doubt Him, nor deny;
Yea with one voice, O world, though thou deniest,
Stand thou on that side, for on this am I.

IS THE FAMILY IDEAL ALSO THE SOCIAL IDEAL?*

IT is not often that one turns over the pages of a new book with such gust and refreshment as in the case of Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Wicksteed's "Studies." But abler hands than mine are required for the treatment of its various subjects; and my only purpose at present is to set forth a difficulty which will be felt by many as well as myself in connection with Mr. Wicksteed's last essay, in the hope that it may draw still further help for us from him. Mr. Wicksteed holds that the family "is to be the type" of those "wider and more complex relations," which, "in their regenerated form," will constitute the ideal human society. Whereas the prejudgment at which many of us had arrived was that the immemorial distinction between the family ideal, and that of society as a whole must be regarded as statical.

It is significant, in the first place, that Mr. Wicksteed changes the point of view from time to time by speaking of "human brotherhood," apparently as a synonym for "family feeling." This seems to suggest that the "family" idea is not held strictly as such; and it is to be noted that when people speak of "brotherhood" as a universal ideal they clearly mean it, as a rule, n a loose and figurative sense. But, unfortunately for this interpretation, Mr. Wicksteed leaves us in no doubt; he presses the "family" idea much harder than this. But how can all men, belonging to different families, ever come to have any feeling for one another approaching the feeling of members of the same family? Family means much more than brotherhood. Burns sang that we should "brithers be an' a' that," but not that we should also have universal fatherhood and sonship and the rest. It is easy to see why, when a metaphor was taken from among the several relationships inside the family, that of brothers was chosen. "Brotherhood (or "sisterhood" among women) lasts longest upon the average, and is the one that, being least specific, can be most easily copied in outside social practice. The relation of brother and sister, which lasts perhaps as long, is less easy to copy. The relation of father and son lasts for a shorter time, and is still more specific; while the remaining relations cannot even be thought of as universalised. I might think of all men as standing nearly in the relations that I have to my brothers, but scarcely so of the next relation mentioned, still less of the next, and the last would be intolerable. It is the mere concrete, empirical fact, that the specific family feelings are not called for in civic relationships. Often enough, in the history of thought, a metaphor has hardened into a formula. And so in this case of the "brotherhood of man," flowing from the "fatherhood of God," to which many people have a half-conscious aversion of which they do not understand the cause, but which is entirely justifiable. When Jesus, pointing to his disciples, said, "Behold my mother and sisters and brethren," he was choosing one of two alternatives, and not developing or enlarging a mutual family affection (it appears to have been lacking on the part of his family) into a world-wide relationship. To strain family feeling into a universal application is surely to obscure the salient and characteristic ideals of the larger society—viz., justice, utility, equity, efficient government, art, patriotism, religion.

But perhaps Mr. Wicksteed intends us to look chiefly to the economic ideals of the family, or, at any rate, to keep in view its "harmony" of egoism and altruism. Mr. Wicksteed's treatment of this part of the subject is most helpful. But if, with Mr. Wicksteed, we repudiate the psychology which sharply divides the egoistic from the altruistic impulses, and yet continue to defend the merging of the social ideal into the family ideal, is it not because we are still unconsciously under the influence of the evil psychology which we are combating? If the family is not the scene of the tame and undifferentiated altruism sometimes imagined, and if the state is not the unholy embodiment of brutal selfishness, why this obliteration of specific ethical functions? We really need not descend to the poor level of the straw-man objector on pages 340-1 in order to find a social ideal when we have rejected the claim of the family to be that. Mr. Wicksteed gives only this one alternative, and that the most violent. But there are many others! Now, I know that Mr. Wicksteed knows all this, at least as well as a novice in social theory like myself, and, therefore, I am bewildered to find this parsimony of alternatives.

One difference between the family and the society, which is insurpassable by any amount of changed ethical outlook, is that the children inside the family are descended from certain people, and the people outside are descended from others. This is a fact that "winna ding" to sentiments. And, on the other hand, our union with society is in one sense more compulsory and ultimate than our union with the family. We can "leave home" and its bonds, but we can scarcely throw off all human relations. St. Paul, therefore uses the symbol of an organic human body, and not the family symbol, to express the thought of social unity. And, lastly, it is safe to say that the economic conditions of the family which permit its economic interior reactions can never be reproduced outside.

Moreover, if, as I think, the family ideal is not the social ideal, is it even the modern socialist ideal? (I am not sure whether the remark on this point on page 332 is a quotation from Spencer.) Mr. Sidney Ball, in his fine essay, "The Moral Aspects of Socialism" (Fabian Tract, No. 72), remarks, "The older Socialism rested upon such ideas as the right to live, payment according to needs, &c.—all ideas of retrogressive rather than progressive 'selection.' But these ideas are either silently ignored or expressly repudiated by modern Socialism" (p. 4). Again, "Socialists not only accept the 'idea' of individual property, but demand some opportunity for its realisation" (p. 20). When Mr. R. Blatchford, who is not a dialectician, harks back to the older "family" Socialism, he puts himself at the mercy of M. Bosanquet, who is supremely a dialectician (see "Some Aspects of the Social Problem"). At any rate it would seem to be a perilous venture for any scheme of social reform to tie itself up to a communist or family-state theory. The whole of present-day Socialism sets itself to obtain social "justice." Is it not precisely because we are now attaining a specific, definite conception of the State, which is neither the family ideal, nor the waste-howling "aggregate" of thinking animals of Philosophical Radicalism—let alone the dragons' grappling in the slime of evolutionary hedonism—that we can cherish great new hopes for the future?

I should have liked also to ask Mr. Wicksteed to turn his great analytical powers upon the rather fly-blown formula of Maine about status and contract; for writers like Professor Jenks, of Oxford, have made us suspect its glitter of generali-

* "Religion and Society" in "Studies in Theology."

sation. But I realise my temerity: my excuse must be in the noble words prefixed to the first essay in the book.

W. WHITAKER.

MORE ABBEY SERMONS.*

"To a man, who will not think," says Archdeacon Wilberforce, "religion is apt to become a formality or an absurdity." The statement seems, at first sight, a truism, but experience of ecclesiastical dogmatism teaches that the fact needs iteration and reiteration. The title of the Archdeacon's latest volume of sermons—"Feeling after Him"—indicates his own sense that a thoughtful, reverent endeavour towards some solution of the "riddle of this painful earth," should "earn the reward of the quiet mind, for it leads to a gradually expanding conception of God."

The note, struck in the author's former volume—"Sermons Preached in Westminster Abbey"—is echoed throughout the present collection; it sounds forth the Fatherhood of God, and the consequent brotherhood of man. In the light of that truth, rendered yet more luminous by the knowledge that the God, who reveals Himself as Father, also announces His name as Love, the preacher, in his sermons on "Auto-Suggestion" and "The Origin of Evil," discusses the theory that all evil is remedial, and an incentive to moral perfection. His readers are urged to recognise the "logical impossibility of any essence, person, matter, spirit, or principle, existing in antagonism to the resistless omnipotence of God, for even a fraction of a second, without the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God." In forcible language, he contrasts the statement (1 Chron. xx. 1), "Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number the people," with the parallel passage (2 Samuel xxiv. 1) "God moved David to number Israel," and he draws the inference, which finds majestic utterance in Isaiah xlv. 6, 7, "I am the Lord, and there is none else. I form the light, and create darkness. I make peace, and create evil."

"In what sense," asks Archdeacon Wilberforce, "does the Self-Existent, the All-Powerful, say: 'I create evil. I move David to number the people?' 'In the sense, that the conscious stirring of His indwelling life creates a standard, which causes certain actions to be evil, by contrast with that standard, which were not evil, before it was given . . . 'I create shadows,' says the sun. There were no shadows till I arose; all was dark together; now, I have arisen, and shadows are because of me,'"

Belief in the far-off triumph of good, and the ultimate conformity of every child of man to the "image of God's son" is finely expressed in such sermons as "Predestination," and "God is Love." In the sermon on "Optimism," the author boldly insists that the theory that God, being irresistibly omnipotent, could have prevented evil, and did not do so, albeit it is irremedial, and will be endlessly triumphant, is "worse than atheism; it is Bad-Godism—practically devil worship." In this connection the writer points out that St. Paul fearlessly attributes evil, in all its magnitude, to its only possible source, when he states that the creature was "made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of" its creator. Then the Apostle dogmatically affirms that evil is only temporary—only a means to an end. "The creation," he says, "shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption." Finally, he deliberately reckons up the sum total of the world's agony, as establishing a claim on the justice of the Creator, and declares that the future shall abundantly redeem the "sufferings of this present time."

The sermon on "The Silence of God" contains an able review of differing conceptions of the Supreme Intelligence. Of Pantheism, which, in all its multitudes of shades and modifications, persists in identifying the universe with God—the thought with the Thinker—the writer says:—"It is a profound idea. It has deeply, influentially affected the human mind. . . . But, in this conception, God has no conscience, no memory, no will. He is an idea, slowly realising itself in being." Of the conception, which, "while it protects the supremacy, the individuality, the sanctity, and the moral character of the Omnipotent, does not violate the deepest instincts of humanity," Archdeacon Wilberforce remarks that it "represents God, as the one Eternal, Self-Existing Essence or Intensity, the constraining law of whose being is Love." "This God is self-conscious in the perfume of a flower, self-conscious in the brain of a mathematician."

The sermon on "The Immanence of the Logos" teaches that as the visible universe is the word made matter, and the Holy Scriptures—including, in a sense, the Vedas, the Zend-Avesta and the Koran—are the Word, made letter, so humanity is the Word made flesh, for the All-Father has "uttered Himself in generating human sons." Of the Eternal Reason, or Logos, "enclosed in the spotless human life, called Jesus of Nazareth," we read:—"He is a Theophany, an individualisation of the infinite self-consciousness of God . . . . pleading with us in a form wholly lovable." The sermon "What think ye of Christ?" gives this answer to the question which forms its title:—

"I think that though God is immanent in all humanity, He specifically incarnated in Jesus of Nazareth an aspect of His nature and character, indiscoverable in any of His other manifestations. . . . The Incarnation is God saying to the world, 'Homo sum, et humani a me nil alienum puto.'"

Sympathy with modes of thought, differing from his own, breathes through all Archdeacon Wilberforce's utterances; and in his sermon, "All Things work Together for Good," he deplores the intolerant theological schemes, "which have grown out of the fatal mistake of ignoring the 'alls' of Holy Scripture." Such attempts to define the indefinable, and such wholesale denunciations as are found in the Creed, falsely attributed to St. Athanasius, have apparently very remote kinship with the Archdeacon's teaching on the doctrine of the Triune nature of God. Thus, in his sermon, "Universalising the Christ," he says:—

"Hold in your hand a full-blown rose; you are holding a beautiful analogy of the Trinity. You are holding, first, essential life, that Divine mystery which haunts and pervades the minutest capillary of the tiniest blade of grass; you are holding, secondly, visible form or manifestation, that evolution of beauty in which essential life is manifested; and, thirdly, from these two comes forth the subtle mystery of perfume, pervading your senses; and though essential life is not manifestation, and manifestation is not perfume, these three are essentially and indivisibly one. In the nature of God, these inseparable, but not identical modes of life are revealed as Essential Godhead, Manifested Godhead, and Outflowing Godhead"—[in theological terms, as Father, Word, and Holy Spirit].

It would be a pleasant task to review such sermons as those on "Free Will," "Missionary Obligation," "The Holy Eucharist," and "Spirits in Prison"; and, above all, to inquire into the practical side of Archdeacon Wilberforce's teaching, as shown, for instance, in his beautiful sermon on "Love to God—Service to Man." But the space at our command is already exhausted, and it remains only to commend very heartily, in one concluding word, this inspiring book to the careful attention of readers of THE INQUIRER.

ANNETTE CALTHROP.

* "Feeling after Him." Sermons, preached for the most part, in Westminster Abbey. By Basil Wilberforce, D.D., Archdeacon of Westminster, Chaplain to the Speaker, Select Preacher before the University of Oxford. London. Elliot Stock, 5s.

SHORT NOTICES.

Christopolis: Life and its Amenities in a Land of Garden Cities is another Utopia, but has nothing to do with the garden city project, and its sub-title is misleading. It tells of a land where the Christian principles of love and brotherhood have solved most of the evils that trouble us. There are no "fashions," only development and change to better things; there is no servant problem; all wish to do their share of the work. Co-operation is established. There is but small difference in the amount earned by different people. The state is the only capitalist. There are no gaols and workhouses; no idle people. Great social reforms come about by the unanimous desire of the people: in this way all sale of intoxicating liquors has been prohibited. This "unanimous voice" is opportunely able to solve all difficulties of government. It has even overcome all religious disagreement, for all the people in Christopolis believe the whole Bible "as it stands." The last chapters are an inadequate argument against rationalists, biblical critics, and materialists and give the impression that the amenities of Christopolis have not proved quickening to the critical faculty. No doubt it is well to indicate the need of a religious basis for social reform, but the present volume is not practical nor poetic. Its best characteristic is the insistence on the application of Christian love to all life's affairs. (S. W. Partridge & Co., 2s. net.)

SEE that no day passes in which you do not make yourself a somewhat better creature; and in order to do that, find out first what you are now. Try to get strength of heart enough to look yourself in the face, in mind, as well as in body.

John Ruskin.

CLEABARROW

("CLOVER-HILL").

At Clover Hill there sings a rill
  Amid the rocks and rushes,
And many a rose above it blows
  And fills the bower with blushes.
Go, sing them east, and sing them west,
  Thou rippling little rover,
But ever, ever sing thy best
  Beside the Hill of Clover!

From tree to tree how fair to see,
  Beyond the daisied meadow!
The lake shines bright in silver light,
  The mountains stand in shadow.
May blessings fall on great and small
  That happy valley over,
And still the dearest bliss of all
  Rest on that Hill of Clover.

W. G. TARRANT.

July 13, 1903.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.

SIR,—Will you allow me to thank you for the article in your last issue on the Hibbert Journal? Your interpretation of the Journal as a sign of the times deserves most serious attention, and is, in my judgment, entirely correct.

If you err at all it is in using terms somewhat more eulogistic than the facts warrant. It is, I am convinced, too early to say or imply that the Hibbert Journal is an assured and established success. I think the position may be justly described as one of great promise, but I should be unwilling, for my own part, to commit myself to stronger language.

Since you are good enough to speak with approval of my own part in the work, may I be permitted to emphasise a fact which has some importance in this connection? The idea of a Hibbert Journal did not originate with me. I came upon the scene at the eleventh hour, when the burden and heat of the first and more difficult day's work had already been borne by another. In assigning the credit which belongs to the arduous first step in the undertaking the name entitled to chief remembrance is unquestionably that of Dr. Hicks.

L. P. JACKS.

GOOD NEWS FROM BRUSSELS.

SIR,—I have the pleasure of announcing to our Unitarian friends that on Saturday last, 11th inst., the Court of Appeal gave judgment for us in the two new actions the town of Brussels had brought against us with reference to the pastor's indemnity for house-rent. It is probable that, as in the first action, the town will carry the case before the Court of Cassation. But, anyway, this decision is a good step towards the final conclusion of this long litigation.

JAMES HOCART.

PASSIVE RESISTANCE.

SIR,—I really feel bound, in justice to the cause of Passive Resistance, to take exception to a phrase on the front page of the current issue of THE INQUIRER.

You say Passive Resistance is breaking the law, but I fail entirely to see how it can be so. I am a Passive Resister myself, and secretary of the local league, and I do not like to feel that you—who express yourself in sympathy with the movement—may be preventing others, whose weak point is this very one of law-breaking, from joining.

To break a law, I conceive, something must be done, but we are doing nothing; we are refusing to voluntarily carry out the provisions of a law, but are allowing the authorities to carry them out for us in such a way as the law provides them for them to do. Mr. Edward Robertson, K.C., says Passive Resistance is not illegal, hence not law-breaking.

Moreover, if it were law-breaking, I, for one, should not alter my ground, for I think the law of God, as expressed in the individual conscience and soul, is to be obeyed before the law of a government who have set the former at nought, and it behoves the citizens of the realm to rise and save the nation from moral destruction.

"Procrastination is the thief of time," and if we wait for "constitutional means" as you suggest, we shall probably wait till the wedge of priestcraft has been driven too far home to be extracted.

W. L. TEASDALE.

Wolverhampton, July 14, 1903.

THE proposal of the Admiralty to establish a new dockyard at St. Margaret's Hope, on the Forth, has led the officers of the Garden City Association to urge the desirability of building and arranging the new town, which will spring up, on a well-considered plan, looking to the beauty and healthiness of the place in which thousands will eventually live. The Scotsman says: "The proper course is for the authorities to make provision now for the reasonable possibilities of the future." It is but reasonable that sufficient land should be secured on which to provide houses for the families that will be brought there by the action of the Admiralty, with all the advantages of a garden city. The Dundee Advertiser says: "It should be possible to direct operations from the first, so that all streets shall be wide and orderly in disposition, and the after-development of a slum-land impossible."

MUCH needed enlargement of the premises of Renshaw-street Mission, Manchester, is to be proceeded with at an early date. A generous anonymous donor has given £1,000 towards the cost. A larger scheme for the improvement of the premises of both mission stations, Willert-street as well as Renshaw-street, and providing accommodation for children and others who cannot now be received through lack of space, is in abeyance for the present.

Clever men : : : : are as common as blackberries; the rare thing is to find a good one.—T. H. Huxley.

OBITUARY.

MRS. DORNAN, OLDHAM.

A TRIBUTE of appreciation and grateful remembrance is due to this true mother in our household of faith, who passed away on the 8th inst. in the seventy-third year of her age. From her father, Mr. Jonathan Taylor, who stood by Lord-street chapel with unflinching courage and patience through many years of discouragement, she received the spirit of conviction and loyalty to the liberal faith which continued with her to the end. To many, far and near, her death will mean the sundering of sacred ties of friendship and of links that bound together three generations of staunch workers for religious freedom in the Oldham district. In her private life she won the highest confidence and respect, and was true as steel to every duty and obligation in the home as in the church. Since the death of her husband, about fifteen months ago, her health had been failing, but she carried on her activities with self-forgetting energy till a few weeks ago. She was then partially disabled by a paralytic attack, and though there seemed every prospect of recovery she sank to rest without struggle or suffering. Mrs. Dornan had a large number of friends in the Unitarian ministry, and besides her own minister, the Rev. J. A. Pearson, two others, the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, of Wakefield, and the Rev. J. C. Odgers, of Bury, took part in the services at the house and at the grave. By all present her departure was keenly felt, and her helpfulness and hopeful and courageous spirit will be greatly missed.

MR. CHARLES T. MITCHELL, M.A.

WE had to record last week with great regret the death of Mr. Charles T. Mitchell, who sank after an operation performed at his own home on Friday, July 3, aged 60. On the following Monday the body was taken to the Crematorium at Golder's Green, where a short service was conducted by the Rev. Frank K. Freeston; and the interment took place at the Aldeburgh Parish Church on the following morning, Canon Thompson officiating.

At the close of service last Sunday morning the Committee of Essex Church, Kensington, passed a resolution of sympathy with Mrs. Mitchell and her daughters, and expressing their sense of the loss sustained by the congregation, of which Mr. Mitchell was a highly valued member. Charles Thomas Mitchell was the son of Dr. Robert Mitchell, surgeon, and was born at the Manor House, Deptford, on Dec. 16, 1842. He was educated at the Blackheath Proprietary School, from which he gained a scholarship at Caius College, Cambridge, where he had a distinguished course, and came out Third Wrangler in his year. He was subsequently called to the Bar.

It is not only, however, for his position at the Bar, but for his early social work in the East-end of London, his eager interest in Higher Education, and his chivalrous support of unpopular moral reform that he was highly respected, and will be honourably remembered. The Solicitors' Journal has the following note:—

"By the death of Mr. C. T. Mitchell, Lincoln's-inn loses a restlessly vigorous mind and character. A high Wrangler and Fellow of Caius College, Cambridge, he was called to the Bar in 1868, and had a considerable practice, with the good fortune to represent the South-Eastern Railway Company. But his profession commanded but a relatively small portion of his time and intellect. Science in many forms was his absorbing interest. Applied mechanics were his special hobby; a regular attendant at the meetings of the Royal Institution, he was himself an inventor of many practical appliances relating to domestic health and utility. . . . At the same time, he was full of humanitarian ideals, and found time to give valuable assistance to such institutions as the Charity Organization Society, the Metropolitan Association for Befriending Young Servants, the Social Purity Movement, the Tenant Co-operators, and other similar societies. Wherever there was good work to be done, which needed keen intelligence and devotion, however unpopular it might be, he was ready to give time and toil to it, provided that no shibboleths of theology or politics were required of him. For all these he had an unrestrained scorn, which often brought him into rude shocks of argumentative conflict with many of his fellows and even of his friends. But it was impossible not to admire and respect the leading quality of his life and character—viz., the desire to go straight to the central truth in everything, in spite of accepted opinions or prejudices; and, having found it, to drive it home, if need be, with a sledge-hammer, regardless of conventions or feelings, and to apply it practically in the cause of mankind, and especially for the help of the less fortunate classes. His presence and assistance will be missed in many quarters outside Lincoln's-inn."

Of Mr. Mitchell's social work the Daily News also writes:—"When the great agitation led by Mr. W. T. Stead arose in 1885 Mr. Mitchell was fully prepared to take up the legal side of the matter, and he was the principal adviser of the promoters of the Criminal Law Amendment Act of that year, which has done so much to revolutionise, not only the law, but the public opinion of the country in favour of the protection of the young against immoral attack. As soon as the Bill was passed he became, and was ever after, a vigorous member of the National Vigilance Association, which was founded mainly in order to work the Act, and he continued almost to the last day of his life a most valuable adviser, especially on legal affairs, not only of its committee, but of its secretary in his daily practice. He was one of the most upright and high-minded of men, and those who knew him feel deeply the loss of a faithful friend."

MRS. C. D. BADLAND.

THE news of the tragic death of Mrs. Badland, wife of the Rev. C. D. Badland, of Whitchurch, from a cycling accident, will have been received with sorrow and the profoundest sympathy by a wide circle of friends. Mr. and Mrs. Badland were spending a holiday in Wales, and on Thursday evening, July 9, were cycling in the neighbourhood of Towyn, when Mrs. Badland, in passing a laden timber wagon, attempted to dismount. She fell against one of the horses, and both wheels of the wagon passed over her chest. Her husband, who was riding behind, was powerless to render any help. In face of such a tragedy of personal grief one is silent, but with a silence that becomes a prayer, that the Divine compassion may sustain those upon whom this blow has fallen.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

HINDERERS AND HELPERS.

I EXPECT that all of you think and plan what you are going to do and be when you are grown up.

Many boys mean to do as their fathers do, and look forward to having a share in their father's work. But whether you plan to follow your father's work or not, be sure that you plan to be a worker.

Who would not rather be a worker than an idler?

It is bad to idle away one's time, neither playing nor working. And worse even than an idler is a hinderer—one who hinders work, getting in the way, keeping back the workers, making them behind with their work.

Who would not rather be a helper than a hinderer?

I once saw a very little girl come out to the door where her mother was cleaning a bicycle. The child came forward, saying at once, "Can I help you, mother?"

Though she was not yet three years old, she had already learned to help in many ways; but she was rather too small to clean a bicycle! She would have hurt herself.

However, her mother was pleased that her little daughter should want to help her. The child looked on and did not touch, kept still and did not get in the way. She could not help, but at any rate she did not hinder. And her mother was pleased at that too.

If the mother had had to keep saying "don't touch," "don't come so near," the work would have been harder, and would have taken a longer time. So the child did help by keeping still, and not hindering.

You would all like to be helpers, I am sure, And when you cannot help, remember that you can at least not hinder. That is next best to helping. It is indeed sometimes the best sort of helping.

Does it not help mother if you keep the younger children happy, so that she is not hindered in her work? And you may often help mother by just not bothering her yourself, when she is busy. Do you not sometimes hinder her by fidgeting when she is doing something for you? Just to keep still is often the best way of helping. The children all know what "hard work" it is to keep still. Surely they will be glad to "work hard" for mother sometimes by keeping still.

We all like to help—when we think of it. But I am afraid we often don't think; and we get in the way and hinder others. stop their work and make it more difficult.

Children are often hinderers at home just from idleness. They have nothing to do, so they get in the way!

If you have no work to do for mother or anyone else, find something to play at. It is the idle hands that get their owners into mischief and make them hinderers.

I have seen an idle child turn hinderer by spoiling another child's play. Is that really fun? Sometimes, too, idle children think it fun to tease people who are busy. But it is a mean sort of fun to make a play of spoiling or hindering another's work. It is never really funny to hurt or hinder anybody.

We often find hinderers at home. Are there ever also hinderers at school?

To be fidgety or inattentive, to whisper or make signs to make other children inattentive, hinders them and hinders the teacher too. It is not easy work to go on teaching a lot of children day after day for weeks, or Sunday after Sunday all the year round. Would you make the teacher's work harder by hindering? But if there are no hinderers, if all work together, then it may be happy work for all.

If your teacher asks for any special help, in opening a window, or passing round books, or holding a map, I expect that there would be any number ready to give that help. You cannot all help in that way, but you can all help by not hindering. We do not want any hinderers either at home or at school.

May the hinderers all turn into helpers!

Next week there will be a story for you. It is a very old story of a young English prince who changed from an idler into a worker, from a hinderer into a helper. That is just what each of us has to do, to turn from a hinderer to a helper. Perhaps that is why this old story from Shakespeare is such a favourite. This turning over a new leaf is something that we can all understand.

The Prince, whose name was Harry or Hal, helped his father to win the battle of Shrewsbury on July 21, 1403. How many years ago is that?

Next Tuesday the people of Shrewsbury are to celebrate the 500th anniversary of the battle of Shrewsbury. There is to be a lecture about the battle itself, a service in the church on the battlefield, and plays of Shakespeare are to be acted, including the one that brings in the Shrewsbury campaign.

I want you to read in your history books all that you can find about this battle of Shrewsbury and those who fought there; about Prince Hal and his father, King Henry IV.

Then, next week, I will try to tell you about Shakespeare's Prince Hal, the Idler and Hinderer. For Shakespeare makes the old battle of Shrewsbury mean so much for us all that we are glad to join with the people of Shrewsbury in remembering it.

LILIAN HALL.

THIS life were brutish did we not sometimes
Have intimation clear of wider scope,
Hints of occasion infinite, to keep
The soul alert with noble discontent
And onward yearnings of unstilled desires.—J. R. Lowell.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, JULY 18, 1903.

THE COMPLETED CENSUS.

IN the Daily News of Thursday, July 9, a most interesting account was given by Mr. R. MUDIE-SMITH of the elaborate Religious Census for London, undertaken by that journal and carried out with great resource and care during the seven months from Nov. 30 last year, when the first numbering took place in the boroughs of Kensington and Hampstead, to June 21, when the final numbering in the borough of Stepney was completed. Four hundred picked men were enlisted in this service to count the Sunday congregations at all the places of worship in successive boroughs. The work was most skilfully organised, under Mr. MUDIE-SMITH'S superintendence, so as to ensure accuracy in the figures and completeness in the returns. It was never made known beforehand which borough was to be visited, and on the whole the weather was not unfavourable to normal attendances. Thus we may accept the results as substantially correct, and must acknowledge the great service rendered by the Daily News in this matter.

The total number of places of worship visited was 2,600, of which 62 were Jewish synagogues. It will come as a surprise to many that only the Established Church and the Baptist Church are found to be represented in every one of the twenty-nine boroughs into which the Metropolis is now divided. And the result of the Census, broadly speaking, is, that of the four and a half millions of the people, over a million were numbered as attending places of worship, giving a ratio on the Daily News figures of one in 4·45 of the population. But these figures have to be modified by the estimate that among those attending services about a third were "twicers," who would thus be counted at both morning and evening service, and the final result is that the total of actual attendants is reduced to below the million, to about 850,000, and the percentage to 1 in 5·55, or 16 per cent. of the population. This does not, of course, prove that only that number are connected with churches or interested in religion. For every one in church there are, as a rule, others at home, and one may fairly conclude that more than a half of the vast population of London is associated more or less directly with church life; nor must it be forgotten, as we pointed out in a previous article on the Census, that there is a great deal of very genuine religion quite unconnected with the churches.

The results of the Census are interesting in the matter of the relative distribution of Anglican and Nonconformist churches. We quote Mr. Mudie-Smith's summary on this point :—

Our figures prove that the Established Church has almost a monopoly of the wealthy districts. Her largest majorities are to be found in Kensington, Hampstead, Paddington, Westminster, and St. Marylebone; while she has less pronounced majorities in Wandsworth, Lewisham, Greenwich, Chelsea, and Holborn. The Nonconformist Churches are strongest in middle, working-class, and slum districts. Their largest majorities are in Islington, Hackney, Camberwell, and Stoke Newington, which are middle-class boroughs; in St. Pancras and Woolwich, which are working-class boroughs; in Lambeth, Southwark, Poplar, Bermondsey, and Stepney, which are slum boroughs. A closer study reveals the Baptists to be strongest in districts South of the Thames; the Congregationalists in the North and East; the Wesleyan Methodists in the South-East and South-West; the Presbyterians attract those dwelling in upper middle-class districts; the minor Methodist bodies those of the lower middle-class districts. The Salvation Army cannot, I regret to say, be said to be strong in any district.

The smallness of the numbers of Unitarians and of the Society of Friends is naturally noted, but the great significance of the Adult Schools maintained by the latter body is not forgotten. The total of Unitarians is set down at 3,599; that of Friends as 2,271.

The Established Church holds the first place in the total reckoning, with 430,153. but the Nonconformist Churches are not far behind, with 416,225, while it is a significant fact that the Nonconformist total of men is 120,782, that of the Established Church only 98,477, its majority being made up by the preponderating number of women and children. Among the Nonconformists, the Baptists hold the first place, with a total of 99,192, and 9,207 in their missions. The Congregationalists stand second, with 91,828, and 13,707 in their missions. The Wesleyan Methodists are third, with 72,830, and 5,309 in missions. The Salvation Army total is given at 22,402. If all the Methodist Churches had been united, they would have headed the Nonconformist list, unless indeed the Baptists and Congregationalists had also been one.

From the Census, as a whole, Mr. Mudie-Smith draws some lessons which are worthy of the serious consideration of all the churches.

As the most unmistakable lesson he puts in the first place the conviction that the power of preaching is undiminished, and that wherever there is the right man in the pulpit, there the people will come. And by "the right man" is meant not one of any particular genius, but a man "with strong convictions, keen sympathies, and a magnetic personality." Therefore let the churches give heed to the training of their preachers, and demand of them above all things sincerity and a firm grip of the real things of daily life.

Another lesson is that for the great mass of the people, if they are to be gathered into churches, there is need not for elaborate ritual or Gothic architecture, but the pleasant homeliness and comfort and the strictly democratic atmosphere of large central halls, well lighted and ventilated, uniformly furnished throughout, and about such a building gathered all the activities throughout the week of what is known as an "institutional church."

This, together with the demand for sincere and practically helpful preaching, is in a line with the final lesson, that the people must be made to feel that the Churches are honestly concerned with the whole of life, that they are working for the Kingdom of God in the living present, in the city and the nation. Their aim must be the regeneration not simply of individual lives, but of the community as a whole.

There are other lessons to be drawn from the Census, as that since so large a proportion of the people stand outside the churches, preachers, and the best preachers, must go out to the people; and in Thursday's Daily News this week there is an extremely interesting collection of comments on the Census by representative members of the various churches, including the DEAN of WESTMINSTER, Dr. CLIFFORD, Dr. HORTON, and Mr. STOPFORD BROOKE. To the consideration of these we must return next week.

WE are very glad to hear from Messrs. Williams & Norgate that the figures we gave last week as to the circulation of the Hibbert Journal were considerably below the mark. Of the first number 2,000 copies were in the first instance printed, and with subsequent reprints, 5,000 in all; of the second, 4,500 (in three printings); and of the third and fourth numbers 5,000 each were at once printed, with a circulation which promises very well for a prosperous future.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden Hill, London, W., acknowledges with many thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums :—Mrs. Turnbull, 5s.; Mr. Kemp, 10s.; Mr. Campbell, £1 1s.

THE FOUNTAIN AT PERUGIA.

IN the middle of the great square of Perugia stands the fountain which for more than five hundred years has been the source and symbol of purity and health to the dwellers on its city-crowned hill. Thirteen hundred feet above the Tiber below, more than seventeen hundred feet above the sea, the ancient Etruscans reared the massive walls and built the narrow arched gates, which still guard the interior of the city. The Romans followed in their turn, but they constructed no aqueduct; and it was left for the thirteenth century seriously to design a proper water-supply for the crowded streets, the lofty palaces, and the narrow winding alleys of the mediæval town. Three miles away among the woods of Monte Pacciano, the monkish architects constructed beneath the ground vast arched chambers like some subterranean cathedral, where the waters were stored under the cool stone; and conduits brought them across hill and valley into the heart of the eager and throbbing activity on the tower-clad heights. There in the year 1280 they first ran into the square; and there they are running to this day.

Above a massive circular platform four steps lead to the lower basin. Its marble sides are divided by exquisite groups of clustered columns into fifty panels. To decorate these, the citizens of Perugia sent to the most famous sculptors of their time, Niccolo of Pisa and his son Giovanni; and they, with the aid of Arnolf of Florence, wrought the series of designs which daily exhibited to the citizens of Perugia a whole scheme of life. Other hands helped to carve the twenty-four statues which support the second basin; while the whole is crowned, above the third and highest basin (of bronze), by three Nereids bearing the griffin, perpetual emblem of civic pride and state. What, then, were the ideas to which the sculptors thus sought to give enduring form? They related, on the one hand, to the secular, and on the other, to the religious life, just as the fountain itself stands between the Palazzo del Municipio, in whose towering mass the communal sense of magnificence and power embodied itself, and the Cathedral of St. Lawrence, with the huge neighbouring pile of the Canonica, which was the scene of so many incidents in the history of the Popes.

The mediæval thinkers conceived of man as belonging to two orders: one of earth and one of heaven. By his original constitution he was made in the image of God, and not even the Fall, and all the dire tale of human sin, could altogether blot out that august parentage. In his mental powers and moral capacities, therefore, there always remained some element of the divine; and to express and nourish this was the task of the social order. The forces that guided and developed the civil life of men were not the product of blind chance; they were linked with the providential harmonies of the world; they depended on the recognition of truths of law and principles of thought which were, in fact, one aspect of the divine government of the universe.* The task of man, then, was to realise to the utmost all the higher aptitudes of a nature which still bore some traces of its pristine likeness to God. This, obviously, also required that the social conditions should enable each individual to secure the fullest opportunity of exercising and perfecting the lofty potencies of his own being. Readers of Dante will not need to be reminded how he saw in the Roman Empire the great instrument for the maintenance of peace, which was the first and most urgent necessity for that long effort after speculative truth wherein lay the highest goal of man's rational being.

The sculptures on the lower basin of the Perugian fountain are designed to enforce these ideas. The man who would attain the higher insight must not be out of harmony with himself; mind and will must accord well together. The Fall, with which the panels begin, did indeed disturb that harmony, but it did not wholly destroy it; and a series of panels, founded in part on fables of homely wit, in part on typical instances from the stories of Samson, David, Romulus and Remus, warn men against vices of pride, oppression, and cruelty, and point to the need of a well-ordered social state. They are followed by representations—some of them very charming—of the months and their occupations, in which the energies of man are portrayed in union with the forces of nature in their yearly round. The succession of the seasons had its own significance as the symbol of the beneficence of God; and analogies were not wanting between the course of the sun in the heavens and the passage of Christ through the sacred year giving life and grace to the soul. Nay, the incidents of human toil, by which the curse imposed upon the ground after the Fall was counteracted, themselves undid in the physical order some of the effects of sin, and might even be described as the "sacrament of labour."

Self-control within, and that obedience to external law which is the condition of true mastery, fitted man to approach the higher regions of speculation. There was the field for the lofty virtues of reason and contemplation. The access to this lay through the recognised disciplines of education. Here, accordingly, are portrayed grammar, which taught the right use of language, and thus secured adequate command of expression; dialectic, which implied the methods of legitimate reasoning; and rhetoric, concerned with the art of persuasion. These constituted the first division of mediæval education (the Trivium). They are followed by the four members of the Quadrivium, arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy. From the early days of Greek speculation, analogies of number had played an important part in philosophic thought. The laws of geometry had in the same way certain ideal values, representing principles of absolute and enduring reality in contrast with the fleeting changes of the world of our experience. Music was concerned, likewise, with great conceptions of harmony and proportion; while astronomy explained the relations of the several spheres, and brought men into the very presence of the Creator of the heavens and the earth. These seven sciences were the handmaids of philosophy, seated as queen upon her throne; and philosophy, wrote Dante, is "the loving use of wisdom, and that loving wisdom is most in God, for in him is highest wisdom, highest love, and highest power."

Such was the teaching of the fountain concerning the way of return for fallen human nature along the path to God. But no man can tread that path alone. He belongs inevitably to two worlds, this and the next; felicity here must be gained through the State; felicity hereafter through the Church. These two powers existed alike under the old dispensation and the new. David and Solomon, Heulixtus—reputed founder of Perugia—the Podesta and the Captain of the People (the two chief city officers in 1278), represent the civil order, of which the Roman empire, a queenly figure crowned in state, with the palm-branch of peace in her hand, is the supreme instrument and expression. On the other hand, Melchizedek and Moses, the Baptist, St. Peter and St. Paul, Divinitas Excelsa—the priesthood as the embodiment of the divine purpose for man—St. Lawrence, the doer of good deeds, St. Benedict with the spirit of prophecy, express the conceptions of the continuity of revelation and redemption, summed up in the figure entitled Ecclesia Romana. King, priest, and lawgiver, prepare the way for the dispensation heralded by John. Apostles stand as founders of the great Church of Rome; saints show forth its virtues of faith and love; and the way is thus offered by which man may gain access to eternal life.

No one can look at such a monument of mediæval thought, with any comprehension of the ideas which it embodies, and not feel how much wider was the outlook thus implied than that of much that has passed in modern days for Christianity. Again and again, in many forms did the creations of art emphasise the same teaching. At the end of the fifteenth century the guild of the money-changers in Perugia, whose hall adjoined the great Palazzo of the city government, invited Perugino to paint a series of frescoes round the walls. The artist probably followed a scheme of subjects selected for him; and the arrangement of the themes has been sometimes attributed to a noted humanist, Francesco Maturanzio, who had become secretary to the Priors in the Palazzo in 1497. The hall is a small apartment entered directly from the street. Opposite the window are two frescoes of the Nativity and the Transfiguration. The first—which is of peculiar charm—depicts the mystery of the Word made flesh; in the second, the Saviour is prepared for the final act of his condescension and humiliation, his redeeming death. Here, once more, the essential theme is the reconciliation of man to God. And for this, all history was the preparation. On the one side are the four cardinal virtues, Prudence and Justice, Fortitude and Temperance, each represented by three typical heroes of antiquity. On the other is the Father, globe in hand, with a retinue of angels, while beneath him stands a group of seers, to whom was given the vision of Messiah's advent. Under Prudence, Socrates is placed between Fabius Maximus and Numa Pompilius; she offers to guard men from doing that which, done, should make them grieve; she teaches the search for truth, and nothing can be wrought through her save fittingly. Justice finds her exponents in Furius Camillus (five times Dictator), Pittacus, who laid down the rule over Mitylene when his administration had restored good government, and Trajan, who held so high a place in mediæval veneration. Fortitude is aptly typified by Leonidas, who has Sicinius Dentatus on his right, and Horatius Cocles on the left. Temperance promises to teach men to conquer themselves, and holds up as her examples Publius Scipio, Pericles, and Cincinnatus. These, too, had their share in the moral training of the race; the virtues of Greece and Rome were not coldly excluded from view as worthless and sinful; nor were they only valuable in the past, but useless to Christendom; they still taught their precious lessons, and the disciple of prophet and apostle might learn something from Athens and Rome. In the same spirit the conception of inspiration is widened till it includes six Sibyls from Asia, Africa, and Greece, in the same group with Moses and Isaiah, David and Daniel, Solomon and Jeremiah. The fantastic costumes, the ridiculous headgear, the somewhat affected and sentimental attitudes, seem ill-suited to such a band of stalwarts as is here assembled. But the student of ideas finds in this remarkable selection another interest besides that of art. He may wonder how the painter who portrayed himself (on a pilaster between the groups of heroes) so self-determined, without too much refinement, could have been content to clothe his virtues with such triste and faded beauty. Another artist might have represented them differently. The significant thing, however, was that they should be represented at all.

* I borrow from the exposition of the sculptures given by Mr. and Mrs. Cruickshank in their volume on "The Umbrian Towns" in Grant Allen's "Historical Guides."

Perugino, indeed, was sometimes charged with having stolen the wisdom of an earlier artist in Siena. In the chapel of the magnificent Palazzo Pubblico of the Tuscan city, Taddeo di Bartolo was employed between 1406 and 1414 on a series of frescoes. Beautiful exceedingly are his saints and angels; and the assumption of the Virgin Mother, as her Son comes with a band of radiant seraphim and cherubim to lift her from the tomb and bear her to the skies, is full of mingled dignity, tenderness, and triumph. More interesting, however, are the figures on the walls of the vestibule or ante-chapel. On one side is Aristotle, to whom the Church owed its intellectual new birth; and opposite him stand Cæsar and Pompey, foremost among the makers of Rome. Further on, Justice is represented by Cicero, Cato, and Scipio Nasica; while Magnanimity is impersonated in Curius Dentatus, Camillus, and Scipio Africanus. But Taddeo was not the first to employ such typical forms. In the adjoining Hall of Peace, an earlier artist, Ambrogio Lorenzetti, had wrought a great scheme of allegory for the good government of the community as early as 1337. Around the commune of Siena, figured as an old man majestical in aspect and richly clad, sat Prudence and Fortitude, Magnanimity and Temperance as his assessors. Above his head were the theological virtues, Faith, Hope, and Charity. On his right, at one extremity of the group, rests the lovely figure of Peace. Clad in a plain white robe instead of the gorgeous apparel in which the Sienese painters loved to dress their Madonnas and saints, she reclines upon the couch with mingled nobility and grace; while the Justice of Law, with a crown and a man's head in her lap, sits erect in the corresponding place upon the other side. There is much more in this noble fresco that I omit; but at the far end—on the spectator's left—appears what may be called Ideal Justice (in contrast with legal Justice), throned as queen, drawing her inspiration from Wisdom above, while Concord, with tongues of fire upon her brow, sits at her feet. "Love righteousness" is the motto of the whole, "Ye that be judges of the earth"—the words of the Wisdom of Solomon which Dante saw formed by the spirits of righteous rulers in the sixth sphere of Paradise.

Even the Duomo must be made to teach the same general lesson. All round this marvellous building, beneath the clerestory, in the place of the triforium, runs a frieze of heads, representing the line of the Popes. Below them, in the spandrels of the arches dividing nave and choir from the aisles, are large medallions of the Roman emperors. Such was the testimony of the time to the union of empire and church within one vast scheme of providential design. The pavements in the aisles, inlaid with the famous graffiti, contain the figures of no less than ten Sybils who were believed to have prophesied of Christ. At the entrance of the nave a similar design exhibits Hermes Trismegistus, "contemporaneus Moyse," handing a book of law to the Hebrew leader, and announcing the mystery of God's creative joy in his Son, the holy Word. A little further on, the allegory of Fortune, designed by Pinturicchio in 1505, shows Wisdom seated in a garden of flowers on a sea-girt mountain. On the island shore at its base Fortune has landed some of her votaries after a stormy voyage; the mast of the little bark is broken, she has had to hold up the sail herself. The pilgrims start up the steep ascent; the path is rough, though flowers grow in its midst; it has its own dangers, for reptiles shelter under the stones. Some hurry forwards; one sits down already wearied; one angrily looks back at Fortune as she once more puts out to sea. Wisdom from above summons them to the heights: "Fair shall be the rewards of toil, and the prize is peace." On her left, Crates flings his jewels into the sea; from her right hand, Socrates receives the palm of victory and rest.

Such was the outlook of the men of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries. The language of art was not hard to read; it appealed to all, and it strove to express in visible forms the great Catholic idea that all human history is interpenetrated with a divine life, and passes under the providence of God. From that view Protestantism was for a long time cut off by the chasm which it created between the ruins of man's nature and the infinite Spirit, destitute of any home on earth save in the chosen few who heralded the Redeemer's advent. We are getting wiser now. But the wider thought of the present day has not yet conquered our conventions, or won for itself suitable forms of artistic expression. Who will create these for us? When we are bold enough to put Shakespeare or Darwin into our stained-glass windows, or Plato and Newton into our churches as well as our halls of philosophy and science, we shall have got some way towards realising the truth which, of course, we constantly profess; and the ages of history which seem dull and obscure, will throb for us with new interest, for they, too, were not unvisited of God.

J. E. C.

IN PRAISE OF HOLLAND.

A BIT OF ZEELAND.

Of the several ways of crossing over to Holland, by experience I only know two—from Harwich to the Hoek (practically Rotterdam) and from Queenborough to Flushing. They are equally good as far as creature comfort goes, but perhaps association and use and wont lead me to prefer the latter route. Stepping on the landing stage at Flushing gives me the same kind of pleasurable feeling as shaking hands with an old friend. There is, however, one advantage, that by the Flushing route you are practically in Holland as soon as you board the vessel; you are surrounded with Dutch faces and in the midst of Dutch sounds. You hear "een," "twee," "drie," and so on, shouted from one to the other as the sailors shoot the post packages one by one down the slope into the hold.

I often wonder why this wheelers' paradise is so little used by English cyclists. Five shillings will convey a cycle, safely and without any necessity to look after it on the way, from London to any town in Holland, and when there the roads are excellent, either of fine gravel, as smooth as a cinder path, or well made of narrow bricks set edgeways. You may come across unrideable setts and equally unrideable sand, but the majority of the roads are good, and, in cases of need, recourse can always be had to the footways.

At Flushing.

The first view we get of Holland, if the weather is clear, is a glimpse of the lighthouse tower at Westkapelle, and the hills of sand—the dunes—running from there to Flushing. The red roofs and a church tower rise over the sea-wall round Flushing town, as we turn into the harbour and up to the landing stage.

A footway over the harbour and across an open space, which is slowly getting built upon, is the pleasantest way into Flushing, and brings you in ten minutes into the centre of the old-fashioned town. We have landed on the Island of Walcheren, one of the islands of the Province of Zeeland, joined to the mainland of Zeeland by a dyke over which the railway across the south of Holland runs to Germany. An enthusiastic native guide-book describes it as rising out of the surrounding waters like "a lovely flower on a silver dish." It certainly presents a wonderful variety of natural beauty; a magnificent beach at Flushing and Domburg; barren sandy dunes on its north and south coasts; trees by Domburg and round most of the villages, and the sea encircling all.

When you get outside the station it is delightful to look across a wide grassy space and see the brightly painted houses opposite. Many gables, white walls, green and red painted woodwork all looking so scrupulously clean and bright, and almost dancing a welcome in the sunshine. A short mile outside Flushing on the coast, in the centre of a perfect beach, is the bathing place, which consists of a row of some half-dozen villas or lodging-houses, and what I knew first as the Bad (Bath) Hotel, but now dignified by the name of "Grand Hotel des Bains." There is no change in it but in name. The same pleasant central hall, the same little bedrooms with window down to the ground opening on to a balcony, with a glorious view over the "lazy Scheldt" to the opposite Dutch and Belgian shore, and everywhere throughout the house the same white, spotless cleanliness and the same kindly attention to creature wants.

A stroll from the Bad Hotel along the dyke and sea wall with the wide river's mouth, on which a vessel or two will be passing up and down, on the right, will bring you to the statue of Netherland's greatest sea-hero, Admiral Michiel de Ruyter, a native of Flushing; and from there you drop down into the busy little town the real name of which is Vlissingen. Busy for a Dutch town is Flushing; the through commerce to the Continent and its own ship building yards have partly revived it. Though in the daytime many of its quaint streets are but dead-alive, yet on the Saturday night the narrow streets are full of Vlissingers, buying in for the morrow, passing and re-passing before the brightly lighted shops, laughing and chatting, some dressed in modern style and others with the white stiff caps and wide outstanding petticoats, just as their forebears have worn them for years and years. Above the pleasant street sounds will be heard the musical tinkle of the chimes from St. Jacob's tower measuring out each quarter of an hour.

Along the Shore.

The Bad Hotel is a capital centre from which to explore the whole island of Walcheren. All the sights are within walking distance—Westkapelle, Domburg, Veere, Middelburg. Start along the dunes and what a refreshing walk it is. On the left, the blue sea coming up close to the foot of the white sandhills; on the right side, a flat expanse of fertile fields with here and there a farmhouse dotted about, and in the distance over clumps of trees the long steeple at Middelburg, the spire of Domburg Church, and the light tower at Westkapelle, and around at your feet sweet-scented lady bedstraw, pansies, the large seaside bindweed, purple sea-holly and the sand thorn. A mile of the loose sandhills is hard work, but down you drop to the rough road (uncycleable) at the foot of the land side of the dunes, and along pleasant meadows you trudge, passing here and there a farmhouse; meeting women and children with the white caps, black bodices, short sleeves, and manifold petticoats. The little girls are diminutive copies of their mothers, and very quaintly charming the little people look, with their fresh white and red faces and sunburnt bare arms, skirts down to their ankles, and whitened wooden shoes called "Klompen."

The first village we come to is Zouteland (Saltland); it has just one street of low cottages, which lies in a sort of bay of the dunes, cosily sheltered and with a plain little church at the end of it. The walk will have made you thirsty; you will see half way up the street the sign of "De Roode Leeun" (Red Lion), whose red-beasted signboard has a welcome grin upon it. Open the door and you will be shown into a clean and cool best room; excellent coffee will be at your service, and the portly host and his wife with the utmost gravity will give you of their best.

Westkapelle and Domburg.

To get from here to Westkapelle the road goes inland, and, like so many Dutch roads, it is constantly going along two sides of a square instead of taking a cut across. The tall light-tower of Westkapelle is a landmark; it was at one time the tower of a church and stands in a triple churchyard, where rest Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Jew. Go to the top and see the magnificent view, with all Walcheren at your feet. The little street of Westkapelle leads in a straight line from the light-tower to the dyke under whose protection the town and the whole country snugly and safely lie. The dunes, which since we left Flushing rose to 80 or 90 feet high, cease gradually a quarter of a mile before Westkapelle, and do not recommence until two miles on the other side, and the whole of the intermediate space is exposed to the waves of the North Sea, lashed into fury at times by the west wind. Dutch patience and ingenuity have built and maintained this wonderful dyke, the principle of which is akin to the proverb, "Give him rope enough, and he'll hang himself." Give the waves a long slope to rush up and you'll tire them out. Your wonder increases, as you walk along the top of the dyke and notice how close to the sea you are on one side and how high above the land and houses on the other.

Five miles onwards will bring you to Domburg, a village in a nest of trees at the foot of the sandhills, which would like to be an important seaside resort, and deserves to be. It has a charming beach, a fine sea, miles of sandhills, and a modest little bathing establishment, but it relies upon its own natural attractions and does not provide bands, pier, &c., as its prouder sister, Scheveningen, does. The hotel "Het Schuttershof" (the shooters' ground), sheltered amongst its trees, will give most hospitable welcome.

More Villages and Veere.

Continuing the line of coast but keeping the inland road instead of going along the dunes, you have a capital road for either walking or cycling, with hedges or avenues of trees, and here and there country houses on either side; you pass through two pleasant villages, Oostkapelle and Serooskerke, in either of which it will be hard to find a modern style of dress. The ground plan of most of the villages hereabouts is much the same: a square of small cottages with large windows and painted shutters round the brick church. The main road generally passes along one side of the square, and besides a small public-house or so we usually find the village smithy, with its contrivance for holding the horses quiet whilst they are being shod.

Soon after Serooskerke you leave the wooded road and turn along the dykes, following the outside of the land reclaimed from the sea, and which is called polder land, each separate enclosure being a polder. In front of us we see the huge church of Veere, with its domed tower and high body overtopping the lazy little town, which has seen better and busier days. For old buildings Veere—the Ferry, whose full name was Camp-Ferry—is quite remarkable; there is the "Scotch house" and the "Lambkin" with their ornamented gables, both fifteenth century buildings, and the lovely Town House with its delicate tower and belfry, and its front decorated with statues of ancient magnates, male and female, and many other beautiful bits of brick and stone work.

The road from Veere to Middelburg is pleasant enough, but painfully straight. My friend J—— and I were caught on it one Easter in a snowstorm, and we were very glad to have the sheltering experience of a lift in a local cart, not blessed with many springs and highly redolent of fish.

Middelburg.

Of the whole of Zeeland the most interesting town by far is Middelburg. A visit to the large market place, on one side of which is the gem of the town, the Town Hall, on market-day (Thursday) is worth all the trouble and expense of the journey to Holland.

The large space is full of stalls, and both stall-keepers and buyers come from all parts of Zeeland and beyond, and to those who know Dutch costumes well, the locality, sometimes even the town, from which they come is recognisable by some distinction in dress. Then go to the butter-market and see the clean-looking women in country costume standing before huge baskets of sweet smelling yellow butter. Listen to the chimes from the graceful belfry of the Abbey Tower, known all over the island as "Long John," and seen all over the island too. Wander about the almost deserted streets and lose yourself, as you easily can, but have as your reward a sight of bits of street architecture which are unique. When in the market place, go into the bookshop of F. J. Boer, to get a picture post-card or two, and give him the pleasure of a chat with an English tongue; and before you leave the town have a walk by the encircling canal and see how the Dutch Town Council can turn its banks into a park.

Three ways there are back to Flushing, by tram along the shady road, by cycle and by water along the wide canal, which helps to join the Scheldt and the Maas, but let us in imagination stay the night at the Hotel de Abdij (Abbey Hotel), under the shadow of "Long John," to be ready to start on our further explorations on the morrow.

ROTATOR SENEX.

CHANNING'S INFLUENCE.*

BY PRESIDENT CHARLES W. ELIOT.

"THE idea of God . . . is the idea of our own spiritual natures purified and enlarged to infinity." "The sense of duty is the greatest gift of God. The idea of right is the primary and highest revelation of God to the human mind, and all outward revelations are founded on and addressed to it." There is "but one object of cherished and enduring love in heaven or on earth, and that is moral goodness." "I do and I must reverence human nature. . . . I honour it for its struggles against oppression, for its growth and progress under the weight of so many chains and prejudices, for its achievements in science and art, and still more for its examples of heroic and saintly virtue. These are marks of a divine origin and pledges of a celestial inheritance."

Perfection is man's proper and natural goal. What an immense distance between these doctrines of Channing's maturity and the Calvinism of his youth! He was a meditative, reflecting man, who read much, but took selected thoughts of others into the very substance and fibre of his being, and made them his own. The foundation of his professional power and public influence was this great personal achievement, this attuning of his own soul to noblest harmonies.

Thousands of ministers and spiritually-minded laymen have travelled, since Channing's death, the road he laid out, and so have been delivered from the inhuman doctrines of the fall of man, the wrath of God, vicarious atonement, everlasting hell for the majority, and the rescue of a predestined few. They should all join in giving heartfelt praise and thanks to Channing, who thought out clearly and preached with fervid reiteration the doctrines which have delivered them from a painful bondage,

Another remarkable quality of Channing's teachings is their universality. Men of learning and spirituality in all the civilised nations have welcomed his words, and found in them enduring aud expansive principles. Many Biblical scholars, in the technical sense, have arrived eighty years later at Channing's conclusions about the essential features of Christianity, though Channing was no scholar in the modern meaning of that term; while they go far beyond him in treating the Bible as a collection of purely human writings, and in rejecting the so-called supernatural quality of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. Indeed, many Biblical scholars belonging to-day to evangelical sects have arrived not only at Channing's position, but also at Emerson's.

Just how much Channing's published works have had to do with this quiet but fateful revolution no man can tell. The most eminent to-day of American Presbyterian divines preached an excellent sermon in the Harvard College chapel one Sunday evening, not many years ago, and asked me, as we walked away together, how I liked it. I replied, "Very much; it was all straight out of Channing." "That is strange," he said, "for I have never read Channing." It is a great testimony to the pervasive quality of a prophet's teachings when they become, within fifty years, a component of the intellectual atmosphere of the new times. At a dinner of Harvard graduates I once complained that, although I heard in the college chapel a great variety of preachers, connected with many different denominations, the preaching was, after all, rather monotonous, because they all preached Channing. Phillips Brooks spoke after me at the same dinner, and soon said, "The president is right in thinking our present preaching monotonous, and the reason he gives for this monotony is correct: we all do preach Channing."

The direct influence of Channing's writings has been vast; for they have been translated into many languages, and are read in English in all parts of the world. Thirty years ago I spent a long day in showing Dom Pedro, Emperor of Brazil, some of the interesting things in the laboratories and collections of Harvard University. He was the most assiduous visitor that I ever conducted through the university buildings, intelligently interested in a great variety of objects and ideas. Late in the afternoon he suddenly said with a fresh eagerness, "Now I will visit the tomb of Channing." We drove to Mt. Auburn, and found the monument erected by the Federal Street Church. The Emperor copied with his own hand George Ticknor's worthy inscriptions on the stone, and made me verify his copies. Then, with his great weight and height, he leaped into the air and snatched a leaf from the maple which overhung the tomb. "I am going to put that leaf," he said, "into my best edition of Channing. I have read all his published works, some of them many times over. He was a very great man." The Emperor of Brazil was a Roman Catholic.

Channing's philanthropy was a legitimate outcome of his view of religion. For him practical religion was character-building by the individual human being. But character-building in any large group or mass of human beings means social reform; therefore, Channing was a preacher and active promoter of social regeneration in this world. He depicted the hideous evils and wrongs of intemperance, slavery, and war. He advocated and supported every well-directed effort to improve public education, the administration of charity, and the treatment of criminals, and to lift up the labouring classes. He denounced the bitter sectarian and partisan spirit of his day. He refused entire sympathy to the abolitionists because of the ferocity and violence of their habitual language and the injustice of their indiscriminate attacks. He distrusted money-worship, wealth, and luxury.

These sentiments and actions grew straight out of his religious conceptions, and were their legitimate fruit. All his social aspirations and hopes were rooted in his fundamental conception of the Fatherhood of God, and its corollary, the brotherhood of men. It was his lofty idea of the infinite worth of human nature and of the inherent greatness of the human soul, in contrast with the then prevailing doctrines of human vileness and impotency, which made him resent with such indignation the wrongs of slavery, intemperance, and war, and urge with such ardour every effort to deliver men from poverty and ignorance, and to make them gentler and juster to one another.

In no subject which he discussed does the close connection between Channing's theology and his philanthropy appear more distinctly than in education. He says in his remarks on education: "There is nothing on earth so precious as the mind, soul, character, of the child. . . . , There should be no economy in education. Money should never be weighed against the soul of a child. It should be poured out like water for the child's intellectual and moral life." It is more than two generations since those sentences were written, and still the average public expenditure on the education of a child in the United States is less than $15 a year. Eastern Massachusetts is the community in the whole world which gives most thought, time, and money to education, public and endowed. Whence came this social wisdom? From Protestantism, from Congregationalism, from the religious teachings of Channing and his disciples. Listen to this sentence, "Benevolence is short-sighted, indeed, and must blame itself for failure, if it do not see in education the chief interest of the human race."

*From an Address given in Boston at the unveiling of Channing's Statue, June 2.

THE OLD CHAPEL.

D. R. C.

Lo! where the sacred, sweet Epitome
Of many generations stands;
The grey Recorder of solemnity,
Heedless of scythe and sands.

Of old "a Voice" crying in the desert wild,
Lone watcher for the broadening day,
Still in the darkness standing unbeguiled
In Freedom's great high way.

The Past is past, and leaves its pictured shells
To strew the Present's gleaming shore;
But, ah! the tales outcast Religion tells
Of those sad days of yore.

On lips for ever closed and living lips,
It was and is "the dear old place,"
Emerging slowly from the dark eclipse
With still increasing grace.

Is there in sweet Freedom's matchless power
Enchantment to beguile decay,
That these transient walls to sun and shower
Yield not their wonted prey?

To Freedom, single-handed when she strove,
By harsh Intolerance betrayed,
Hastened, more closely banded, Truth and Love,
To lend all-conquering aid.

Peace be with you, and Christ's victorious grace,
Daughters of Freedom—Love and Truth!
To her eternal vigilance ye trace
Your own eternal youth.

E. L. H. THOMAS.

DOMESTIC MISSION WORK.*

BY THE REV. W. WILSON.

DOMESTIC missionaries need a perennial inspiration. We get it from various quarters; from books, from nature, from good and true men and women, and from God. But there is another source, and that is from the people among whom we work. The more I visit them in their homes and prove the love that is in their hearts, see what they have to put up with and how they put up with it, the more I feel the truth of these lines of the Rev. Dr. Walter C. Smith in his "Hilda among the broken Gods":—

You may feel, like me, half ashamed of the good you can do
Compared with the good you are getting from lives so human and true.

The people among whom I have been sent to do some good have done me a great deal of good.

There is no doubt we are doing good among the people, and they are doing good to those who work among them; and in appealing for workers I would not omit to refer to the good they may get by engaging in mission work. Often there is something seriously lacking in the development of many a young lady and gentleman because they have never been brought face to face with their poorer brethren, mixed with them, and worked among and for them. This lack might well be supplied by attendance at our missions. That being so, we may look upon our missions as not only existing for the good of the poor but also as an excellent means for the true and full development of the "poor rich."

We can offer work to young men and women, which they have only got to understand, do well and thoroughly, in order to love heartily, and be very slow to give up. The great thing that is needed is to be brought into friendly relationship with the people; after that, the work that can be done is simply incalculable.

For instance, there is the glorious work of teaching in the Sunday-school. Very difficult work, I confess, it is, that needs a fair amount of apprenticeship. But it is grand to feel yourself getting hold of the young life growing up, and helping to keep it and make it pure, brave, intelligent and loving, and inspiring it with manly qualities. We have a great deal of this young life at Rhyl-street. It sometimes breaks my heart, but often it does quite the opposite. I would appeal to the young life, of Hampstead, say, to come and share my experiences, even the heart-breaking ones, mix with young and old as their friends, play with them, teach them, ennoble them.

There is no monotony at the Missions; we do all sorts of work. It is our blessed privilege to preach to the people the liberal religion of Jesus, with its glorious gospel of the Fatherhood of God, the divine nature in man, his capacity for progress, that the universe is ruled by law—the laws of God; the importance of this world and life, and the "thousand things divine" lying all around us. We believe in heaven and hell, in salvation and damnation, but as realities in this world. If we did nothing else, it would still be a great matter to gently and delicately free the minds of the people from superstitions, and replace their fear of God with trust in Him and love to Him, and cheer them with the joy of the larger hope.

That being so, it follows that politics with us are sacred things, not party politics, but practical politics. So we speak to the people about modern prophets like Dr. Clifford, of modern tyrannies like the Education Act and Bill. We believe in holy water, that divine kind that drops from the sky, that fills our reservoirs and flows through our pipes; and we tell the people how essential it is to their salvation that they have a thorough ablution with that water. We teach them the religious duty of never being ill, and of not being content with their absurd system of housing, which makes it so difficult for them to have an ample supply of water; and of the divine trust reposed in them of spending their wages wisely.

The whole work is full of interest year in and year out, and no doubt the missions are a means of doing a great deal of good, important, and hopeful work.

They have recently been called palliatives; perhaps they are; but, I suppose, Parliament is a palliative, and churches, education, the press, these are all palliatives. Well, I am quite willing that Domestic Missions should be classed among such palliatives.

We are deeply interested in social reform, in seeing the people, who are fit, back to the land, in having them humanly housed. But our work at the Missions is not primarily because the people are poor, but because they are men, women, and children, and the work we do there is essentially the same as is required amongthe rich, namely, the development of their higher nature. Such work will always need to be done, let all the social reform we are ever going to get come as soon as it likes, the sooner, the better; the Domestic Missions apply themselves to what is perennial in man.

*From a speech at the recent Annual Meeting of the London Domestic Mission.

FOR EFFICIENCY.

UNDER this title the following article appears in the July number of the Monthly Messenger of the Unitarian Church, Rochdale, of which the Rev. T. P. Spedding is minister. We are glad to reproduce it here, as a valuable contribution towards the consideration of a subject that concerns all the churches:—

"We have all along favoured the closer organisation of our churches. Dr. Martineau's proposals at Leeds some fifteen years ago were defeated, but they left an influence which must sooner or later have a result. At the recent Liverpool Conference, after the addresses of Professor Carpenter and Rev. Joseph Wood, a definite forward step was taken, and it behoves the congregations to give it every support. These schemes are being very warmly discussed. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association, founded in 1825, is an honourable and well-recognised institution among us, and many of its friends fear that if organisation is attempted it may interfere with the work of the Association. Possibly a small minority might not be sorry if it did. It is a Unitarian Association, with a personal membership, seeking the diffusion of Unitarian Christianity and the protection and extension of the civil rights of Unitarians. The services it has rendered to the common body of the churches entitle it to the regard of every individual Unitarian in the land. But it does not answer the whole need of the present day. It is responsible only to its own members; and it does not represent the churches. Theoretically the Conference does, and it will do so more completely as the time passes. But the Conference, if it is to become truly representative of the churches, must be safeguarded. It must never be able to exercise ecclesiastical functions in respect of doctrine; must never be allowed to judge as between Unitarian orthodoxy and heterodoxy. And it is the fear of some power of the kind being exercised that is the stumbling-block. We are all glad and willing that the British and Foreign Association should promote Unitarian principles—doctrines if you will; but we are as emphatic, on the other hand, that the Conference must not. Individuals may do what corporations may not do.

"But it ought to be possible for a body of churches, with whom freedom is a vital consideration, to federate for business purposes without interfering with the individual liberty of Churches. Doctrinal freedom does not necessarily include financial irresponsibility; and Conference, if it came to the assistance of a church, might require the proper use of money without thereby infringing the theological liberty of that church; and that, we believe is the real problem.

"It is argued that in twenty-five years the Conference might become more conservative than it is now. It is, however, quite as likely that it may become more radical; and it is more likely. Be that as it may, we are personally ready to run risks for the sake of the practical good which organisation would do, and to withdraw from the Conference the moment it tried to domineer. The real good is greater than the problematical danger. We have in mind closed churches which ought to be opened. But they are kept closed because the local associations may be too poor to open them, and the denomination as a whole has no right to interfere. But let the United Church be responsible, and surely some of these outposts would be made efficient once again. That is one of the lessons we have to learn, and until we have put our house in order in this respect it is inconceivable that there should be this ceaseless outcry against ecclesiasticism. We fetter ourselves for an imaginary danger; we hold our strength because we fear to use it. And meanwhile we are a series of independent and isolated congregations, capable of greater things than we have yet done, but perpetuating our weaknesses because we dare not march and tread together. Liberty becomes a fetish when it interferes with unity. Where the spirit of the Lord is there is liberty; but it doesn't follow that the spirit of the Lord is always just where there's liberty."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—J. E. C.; J. D.; R. D.; A. W. F.; C. A. H.; J. P. H.; R. D. H.; W. H.; C. C. L.; W. L.; S. H. M.; T. L. M.; P. P.; C. R.; J. R.; M. R.; C. J. S.; E. L. H. T.; J. J. W.

THE GLEANERS. (Millet.)

GOLDEN sheaves in the field, and in the sky
A golden light paling the blue,
The golden stubble gilds the gazing eye;
Golden the stillness too.

Only by you, ye three, no Midas strays
With golden touch. Ah! never yet
Were Ruby, Emerald, and Chrysoprase
So opulently set.

Lo! here the commonplace outvies the gleam
Of every golden splendour shown:
Never fair women haunted mortal dream
Like these toil-tamed and lone.

A touch more magic than did Midas find
Does our astonished eyes bewitch:
Gleaning among stray toiling womankind,
Art stoops and rises rich.

Toil will she consecrate through you, ye three,
A toiling world's lone waifs and strays,
And womanhood, wherever women be,
Shall bless Art's golden praise.

E. L. H. THOMAS.

The June Atlantic Monthly has an interesting article on "The Boston Religion," telling the story of the origin and progress of the Unitarian churches in that city, noting the great influence of Channing and the vain attempt of Dr. Beecher, father of Harriet Beecher Stowe, to turn the tide of heresy. Then came Theodore Parker's revolt against the Unitarian orthodoxy, and finally the broadening spirit in other churches also. "If Channing could have had his way," the writer remarks, "to let the liberal leaven work within the established fold, we may well imagine that there never would have been that stiffening of Orthodoxy which only in recent years has begun to relax. How far, on the other hand, the progress of liberalism would have been checked, no man can say." And he adds:—

If victory or defeat is to be measured by denominational growth—a development which had only a secondary interest for those who formed the Unitarian denomination—our later view must differ from that which the middle of the nineteenth century would have presented. In 1850 there were within the limits of what is now Boston 32 Unitarian churches; there are in this year (1903) 27. In 1850 there were within the same limits 21 Congregational Trinitarian churches; to-day there are 33. The rapid growth of the Episcopal and other Trinitarian Protestant churches might also fairly be added to the reckoning. Thus it appears that the Unitarian body was no richer in the seeds of outward growth than its opponents and some of its friends predicted.

On the other hand, the profound influence of Unitarian teaching, in its influence on the life of the churches, and the community, as a whole, is amply recognised. "The vast service that Unitarianism has rendered to the Christian belief of the century" is the acknowledgment of a broad-minded orthodox minister of the present day in Boston, who is further quoted in the following conclusion of the article:—

This overdone sense of depravity, hardened into dogma, stood for centuries against the truth that the morality of God in Christ is the morality for mankind. The truth has at last prev iled, and at this point of belief Christian people everywhere are under an immense debt to the great Unitarian leaders." It is in admissions, or rather in hearty acknowledgments, of this sort that the true outcome of the Unitarian controversy may be said to lie. And to those who are glad to associate Boston with the progress of mankind, there is satisfaction in the thought that these great Unitarian leaders were eminently the product of local conditions.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

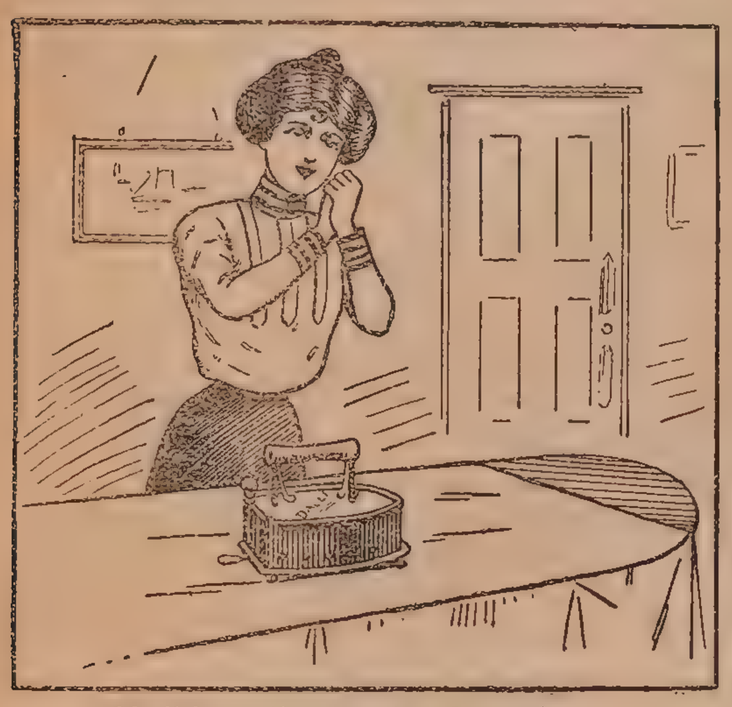
Great Yarmouth (Old Meeting).—At the evening service, on Sunday last, the Rev. John Birks, F.G.S., referred to the great loss sustained by the Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A., a former minister of the Old Meeting, through the death of his wife, by a lamentable accident, and at his request, the congregation, all standing, passed a resolution of deep sympathy and sincere condolence with Mr. Badland in his sad bereavement.

Kingswood (Hollywood), near Birmingham.—Anniversary services were held on Sunday, July 12, the preacher, morning and evening, being the Rev. J. H. Matthews, who has now occupied the pulpit 15 years. At the afternoon service the Rev. J. S. May, of the local Baptist Chapel, gave an interesting and instructive address to the scholars, teachers, parents, and other friends present. At the close the old custom of distributing buns to the scholars was observed. The day was a beautiful one, and a large number of worshippers met together in the Chapel during the day. Collections about £11.

London: Bermondsey.—The Sunday-School excursion on Tuesday, July 14, to Court Farm, Upper Wallingham, was greatly enjoyed. Kind contributions acknowledged with thanks from the following:—S. M. A., G. C., H. E., D. M., F. N., O. N., W. B. O., Miss P., J. T. P., S. W. P., R. S., H. T., E. C. W.

London: Little Portland Street Chapel.—The second of the series of open-air services was held in Regent's Park on Sunday evening last, when an audience assembled considerably in excess of that of the previous week. An address was given by the Rev. H. S. Perris, M.A., on "The Use and Abuse of the Bible," which was listened to attentively and in most cases apparently with sympathetic interest. Some additional help in the singing department would, however, be gladly welcomed. Is it not possible that such services as these might be organised by co-operative effort amongst our churches during the summer months?



Manchester: Platt and Heaton Moor.—On Saturday, 11th inst., a joint picnic of these congregations was held at Hope, a pleasant afternoon being spent together.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The annual choir sermons were preached by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Sheffield, on Sunday, July 12, to very large congregations. Special music was capitally rendered by the choir.

Padiham (Welcome Meeting).—On Monday evening, July 6, a meeting was held to welcome the Rev. J. E. Jenkins (recently of Sheffield) on his settlement as minister of Nazareth Chapel. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. W. Roberts, who was supported by the Revs. J. Edwin Odgers, J. H. Wicksteed, W. H. Burgess, J. J. Shaw, A. W. Fox, E. E. Jenkins, J. E. Jenkins, Mr. J. S. Mackie, and others. A very cordial welcome was offered to Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins by the chairman, on behalf of the congregation, Mr. D. Harrison on behalf of the school, the Revs. W. H. Burgess and A. W. Fox as neighbouring ministers, and Mr. T. Marsden on behalf of the choir. The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, formerly minister of Nazareth Chapel, also joined in the welcome and spoke in a reminiscent strain of his association with the Padiham pastorate. All through his ministry, he said, he aimed at two things: in the first place, to respect their ways, and in the second, as far as he was able, to preserve his own. Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins would bring them new ways, but he was quite sure they would learn to love and respect each other, and get from each other all the more, because they each kept to their own ways. The Rev. J. Edwin Odgers having added words of encouragement, Mr. Jenkins acknowledged with much feeling the very hearty welcome he had received. He was the first, he said, to reap the benefit of Mr. Wicksteed's generosity in that place. The beautiful house they lived in, and the welcome extended to himself and his wife, made them feel already at home, and he looked forward with great hopefulness to the work that lay before him. Mr. J. S. Mackie, as representing the church at Burnley, Padiham's eldest daughter, added congratulations and good wishes for the union celebrated on that occasion, and the meeting terminated.

Stockport.—On Sunday evening Mr. Z. Toyosaki, who has just completed his two years of study at Manchester College, Oxford, preached in the Unitarian Church a sermon on "Temptation," of which an account is given in Wednesday's Stockport Chronicle. The reporter also furnishes nearly a column of "interview" with Mr. Toyosaki, at the conclusion of which, having referred to the reaction from orthodox Christianity in Japan, he added: "Unitarianism is a growing force and religion in Japan. Although it makes seemingly slow progress it is advancing among the thoughtful and cultured classes, who find in Unitarianism the logical expression to their philosophical and religious natures. We are making new members and establishing permanent churches, while the Trinitarians or orthodox Christian Churches are going back and losing their hold on the people of Japan.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The 36th annual meeting of this Union took place on Saturday last at Lydgate, near Huddersfield. The attendance was only moderate, the cause, no doubt, being the inclement weather and the difficulty in reaching this outlying, though beautiful, outpost of our Yorkshire churches. In the afternoon service was held in the chapel, the preacher being the Rev. H. Rawlings, M.A., of York, who, having alluded to the good work which he knew was being done by the Union, set forth the duty and responsibility devolving on all who undertook the work of training and moulding the lives of the children. His words of encouragement to teachers were refreshing and cheering. Tea was subsequently served in the schoolroom, about 150 persons being present, after which a public meeting was held in the chapel, Mr. Councillor Conyers, of Leeds, the retiring president, occupying the chair. The report showed that the majority of the schools embraced in the Union were in a flourishing state, and that on the whole there had been an increase in the number of scholars during the year, the number over 16 years of age being satisfactory and encouraging. The finances were also very satisfactory. After a few words from the chairman, the Rev. J. H. Green, B.A., of Lydgate, extended a hearty welcome to all, especially the representatives from other kindred societies, the Rev. H. J. Rossington, M.A., and the Rev. W. H. Burgess, B.A. (Manchester District Association and N.E. Lancs. Union respectively), responding. A vote of thanks was then passed to the preacher of the day, on the motion of the Rev. Chas. Hargrove, and the Rev. H. Rawlings responded. The president moved the adoption of the report and balance-sheet. He congratulated the Union on the success of the various organisations, remarking that the large number of scholars over the age of sixteen was very cheering. The motion was seconded by the Rev. C. Harvey Cook, and carried. On the proposition of the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, seconded by the Rev. W. Mellor, the retiring officers were thanked for their services, and the new officers appointed: The Rev. John Fox, president; Messrs. F. Clayton and Councillor Conyers, vice-presidents; with Mr. C. H. Boyle, Mr. H. J. Brook, and Mr. James Harrison as general, examination, and conference secretaries respectively. Votes of thanks to the Lydgate congregation and to the retiring president, having been passed, the proceedings were brought to an end by the singing of the hymn, "Softly the Silent Night," and the Benediction by the Rev. J. Hanson Green, the Lydgate pastor.

Of all inventions neat and smart,
There's none can match the "DALLI,"
It fills with joy a woman's heart,
And with her ease doth tally;
It matters not where she may live,
On mountain-side or valley,
For ironing, the world can give
Her nothing like the "DALLI."
It does the work in half the time,
It knows no shilly-shally,
It works quite free from smut or grime,
Dirt cannot in it rally;
It smooths the linen neatly out
For master or for valet,
And proves without a shade of doubt
There's nothing like the "DALLI."

The "DALLI" is the best Box Iron. No Gas, no Fire, no Smell. Hot in a few minutes and remains hot. No changes of irons. Self-heating with smokeless Fuel. Can be used anywhere without interruption, even out of doors, doing double the work in half the time. Price of the "Dalli," 6/-. Price of the "Dalli" Fuel 1/9 per Box of 123 Blocks. All Ironmongers. If any difficulty apply to—

THE DALLI SMOKELESS FUEL CO., 27, Milton Street, London, E.C.

Beware of worthless imitations

NEW RICHES FROM OLD MINES.

Who would value raw grains if all the arts of milling and preparing them were lost?

Similarly, nuts (which are foods of enormous value) have been unappreciated because the art of preparing them has been neglected.

HUGH MAPLETON, Colonial House, Ardwick, Manchester, is now making from nuts, rich, nourishing, digestible foods. Write to-day for descriptive price lists.

TRAINING FOR LADIES AS CHILDREN'S NURSES.

The next course begins early in September.

For particulars, apply to LADIES' SANITARY ASSOCIATION, 8, Sandow-terrace, Liverpool.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOINSON, Pier-street.

BIRTH.

NETTLEFOLD.—On the 12th inst., at Perchfield, Edgbaston, Birmingham, the wife of Godfrey Nettlefold, of a son (stillborn).

MARRIAGE.

GREENE—GRIFFITHS. — On June 3rd, at Sydney, New South Wales, Herbert B. Greene, son of the late John Howe Greene, of Liverpool, to Violet, daughter of A. N. Griffiths, jun., of Sydney and Queensland.

DEATHS.

BADLAND.—On the 9th July, at Aberdovey, Emily, wife of Charles Davis Badland, of Whitchurch, aged 50. No cards.

DORNAN.—On the 8th inst., at Lee Bank, Coppice-street, Oldham, Rebecca, widow of the late Thomas Dornan, in her 73rd year.

OSLER.—On the 10th inst., at Burcot Grange, Bromsgrove, Eliza Rebecca, wife of Henry Follett Osler, in her 64th year.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, July 19.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton. Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M., Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, M.A.

Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 7 A.M., Rev. J. LONSDALE DOWSON.

Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M and 7 P.M., Rev. F. W. STANLEY.

Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. ARTHUR RYLAND.

Deptford, Church-street, 11.15, A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. J. MARCHANT.

Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M., Rev. G. DAWES HICKS, M.A., Ph.D., "The Poetry and Prose of London," Collection for London Domestic Mission; and 7 P.M.

Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.

Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.

Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. GOW, B.A.

Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.

Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., "Life's Supreme Concern," Rev. ALFRED THOMPSON.

Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.

Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.

Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.

Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M., Rev. H. S. PERRIS, M.A., 7 P.M. in Regent's-park.

Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Rev. JOHN ELLIS.

Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. G. CARTER.

Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.

Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. S. FARRINGTON.

Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. C. A. GINEVER.

Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.

Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M., Mr. A. PHARAOH, and 6.30 P.M., Mr. G. WARD.

Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, East-hill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. THOMAS ELLIOT.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M; Rev. J. M'DOWELL.

BEDFORD, Library (side room), 11.15 A.M., Rev. ROWLAND HILL.

BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.

BLACKPOOL, Unitarian Church, Masonic Hall, South Shore, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. C. C. COE.

BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. M. LIVENS.

BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET.

CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., Mr. E. BURTON BETHAM.

DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.

GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. GARDNER PRESTON.

LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. HARGROVE, M.A.

LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. E. HAYCOCK.

LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. CROSSLEY.

LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. R. C. MOORE, of Horwich.

LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, M.A.

NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. E. PIKE.

OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. J. E. ODGERS, M.A.

PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.

PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 P.M., Mr. THOMAS BOND.

SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. OTTWELL BINNS.

SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.

SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.

SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church, Tyler-street, 7 P.M.

TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

WINDERMERE, Albert Hall, Cross-street, 11 A.M., Rev. T. CROWTHER HIRST.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.

WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M., Mr. W. S. JONES, B.A.

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH.

SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F. Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS.

SOUTH-PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.—July 19, at 11.15 A.M., JOHN A. HOBSON, M.A., "The American Temperament."

PULPIT SUPPLY.—Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY, 28, Downshire-hill, Hampstead, N.W.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses. —For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

Board and Residence.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged.—Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

BOURNEMOUTH.—"ARNEWOOD." Occupies a splendid position at the corner of West Cliff Road, and affords all requirements for Health, Comfort or Convenience. Sea views; close to the Winter Garden Pavilion, Unitarian Church, pier and promenade. Terms, &c., on application to Manageress.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH, DEVONSHIRE.

A HOLIDAY RESORT FOR YOUNG LADIES OR SCHOOL-GIRLS, WITH OR WITHOUT CHAPERON.

Charming little Devonshire town. Perfect Sanitation. Sea and Moorland. Bracing air. Walks, excursions, picnics, splendid bathing. Main line G.W.R.

Terms and other particulars from THE PROPRIETOR.

FELIXSTOWE.—Comfortable HOME for Permanent BOARDERS, Adults or Scholars; also APARTMENTS on reasonable terms.—Apply, Mrs. ROBINSON, Kimberley, Ranelagh-road, Felixstowe.

TO LET, unfurnished, at SIDMOUTH, about 1 mile from the sea, a gentleman's Cottage Residence; Stabling and Outbuilding, Greenhouse and Conservatory, Large Garden, Tennis Lawn, and Meadow of 2 acres. Excellent Water supply. Sanitation perfect.—For all particulars apply Mr. THOS. SANDERS, House Agent, Old Fore-street, Sidmouth, S. Devon.

Situations, etc.

WANTED.—Capable Lady Help, servant kept, no small children.—Full particulars to C., West Dene, Pendennis-road, Streatham, S.W.

LADY, who speaks French, seeks re-engagement as Governess or Nursery Governess. 7 years' experience. Good references. For further particulars apply to M D., 12, Richmond-terrace, Cardiff.

HOUSEMAID, where parlour-maid or man servant is kept. Good personal references in Hampstead. Age 39. Temporary, or could take charge of house. B. C., 4 Golden square, Heath-street, Hampstead, N.W

NO SALARY.—Lady (44) well-educated, travelled, generally capable, cyclist, offers services for refined home from September—any position of trust, country or sea preferred. S., Offices INQUIRER, 3, Essex-street, W.C.

FREDK. LONG & SON,

AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,

4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

In Cloth, Price 1s.; Stout Paper, 6d.

THE HUNGARIAN UNITARIANS.

Some Account of their Origin, Vicissitudes, and Present Condition.

Compiled from various sources by M. LUCY TAGART.

"Miss Tagart has done well to collect a number of most interesting papers and sketches bearing upon the history and the existing state of our Unitarian brethren in Hungary and Transylvania. . . . The booklet excites and keeps attention from beginning to end."—Christian Life.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING OFFICE, 5, Furnival-street, Holborn, E.C.

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS

By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

DAILY MEDITATIONS

(Fourth Edition Revised.)

NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.

Cloth, red edges, 6d.; roan gilt, 1s.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

THE FREEHOLD FARM.

The Garner'd Seed-Corn of all Intuitional Thought.

INTUITIONISM THE RELEASE OF THE MIND.

46 pp., 8vo.

By F. LINFORD WILSON.

Published by H. LEERIGHT, and obtainable of W. REEVES, 83, Charing Cross-road, W.C.

Price One Shilling.

OUR FATHER'S CHURCH.

MOSELEY AND BALSALL HEATH INSTITUTE, MOSELEY ROAD, BIRMINGHAM.

MINISTER—REV. C. J. SNEATH.

SPECIAL APPEAL.

The Committee have received and beg gratefully to acknowledge the following additional amounts:—

Already acknowledged...	...	£24	12 0
E. Taylor, Esq., Birmingham	...	0	5 0
H. Payton, Esq.,	,, ...	1	1 0
E. H. Lee, Esq.,	,, ...	2	2 0

Further donations or subscriptions will be gratefully acknowledged by the Treasurer,

ALBERT H. SHAW, Secretary. E. E. THOMAS, ESQ., 255, High-street, Selly Oak, Birmingham.

MICROSCOPES, second-hand, excellent condition, from one-third original cost. Slides, great variety, best makers, from 3s. per doz. Write for particulars, THE NEW AGE PRESS, 8, John-street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17, Mincing-lane, E.C.

Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.

Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.

F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.

Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.

STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

Schools, etc.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN, NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON (Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

AN UNSECTARIAN FIRST GRADE PUBLIC SCHOOL.

HEADMASTER.—GUY LEWIS, M.A.

Opened September, 1900. Foundation Scholarships.

SINGLETON SCHOOL, DUBLIN FOR TRAINING GIRLS FOR DOMESTIC SERVICE.

Required in October, or earlier, a Lady of experience and special training in domestic science, to act as Principal of the Singleton School. Salary £60, with board, residence, &c., and assistance in the duties. Apply to Rev. G. H. VANCE, Hon. Sec. to the Damer Governors, Ashfield Park House, Harold's Cross-road, Dublin, &c.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress, Miss ESTHER CASE, Certificated Student of Girton College, Cambridge, Classical Tripos.

2nd Mistress, Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc.

In the arrangement of each pupil's work, the aim is to secure thoroughness in all that is undertaken without undue pressure and strain.

The house stands on high ground in a good open position. A few boarders received.

WAVERLEY SCHOOL, 24, HAMILTON ROAD, SHERWOOD RISE, NOTTINGHAM.

PREPARATORY TO THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
HEAD MASTER, Mr. H. T. FACON, B.A.(Lond.).
Prospectus on application. BOARDERS received. Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, Essex House, Campden-hill, W.

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS. 14 & 15, SOUTH MARINE TERRACE, ABERYSTWYTH.

PRINCIPAL ... MRS. MARLES-THOMAS.

This School is splendidly situated in one of the healthiest parts of Wales, overlooking Cardigan Bay, and close to excellent golf links. Pupils have passed the London and Welsh Matriculation; Cambridge Higher Local; Senior and Junior Cambridge Locals, besides the usual Theoretical and Practical Music Examinations. Scholarships have also been obtained at the Welsh University Colleges.

Gymnasium, Swimming, and excellent Hockey Club.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2½% repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES

Purchased and sold for customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD, 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate. — Saturday, July 18, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3187. NEW SERIES, No. 291.] LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 25, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 489
ARTICLES—
What our Young People can do for their Churches 491
Leo III. 497
Michael Servetus 498
A City of the Dead 499
Willaston School 502
LITERATURE—
The Hibbert Journal 493
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 495
LEADERS—
What the Census Means 496
Christianity and Tariffs 496
CORRESPONDENCE—
Manchester Domestic Mission 490
A New Year Book 490
The Communion Service 494
Christianity and Tariffs 494
MEETINGS—
Fellowship in Religion 501
Church Opening at Merthyr 501
Southern Unitarian Association 501
POETRY—
To a Baby Sleeping 492
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 502
ADVERTISEMENTS 502

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

DURING August and September the Editor requests that all correspondence may be addressed, not to his house, but to 3, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

THE paper on "The World Mission of Unitarianism," by Miss M. B. Westenholz, read at the conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Whitweek, we hope to publish next week.

A THIRD article in the series "In Praise of Holland" we are obliged to hold over until next week.

THE long watching by the death-bed of the aged Pope came to an end on Monday afternoon, when he passed peacefully away. An article on the life and character of Leo XIII., from the pen of the Rev. William Addis, will be found in another column.

THE King and Queen landed at Kingstown on Tuesday, on their visit to Ireland, and drove into Dublin, receiving a very warm welcome. It is a pleasant coincidence that meanwhile the Irish Land Bill has passed the House of Commons. With very different feelings we record the passing of the Education Bill for London; but this simply means that the contest is transferred from a moribund Parliament to the constituencies.

THE "Benediction" of the nave of Truro Cathedral took place on Wednesday of last week, the Prince and Princess of Wales being present, and the Archbishop of Canterbury being the preacher. It was in 1880 that the foundation stones of the now completed Cathedral were laid by the King, then Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall. Seven years later, the choir and transepts were consecrated, and it was, therefore, ruled that no further consecration of the whole cathedral was required. The late Archbishop Benson, the first Bishop of Truro, was the originator of this great work.

DR. MOORHOUSE, Bishop of Manchester, announced last week his resignation, which will take effect in October, and will not claim his pension of some £1,500, thus leaving the revenues of the see entire for his successor. The Bishop is seventy-six, and age and ill-health are his reasons for retiring. A Sheffield man, educated at Cambridge, he had been for ten years Bishop of Melbourne, when in 1886 he was called to succeed Bishop Fraser at Manchester.

THE Wesleyan Conference met at Camborne on Tuesday, the new President being the Rev. Marshall Hartley, who has been for some time the Conference secretary. On Wednesday the Conference debated and passed a series of resolutions on the Education question, one being to the effect that Wesleyans should retain their schools until the present Education Act were amended or repealed.

IT will be seen from a statement and account which we publish in another column, that a movement is on foot at Geneva, to celebrate the 350th anniversary of the burning of Servetus by the erection of an "expiatory" monument. Professor Montet, who is one of the signatories of the appeal, informs us that this is to precede the erection at no distant date of a great monument to Calvin and his fellow Reformers. While as kindred of the burnt rather than the burners we might feel this to be an act in which we cannot well take active part, yet our warm sympathy with the feeling which has prompted the suggestion may lead many of our readers to wish by their contributions to aid in its worthy accomplishment, and we shall be glad, as stated elsewhere, to receive and forward any donations that may reach us.

AT the great Temperance Convention at the Albert Hall, on Friday of last week, resolutions were passed in the afternoon, moved by Mr. George White, M.P., and the Earl of Carlisle respectively, protesting against the Bills of Mr. Butcher and Sir W. Hart Dyke, and expressing gratitude to those justices who are seriously endeavouring to reduce the number of licensed houses. At the evening meeting the following resolution was passed, moved by the Bishop of London from the chair:—

This Convention protests against any attempt, whether by means of a Compensation Scheme as in Mr. Butcher's Bill or by a Suspensory Bill such as that of Sir W. Hart Dyke, to prevent the magistrates from continuing to exercise their legal powers freely for the advantage of the public.

A MEETING of the Accrington Borough Education Committee was held on Thursday in last week, Councillor J. W. Cunliffe presiding. The committee had under consideration the action of the managers of Christ Church School in refusing to appoint Isabella Croft, a Unitarian, as pupil teacher, and passed the following resolution:—

"That this Authority enters its protest against the above-named action, and registers its opinion that while such action may be within the letter of the law, it is not in accordance with the promises made by the Prime Minister during the progress of the Bill through Parliament, and since the Act came into force."

It was further resolved that a copy of the resolution be sent to the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour with a statement:—

That in the opinion of the Accrington Authority an alteration the law is desirable, whereby no person can be rejected for any position in elementary schools on account of their religious beliefs or the religious beliefs of their parents.

An amendment was moved and seconded:—

That the action of the foundation managers and representatives of Christ Church School in refusing the application of Isabella Croft, coming as it does within the true meaning of the Education Act, be approved.

The amendment was lost. It may be as well to note that there are no Unitarians on the Education Committee for Accrington. The Rev. W. H. Burgess made a statement in reference to the case before the sermon on Sunday evening.

MEETINGS are being held in many places in support of the movement for a Treaty of Conciliation with France. The visit of the King to Paris and his cordial reception there, and the not less hospitable reception of President Loubet in London, have furthered the mutual goodwill of the two nations. The visit to London this week of eighty-six French deputies and senators to hold conference with members of the British Parliament on the subject, is an unprecedented event. They come as guests of the Commercial Committee of the House of Commons. The chairman of this Committee is Sir James Houldsworth, and it is stated by Sir J. Fergusson, who is a member of it, that it numbers 150.

THE movement is not a party movement. This is shown by the membership of the Commercial Committee of the House of Commons, which is active in the matter. It was shown also by a Town's meeting held in Manchester last Monday, presided over by the Lord Mayor, and called by him in response to a requisition from a large number of leading commercial men of the city, at which a resolution in favour of a Treaty of Conciliation was passed with unanimity. The Lord Mayor spoke of the great need for peace in the interest of industry and national prosperity, as well as from higher considerations, and said that he considered this the most important meeting over which he had presided during his mayoralty.

MR. THOMAS BARCLAY, who has given a vast amount of effort to further this movement, explains that the proposal is that between England and France a Treaty of Conciliation should be made on similar lines to those of the Treaty with the United States which was negotiated by Lord Salisbury and President Cleveland and signed on behalf of the two countries in 1896, but which failed of ratification because the two-thirds majority required in the American Legislature was not quite obtained. The proposal is that in case of any dispute between the two countries, before proceeding to hostilities about matters of vital interest, three great personages on each side, without an umpire, should meet to attempt to find a peaceful way out of the difficulty: if five of the six agreed together, the decision should be final: if four were ranged against two, it should be final unless protested against within three months. The postponement of hostilities during these deliberations would be in itself an advantage, and the fate of nations would not depend on the failure of temper or health of one man on either side.

IN this month's Cornhill Mr. Stephen Gwynn has an article on Father Dolling, noticing the Life by the Rev. C. E. Osborne, and Mr. Clayton's Memoir. Of Dolling's position Mr. Gwynn writes:—

The population of England, he held, had lapsed from the Church; where religion was kept alive among the masses it was by Dissent. "I thank God," he says, speaking of his own experience in Landport, "there were five active centres of Dissenting worship in my district alone." And it was in fact by a study of Dissenting methods that he hoped to make the Church again a Church of the people—by the "personal directness" of extempore prayer, by the employment not only of ancient, elaborate, and beautiful formulæ of public devotion, suitable to the spiritually educated who have been taught to feel their own part in an organised community of worship, but also of intercession in such words as might need no interpretation to the untaught seeking vaguely after a help concerning which they knew only their need of it. . . . In any true sense, his whole object was to shake off the tradition of that Church, as he found it existing—the tradition which had given over the Church to a class or a caste—and to return to a Catholic, that is to an all-embracing Christianity. He valued ritual, not as a link with the past, but as a means of operation in the present.

As to Dolling's relations with the Church authorities, Mr. Gwynn thinks that if he had been less of an impulsive Irishman there would have been no breach, and as a matter of fact the Church's spirit of compromise did at last prevail: the practices forbidden at Landport were permitted at Poplar.

The spirit of such proceedings transcends logic; it is that inclusiveness, that power of reconciling black and white, which distinguishes the British Constitution. Or, to put it in a slightly different form, the man of strong personality and convictions beat the system, as he always does in England; but the system impeded him quite sufficiently to discourage others from a rash imitation.

Under the title of "An Intelligent Briton's Mistakes," the Boston Transcript of June 22 published some notes on Mr. Augustine Birrell's Essex Hall lecture on Emerson. The lecture in its comments on things American contained inaccuracies such as are almost inevitable, the Transcript remarked, in one who has not lived in the country or studied its affairs profoundly, as Mr. Bryce, for instance, has done.

Thus Mr. Birrell describes Unitarianism as having become dominant in New England as the result of the revolt from Calvinism led by Emerson and other men of letters. In Connecticut, Vermont, New Hampshire, and Maine and western Massachusetts this never was a fact; and they make up the larger part—geographically, if not intellectually—of New England.

Nor is the knowledge of Emerson or the appreciation of his teaching as widespread in America as Mr. Birrell implies. Among intelligent and refined Americans Emerson's fame certainly is growing, and is no longer confined largely to New England, but to the majority he is still unknown, and there are large sections of the country where his name is still anathema.

Mr. Birrell also has been misled by some one in his estimate as to the reaction from Unitarianism to Episcopalianism in Boston. That Unitarianism has suffered numerically somewhat from defection of the sort is indisputable, but that "It has given place to a mild Episcopalianism" implies an alteration of relative strength in the community which certainly cannot be substantiated by statistics.

As to this last point, however, we may remind our readers of the article by Mr. Worsley Austin in "The Unitarian Problem in New England," in THE INQUIRER of April 18, which pointed out that in New England the increase of Unitarian churches in the last thirty years has not kept pace with that of some of the orthodox denominations.

A RESIDENT at Hawkshead writes with great pleasure and thankfulness of the services now being held on Sunday mornings at Windermere. The Albert Hall, where the services are held at eleven o'clock, is near the railway station, and there are comfortable arrangements for visitors from a distance and for the care of cycles during service. It is hoped that visitors to the Lake District during the summer, as well as residents, will take full advantage of this opportunity for united worship.

THE utmost sympathy will be felt for Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Chitty, of Dover, in the sad loss of their son Claude, a young man of great promise, who was studying music under Dvorak at Prague. Home for a holiday, he had walked with one of his brothers through the New Forest to Weymouth, and thence they had crossed over to the Channel Islands. It was through a fall, while descending a steep path on the rocky coast of Sark, a fall of fifty feet to the strand below, that Mr. Claude Chitty met his death. To the bereaved brother the most touching and warm-hearted sympathy was shown by the inhabitants of the island. The funeral took place on Monday in the quiet country churchyard of Capel, near Folkestone, where Mr. Chitty's grandparents, the Rev. Thomas Briggs and his wife, formerly of Dover, are also buried.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

SIR,—The paragraph you had in your last issue concerning the above is somewhat misleading. I am at present away from home; but in case you should receive no official correction, I send you the following few facts. What you say about the anonymous donation and the early commencement of extension work at Renshaw-street is correct. At the last committee meeting it was decided to at once consult an architect with a view to his submitting a plan of desirable extension at Willert-street. This has to come before another meeting of the committee, to be discussed and voted upon; and, therefore, cannot be said to be in abeyance. The only thing which is formally deferred is the issuing of a public appeal for subscriptions, and that is due to two causes of which one alone is a quite sufficient explanation, namely, that just when people are starting on their summer holidays, they are not usually very generously responsive to circulars asking for contributions towards building schemes. As the donation referred to is exclusively for Renshaw-street, the work which is to be proceeded with there is part of a larger scheme which may, or may not, be developed in conjunction with the need of increased accommodation at Willert-street.

CHARLES ROPER.

A NEW YEAR BOOK.

SIR,—A circular has been brought to our notice announcing the publication of the "Fellowship of the Prophets, being the Year Book of the National Conference compiled by a Council of Ministers, &c." Will you allow us to say that this apparently anonymous publication takes place without the knowledge or sanction of the Conference Committee, and however useful and correct it may be, it is not in any way the authorised or official Year Book of the Conference.

A. W. WORTHINGTON,
CHAS. FENTON, } Hon. Secs.

July 22.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—H. B. B.; R. D.; F. C. F.; R. W. K.; J. M. M.; S. H. M.; E. N.; C. R.; J. R.; O. M. R.; J. M. Ll. T.; A. H. W.

WHAT OUR YOUNG PEOPLE CAN DO FOR THEIR CHURCHES.*

BY THE REV. J. J. WRIGHT.

"Freely ye have received; freely give." —MATTHEW x. 8.

YOU will notice that these are Christ's words. He was speaking to his apostles. He had just chosen some of them, and was sending them all forth. And when he had told them where to go and what to do, he said: "Freely ye have received; freely give."

As you see, the words do not apply to money in particular. The apostles had received no money. Their Master himself had none to give. But he had given them power—mind-power, moral-power, spiritual-power, life-power; and then he said: "Don't keep it to yourselves. Make use of it. Do good with it. Pass it on to others. Freely ye have received; freely give."

Now that is the beautiful and beneficent law of all good life. You cannot even begin the better life without in some way obeying this law of giving as well as receiving. It is universal in its application; as true among Pagans as among Christians. It is simply impossible for any human being to avoid or evade it and not suffer. Anyone who tries to be a receive-all and a give-nought never escapes the bitter consequences.

We are all receivers. There is nothing we have that we have not received. And the condition, even of enjoying, lies in the giving-out—the using—of what we have received. So runs the eternal law, active as vitality, certain as gravitation.

To give is to live;
To deny is to die.

But why argue thus when there is a better reason still? It is this: We are Christians, or ought to be. We bear the name of Christ. Nay, more! We are also his apostles. Every one here present is not only a disciple, but also an apostle; for disciple means a learner, and apostle means one sent. And as even the oldest among us has surely something yet to learn from Christ, so the youngest among us, I believe, has a something to do and be for which he or she is sent—a something which, if they neglect, then Christ's work, God's kingdom on earth, will suffer.

Yea, and the words Christ uttered to his first apostles are his message to us also. Times have altered. Circumstances have changed. We have many things which the twelve apostles had not. But the message to them and to us abides the same: "Freely ye have received; freely give."

Let us look at these words, then, to-night, in the light of the occasion which brings us together—this annual meeting of our Guilds' Union in conjunction with the Triennial Conference of our Churches.

It is my duty, of course, to speak more particularly to the young people here present, but possibly what I say may be applicable to us all.

Well, now, there are two things which I want more especially to set before you. And those two things are:—

(1) What have our churches done for their young people?

(2) What can our young people do for their churches?

It is the second of these two things that I want us, with all our minds and hearts, to be most concerned about at this time. As regards the first question, however, I unhesitatingly say, to all our young people: Freely ye have received from our churches.

Let me put it to any one of you, very simply and very practically. You are, or have been, we will suppose, a scholar in one of our schools. You can look back now through a number of years. And, as you look back, picture after picture, of things that happened, you can see. "Things that happened"—lessons, meetings, parties, services! Yes, but "things" don't "happen" of themselves! Never a party but somebody prepared it; no meeting that was not humanly arranged; behind every lesson was a being of flesh and blood. And so, as you look back, in the pictures you see, do there not stand out before you some persons who made all that past time a reality and a blessing to you? You can look back and around upon companions, teachers, superintendents, ministers, and other workers. Very well. Now look at your life as it is this day: I mean your inner life. You may not think much of it. It is neither as cultured nor as good as you would like it to be. But, you will admit, it might have been worse. Your little inner world might have been smaller, thought might have been narrower, feeling might have been duller, and life itself less worth living, than they are.

Where, may I ask you, did you get—from whom did you receive—at least the quickening and more than likely the chief culture of the spiritual, the moral, and indeed the intellectual powers which are yours to-day? The growth and guidance of these powers do not come of themselves. Cause and effect are God's fixed rule for bodies and for souls. And so has it been with you. Every lesson you ever heard, every meeting you engaged in, every party you were "in at," every service you attended, fed and nourished, stirred and quickened, exercised and disciplined, deepened and enlarged, the mind, the heart, the spirit which are yours this day. Whatever you may have thought of them at the time, is it now possible for you to imagine what your minds and hearts at this moment would lack if every lesson, and every companionship, and every friendship, and every personal influence connected with our churches had been entirely left out of your lives? Have you not, then, freely received? I will not dwell upon the material things—such as this magnificent church, and all other of our churches and chapels, so dear to us, in different places—to which you young people are the natural heirs, except to remind you that we could never have had them—our oldest or our newest—had it not been for the heroism, the high principle, the self-denial, the generosity, the determined effort of those from whom we have received them. Be honourably proud of our churches, I pray you, and enter in to your rightful inheritance of them; but never forget that these material things are, after all, only the surroundings and accommodations; and that there are other things, far more precious, which we have freely received from the fathers and mothers of our churches in our own day, and in the days that are gone by. I do not want to idealise our ancestors, or our immediate forerunners. We can own our great indebtedness to them without idealising them. Nay, more so! The forerunners we have known, and the forerunners whom they knew, were very human, like ourselves. They found life quite as difficult as we do; and they had no powers but what we have. They had employments, and families, and homes to attend to. And it was flesh and blood, limited by time and necessity, with them, as it is with us. Their minds were no clearer than ours; care weighed as heavily on their hearts; and sin was as real to their souls. Work, either for themselves or for others, was no easier to them than to us. Praise was as pleasant but as scanty, and blame was as bitter but as abundant in those days as in these. And self-sacrifice for the good of others was just as hard to our forerunners as we to-day ever find it.

And yet, see what their efforts have made us the heirs of! Fumbling, stumbling efforts they, no doubt, often felt them to be, in their sincerest moments. But think, young people, what they have given you. Not only these material things—these churches and their means—but that something which is greater than all churches—that finer gold of Christian goodness, those richer rubies of the Christ-like spirit. Yes, I speak that which I do know—and there are those here present whose hearts at this moment answer—when I say that, from our churches, young people have freely received something of Christ's blessed power,—mind-power, moral-power spiritual-power, life-power. Is this not so?

I gladly own—indeed it goes without saying—that all this is true of every branch of the Christian church and its own young people. That only adds to our rejoicing. But we are thinking more especially at this time of the young people born into or belonging to the churches of our Conference; and now I beg the young people here present to note carefully my next point.

The tap-root of all real religion is sincerity; and, as it seems to me, there can never be utter sincerity of mind and soul where there is not absolute liberty for the same. Those two things, I venture to say, our churches offer to you, young people, as no other churches do. The cost of those two things in the past, the value of them in the present, you cannot realise. They are beyond price. They have been dearer than life. And yet they are freely yours—absolute liberty of mind and soul, whereby you may be, without fear, yet with all reverence, entirely sincere in your belief as in your life.

The tap-root of all real religion, I said, is sincerity; and the air in which religion can most vigorously grow is perfect liberty. But observe, even a tree needs something more than a tap-root, vital as that is, and a tree needs something more than the ample air in which it stands, to enable it to grow and bear fruit. So, along with liberty and sincerity, our churches freely offer to their young people the most living truth which, in olden or in latter days, God has given, or they have received. And why the most living truth? Why, because, as you young people know, our churches lay the chief emphasis upon life—upon that which you live. Truth for the sake of life, truth as the nourisher of life, that is what we offer. Liberty for the sake of sincerity, sincerity for the sake of truth and character; but all for the sake of life, the best life, the Christ life, God-life. Oh, young people, freely freely of these things ye have received.

* An address delivered in Ullet Road Church, Liverpool, on Monday evening, April 20th, 1903, at the National Conference Guilds' Union Service.

And now, for these churches of yours and ours, what can you do? Well, at any rate, you can freely give. Freely give what?—money? Why, of course! Our churches profess to believe in the doctrine of "paying your way." How often one has heard of the so-called creed—"one God, no devil, and twenty shillings in the pound." There is a saying that, in nature as in business, you get "nothing for nothing"; or, as we say here in Lancashire, "It's nowt for nowt, and very little for sixpence!" That our churches may pay their way, and flourish, it is becoming more than ever needful, in this matter of money, that our young people should learn the art and joy of real personal giving; and I could tell of young people who have already found that, blessed as it is to receive, it is more blessed to give. But, young people, believe me, there are some things that you can give to our churches which will help them more than money. Let us see. Youth is especially the time of imagination, of poetry, of ideals, of faith, of enthusiasm, of wondrous energy. And every one of those glorious things our churches want more of. And you alone, under God, can give them just these things. There is no one else that can. Most of us who are older are doing our best, God helping us. Many imperfections you see in us, no doubt. Trust me, we see imperfections and failures in ourselves, of which you cannot know. But that only makes you to be all the more needed. Nay, even if we older people were perfect, and if we could do for our churches all that is in our hearts at the best, we should still need the utmost help that you young people can give, to make our churches what they might be. There are some things, I tell you, that we cannot do, and that you can; and which, I believe, you will!

Look, I pray you, with your fresh young eyes and your warm beating hearts, at the needs of our churches. Tell us what you see! We want your new insight. We want your spiritual ideals. What do you feel our churches ought to be? Come and tell us, and come and help us to make them so! We older people have something to learn from you, and perhaps you young people may still have something to learn from us, "for we are none of us infallible, not even the youngest!" It takes all the eyes there are to see all that needs to be seen concerning our churches; and it will take all hearts, old and young, to bring our churches, in your time, nearer to your own young dream of what they might be.

But, may I whisper in your ears a secret? It is this: You young people have all the power within you, God helping you, to make your churches what you will! These churches are, to-day, what those who were once young as you, have made them. It must be so with each generation. Your turn has now come. Our churches are going to be what you choose. I was about to say that, what summer is to the earth, that may you be to our churches; but I mean even more than that! These churches of Channing and Martineau, of Tate and Rathbone, of Mary Carpenter and Louisa Alcott—yea, I will say of Richard Baxter—with all that they have stood for in their history; these churches which, even when their doctrines are condemned, are accorded by their condemners the honour of doing good deeds and maintaining high character; these churches which, I am convinced, were never more full of splendid possibilities than now. When I try to think what these churches of ours would be if only all the young people of them would unitedly bring into the work and worship of them the full glory and freshness of their youth; their kindling imaginations, their bright ideals, their invincible faith, their unquenchable enthusiasm, then do I see, indeed, that our young people might do even more for our churches than does the glorious summer for the earth!

But, I must whisper to you one more secret. It is this. You cannot—even you young people cannot—in a season, or a year, change and glorify our churches by your good spirit into that which, in your young dream, you would have them be. Yet, cherish your dream. Think often of what you would like your church or chapel to become. Talk of it with others. Bend your energies constantly towards your ideal; and, if your ideal changes, then bend your energies towards the better ideal; and, by and by, you should see—as I have seen—your ideal, or something better still, taking shape.

What? You are not in office, do you say? Yes, you are! Said I not at the outset that the youngest of you is an apostle sent of God to do and be what no one else but you can! Moreover, in Christ's great church, in God's kingdom, there is no one not in office. From the moment you become conscious of your life and your church, God put you into office. You are always in office. Fill that office, I pray you, with your whole young mind and heart, and soul, and strength. And then, I will tell you what happens. You will attend the services so steadily; you will enter into the worship so heartily; you will learn all about your Faith so eagerly; you will work, at every turn, for your church so ardently, that, in time, offices in it will seek you; you will never need to seek for its offices.

It is worthy of note that, so far, our National Conferences have chiefly led to some noble giving. They have moved us to make larger investments of money in our cause. But, friends, there is another investment as much needed as money—I mean an investment of our people themselves; and I would to God that this might be marked as the Conference when our young people gave themselves to our churches.

To give yourselves! Ah, young people, therein lies for you the secret of power and of joy. Yea, and therein, only deeper down, lies the secret, if not always of happiness, yet of something more abiding, the secret of blessedness and inward peace. "The noble army of martyrs" knew it as perhaps we never shall. But have not you yourselves known moments, at least, in your hearts, when, for the good you have tried to do, God's own benediction seemed breathed upon you?

The secret of power and of peace, oh, believe me, young people, you will find in some self-sacrifice, in something you aim to do for others. Did not Jesus say so? Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for others. Yes, you can do that! Time and strength are a vital part of your life; and to lay down these, be it ever so little, in service for the good of others, is to lay down that much of your life. To do something for others, over and above that which you are compelled, is to be a follower of Christ. For to lay down yourself is to lay down your life; and to lay down life is to find a deeper and larger life made yours. And as Jeanie Deans, the Scottish lassie, in Sir Walter's story, who walked all the way to London to plead for her sister's life, there said to Queen Caroline, "Oh, my leddy, when the hour of trouble comes to the mind or the body, and when the hour of death comes—that comes to high and low—oh, my leddy, then, it isna what we hae dune for oursels, but what we hae dune for others, that we think on maist pleasantly." Freely, freely, young people, ye have received; God move you, Christ lead you, above all things, in our churches, to freely give yourselves.

TO A BABY SLEEPING.

In the blue deeps of baby eyes
Sweet slumber loiters on her way,
In unresisting skies
Gathering her roses gay.

In the soft grace of baby cheeks,
So soon as the deeps have ebbed away,
Her sweetest realm she seeks,
And waves her rosy spray.

Loveliest of earth's heavenly things,
Sweet slumber come unto her own!
Rose petals like soft wings
Fluttering from her throne.

When baby wakes and the roses wane,
Do thou my memory not forget:
Ah! surely not in vain
Are such sweet visions met.

Into my heart, their sacred shrine,
These heavenly roses will I take,
To be through life a sign,
Dear babe, for thy sweet sake.

Not all the wealth the vain eye sees
Can pay the joy I owe to thee:
Pledge of that debt shall these Unwithering roses be.

E. L. H. THOMAS.

Affectionate dependence on the Creator is the spiritual health of the creature as averseness and independence are the spiritual disease of the creature. Sin consists in the absence of the love of God from the heart as the dominant principle, and it is not so much an action as a manner of existence. Thomas Erskine.

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.*

WE drew attention in a leading article a fortnight ago, to the fact that with the publication of the July number of the Hibbert Journal, the first volume is completed of this invaluable Quarterly Review of Religion, Theology, and Philosophy. We offered our congratulations to the editor and the sub-editor on the most encouraging success which has crowned their efforts, and noted the significance of the eagerness thus shown, both by writers and readers, to take advantage of the open field offered them, to enter into a free discussion of the greatest questions of human thought and life. Mr. Jacks wrote, indeed, last week, to warn us that the permanent success of the Journal is by no means yet assured, but there has never yet been such promise of decisive victory for such a publication in the interest of liberal religious thought as has followed its successive numbers; and now is the time, on the completion of the first volume, for loyal friends throughout the country and over seas to secure fresh subscribers for the coming year.

The new number amply sustains the character of the Hibbert Journal for frank debate and searching criticism. The place of honour is given to an article on "The Character of Jesus Christ," by a distinguished American Unitarian, the Rev. F. G. Peabody, D.D., Plummer Professor of Christian Morals in Harvard University. Incidentally, Dr. Peabody offers a suggestive criticism of his colleague, Professor William James's recent book on "Varieties of Religious Experience," pointing out that in such a work place ought to have been found for the consideration of the character of Christ.

He is no example of the "twice-born" conception of piety, which has been of late presented to us with such vigour and charm. His "Religion of Healthy-mindedness" is not a psychopathic emotionalism, but a normal, rational, ethical growth. His method is not that of ecstasy, vision and nervous agitation, issuing in neurological saintliness; it is educative, sane, consistent with wise service of the world, capable of being likened in an infinite variety of ways to the decisions and obligations which every honest man must meet. In short, the appeal of Jesus is primarily to the will. He calls for a moral decision. He assumes in men a capacity for righteousness, and expects from men a moral initiative. . . . The discipleship he desires is not sentimental, emotional, occasional; it is rational, ethical, a form of obedience, a direction of the will.

The chief note in the character of Jesus, Dr. Peabody finds to be that of strength. His sorrows and his joyousness have both been emphasised, from different points of view, but he is "no ascetic abandoning the world," and "no dreamer, no joyous comrade, delighti ngint he world." He is a "commanding personality, whose words are with the authority of power." He has the power and the authority of one who knows the things of which he speaks, who has a clear vision, a penetrating wisdom, and a firm hold upon the greatest realities of the moral and spiritual life. With this power two other things are noted: the prodigality of the sympathy of Jesus, and the pathos of his solitude of soul. But in that isolation of the inner life, Jesus found his communion with the life of God. There his ethics melt into religion, and the article concludes:—

His sympathy and his solitude are alike the instruments of his strength. The type of character directly derived from him—the Christian character—is not a survival of monastic or sentimental ideals, inapplicable to the conditions of this modern world; it is a form of power made effective through strength of soul. Its force flows down like an unstinted river among the utilities of life, because it is nourished among the eternal hills. It has its abundance and its reserves, its service and its solitude; and the power which moves the busy wheels of the life of man is fed in the deep places of the life of God.

In a very different field is the article on "Physical Law and Life," by Professor J. H. Poynting, of Birmingham, with the interest of whose scientific writings our readers are not unacquainted.

Dr. Poynting gives an extremely interesting exposition of the meaning of physical law in nature, and then passes on to show how in the midst of its uniformity there is room for the exercise of other powers in human life. Thus he reserves a place for genuine freedom of the will. One passage from this latter exposition we must quote. To those who maintain that the action of the will is entirely accounted for by the competitive action of various motives of which the strongest always prevails, so that the will is "like a feather fluttering through the air, swayed hither and thither by successive puffs, and finally borne off by the strongest current," Dr. Poynting remarks:—

Perhaps it is worth while pointing out that even with this idea of motives the analogy fails. A body does not yield to the strongest force. It moves in the direction of the resultant of all the forces from the greatest to the least, every one counting and having its full effect. The will finally takes one course with one aim and the motives prompting to other courses all drop out of action.

To the realm of comparative religion belongs Dr. James Moffat's article on "Zoroastrianism and Primitive Christianity," the first part of which appears in this number, and the Rev. W. Miller, Principal of the Madras Christian College, replies to Dr. Oldfield's article in the April number, on "The Failure of Christian Missions in India." A more valuable contribution to the discussion is found on a later page, among the "Discussions," by Mr. G. F. Deas, of Edinburgh. Mr. Miller points out that primitive Christianity made no greater or more rapid progress in the ancient world than has been made by Christian missions in India, and finds reason for confidence as to the future, but Mr. Deas pertinently asks whether what is preached by the missionaries nowadays is really the Christianity which conquered the Roman world, and whether it is not something much simpler and nearer to the mind of Christ, that must win India to acknowledgment of him.

For experts in Biblical criticism are the two articles, by Canon Cheyne, on "Pressing Needs of the Old Testament Study," and Mr. W. R. Cassels on "The Purpose of Eusebius." Of more general interest are the four articles grouped together in the centre of this number, by Churchmen, Roman and Anglican, dealing with various aspects of authority in religion and fellowship in the Church.

Mr. Wilfred Ward, in his article on "The Philosophy of Authority in Religion," as against Dr. Martineau's view of authority, to be sought within by each individual believer, pleads that ordinary individuals must submit to the authority of specialists, which has found expression in the consensus of the Church, and has its supreme example in the revelation of "the God-man Himself." To the authority of religious experience in transcendent souls, and above all in Jesus himself, Dr. Martineau allowed all due weight, but showed how it must find its authentication in the inward witness. What vitiates Mr. Ward's plea, is the assumption that "The Church," rather than all religious souls, is the depository of truth, and that the "God-man" of the Church represents the actual revelation of Jesus. Mr. Philip Sidney writes on "The Liberal Catholic Movement in England," maintaining that resentment against the unbending claims of Rome is very widely felt among English Catholics, and on the side of the Church of England, Dr. W. F. Cobb makes a vigorous plea for belief in the Reformation—a consistent faith in the right of private judgment in matters of religion. "The liberty of prophesying," he declares, is the essential principle of the Reformation. "With what face, then, can anybody claim to be a son of the Reformation while he neither thinks himself nor allows others to think?" Every outcry against heresy, instead of a sober attempt to meet reason by reason, reveals the bastard Protestant or the veritable Sacerdotalist, who takes refuge in authority and dare not fight in the open. But the Church of England, if she is to go forward, and escape the fate of the Church of Rome, in which intellect is "derelict," must hold fast to the liberty of the Christian man and have faith in truth and reason.

No less cogent is Mr. P. S. Burrell's article on "The Growing Reluctance of Able Men to take Orders." It is a powerful plea for the liberation of the Church from the fetters of antiquated creeds, and for faith in freedom, since the interests of truth and religion must be identical. Will the better mind of the Church of England listen to these pleas?

To one of the "Discussions" which, with the reviews of books, fill the last quarter of the Review, we have already referred. Two others are of no less interest, Professor Allan Menzies' rejoinder to Mr. Montefiore on "Jewish Scholarship and Christian Silence," and the Rev. George Galloway's criticism of Professor Pringle-Pattison on Dr. Martineau's "Theory of Freedom."

* Williams & Norgate, 2s. 6d. net. Subscription, 10s. per annum, post free.

Rise! for the day is passing,
And you lie dreaming on;
The others have buckled their armour,
And forth to the fight are gone:
A place in the ranks awaits you,
Each man has some part to play;
The Past and the Future are nothing,
In the face of the stern To-day.

A. A. Procter.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

THE COMMUNION SERVICE.

SIR,—It was not my intention to be drawn into any discussion upon this important subject when I wrote the brief review of the phamphlet on "Holy Communion" published by the Open Brotherhood. But Mr. Barrow, whose letter is a severer judgment than mine upon the Communion Service as usually administered in our churches, has asked me a question which, in courtesy, I feel bound to answer. He wants me to say how the injunction "Do this" is to be obeyed without the use of outward act and material object. As a matter of fact, he partially answers his own question, when he admits that "the express command 'Do this' of the Third Gospel is thought by many to be an early interpolation," and that "its appearance in 1 Cor. xii. 24 (this is a mistake for 1 Cor. xi. 23) is accompanied by a statement from the Apostle that he had received it, not by tradition, but by direct revelation."

My answer is easily given. (1) There are no sufficient historical grounds for the injunction having been given at all. (2) If there was one, it was addressed to a specific group of people, to whom Jesus had special relations, and not to later generations in the possibility of whose existence he did not believe. (3) It applied only to the immediate occasion, or, at the most, to the annual celebration of the Passover. (4) No human command, if there was one, can have the mastery over the spirits of free men. (5) A ceremony instituted by the command of any man, however great and good, and observed simply by way of obedience, not spontaneously from pure love, is more likely to be harmful than helpful. (6) The relation of outward act to material object, therefore, in this connection, falls outside the province of the inquiry.

At the same time I may give my opinion that symbols are permissible, and may be serviceable, so long as they represent naturally and truthfully the ideas for which they are supposed to stand. They are intolerable and mischievous when they are forms without life, or have lost their natural simplicity, or have been unduly associated with false ideas. The bread and the wine, e.g., are interpreted by the vast majority of Christians to be the very body and blood of God, literally, or in a high mystical sense, and therefore are as much symbols of idolatry as are the images at whose shrine the devout Catholic kneels and offers up an earnest prayer.

Mr. Barrow appreciates my feeling that the "Communion" Service is really in those congregations of ours in England in which it is celebrated a Disunion Service. Those who participate in it are but a handful, and the strong and sturdy life of our churches ignores it, or deliberately declines to give personal countenance to it. "To let it hang on as a survival, perishing with neglect, is more dishonouring than deliberate disuse," says Mr. Barrow. "In relation to our congregational life this ordinance has become a travesty." This is much more than I have said, but I fully concur in the judgment. It is time to cease calling that a Communion Service which divides us so sharply. I, for one, am not prepared to go so far as to deny to a group of members in any congregation the right to have a service of "The Lord's Supper," if it answers to a spiritual need of theirs, and if they will secure for the administration of it someone who really believes in it and can conduct the service with a whole heart. But no congregation has a right to make this a test question, either for membership or for the ministry.

In the early Church, before the sad aberrations of theology and ritual, the service of the Lord's Supper was a Communion Service, at least, to this extent, that all the members took part in it. "The bread which we break, is it not a Communion of the body of Christ? Seeing that we, who are many, are one bread, one body; for we all partake of the one bread" (1 Cor. x. 16, 17). But there were grave difficulties about it. Even then, as anyone may see who reads 1 Cor. xi. 17–22, 27–34, and, in so many words, divisions were said by the Apostle to exist in the church at Corinth, in relation to this very service intended to be a Communion. And the history of the Christian Church since then has been one prolonged and unseemly battle about the "elements" and their significance, who was worthy to come to the Lord's Table, and who was not? Historically, this service has rent Christians asunder, and the state of things in our own English churches to-day is a perpetuation of the deplorable divisions.

Happily, as I think, an increasing number of our congregations is allowing the rite to drop away, as no longer answering to a real need; and it is most significant that churches established within the last quarter of a century, or more, have not introduced it. Yet they are living organisations, and some of them have a richer and a more vigorous life than many of the congregations of older foundation.

The attempt to whip up an enthusiasm for a ceremony which most of our people do not want, and many of them utterly dislike, is doomed to failure, and it would be far better for congregations in this plight to adopt Mr. Barrow's suggestion, and decide to give up trying to revive a rite that is dead. It would mean some self-sacrifice and no little sorrow to a few who are sincerely attached to it, but this would be outweighed by the disappearance of that which, without any such intention, has become a wedge of disunion among people whose hearts are really one. It would also be clear gain to get rid of an attemped compromise with "Orthodoxy," which could only be to any extent successful as it meant the use of terms and symbols with different signification for each.

Let all our services be realities, corresponding with felt needs of our spiritual nature, and expressed through forms which truly represent our religious ideas. Paul would have been the first to condemn slavish attention to the letter at the expense of the spirit. This would be one of the dead works to be cleared away by a living faith. Like his Master, he valued truth more than any form. I am convinced that Jesus himself, who condemned the Pharisees for scrupulous attention to ceremonial, as though it were the very essence of religion, would never have instituted a Church ordinance on his own account, and would be distressed that a personal episode, so unpremeditated and touching, should have been hardened into an ecclesiastical rite. Those who really love Jesus can show it best by imitating his spirit, rather than by trying to repeat his words and acts.

C. J. STREET.

Bolton, July, 15.

CHRISTIANITY AND TARIFFS.

SIR,—I looked with much interest for your issue of Saturday in order to see if any discussion were evoked by your article on the above subject, an article which I should like to see dealt with by some abler pen than mine.

No one, however, has entered the field. In that article you formulate the serious change against Mr. Chamberlain's policy (and by implication against all who, like myself, are in favour of it), that it is "utterly and fundamentally unchristian." Such a charge, from such a source, must be my justification for asking you to allow me to reply.

The weakness of your article, in my opinion, lies in its utterly ignoring obvious facts and existing circumstances.

You commence with prophecy. It is somewhat odd to see the vanguard of the army of progress brandishing this rusty weapon from the armoury of an obsolete Toryism. An ounce of fact is worth a ton of prophecy. Outside these islands, the civilised world is practically Protectionist. Are France, Germany, and the United States "going straight upon national disaster"? If not, why should we?

If, indeed, the prophet be a prophet of truth, he has framed the most damning indictment against the fatal policy which has reduced this empire to such a pitiable state of weakness.

"The chief concern"—you go on—"is it not that the people at large shall find ready to their hand, cheap, good, and abundant, the commodities wherewith to satisfy their material needs?" Quite true, but only half the truth. Money to buy these commodities, work by which to earn it, are equally essential. Mr. Booth tells us that one-third of our population is in a state of chronic poverty. I do not know how far you accept his conclusions. They are accepted and used as an argument by soi-disant Free Traders against any increase in the price of food. But, if true, they show that free imports have done very little for our workers, however they may have benefited income-tax payers.

It is in your next paragraph that the weakness I have referred to is to me most manifest. Your language is not so clear as it might be, but I gather from it, that you accept the current fallacy, that the industrial and commercial progress of the last half-century is due to our fiscal system. This idea is on a level with that held by many good Christian people, that the Authorised Version of the Bible is the inspired and infallible Word of God. The chief source of this progress, whether in this country or any other, has been the steam engine, and this can be demonstrated as conclusively as the Babylonian origin of the Creation legend. You speak of cooked statistics. I have noted some cases of cookery in this controversy, but invariably on the Free Trade side. Those who would like to see a particularly barefaced specimen, may consult the Spectator of June 20, first column, first page. But these are petty beside the gigantic cooking operation indulged in by every Free Trader whose speeches or letters I have seen, from Mr. Gladstone downwards, who give all the credit of our marvellous industrial progress to our fiscal system, and altogether ignore the locomotive, the steamship, and steam or electric driven machinery.

The concluding sentence of this paragraph is simply matchless in its audacious disregard of fact. If it be true, then the Board of Trade returns for the last thirty years are absolutely false and misleading.

I very much regret to see you adopt the tactics of the unscrupulous politican, who so long as he can formulate a catching cry is not particular about its truth. "Dear food," you say, "is to be the ground," &c. Have you convinced yourself that preferential tariffs necessarily imply dear food? If so, I should much like to know the reasons on which you base that conviction.

Finally, a word on what is to us the most important aspect of this question, its moral and religious aspect. Here, again, it seems to me, you ignore obvious facts, and your judgment is thereby perverted.

I am not so enamoured as you appear to be of the "ideals of Cobden, Gladstone, and Bright." I am not sure that the gospel of buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest, points the soonest and the surest way to a universal brotherhood of the nations. I have a shrewd suspicion, that much of the sordid commercialism and Mammon worship of the day is the fruit of seed sown by the Manchester school. But let that pass.

Let us grant that their ideal was as you paint it. We have failed to realise it. Whose fault is that?

Not ours. We have striven after it for over half a century, and it seems receding instead of advancing towards us. The other civilised nations of the world will not have it, so "utterly and fundamentally unchristian" are they all.

You write as if the world, commercially speaking, were at peace, and Mr. Chamberlain a wicked agitator, bent on bringing in a sword to destroy that peace. In simple truth, it is not so. We are, and have been at war many years, but we have voluntarily tied our hands. We stand, a safe mark for the puniest archer to shoot at, and the other nations take full advantage of our supineness. All that Mr. Chamberlain asks is, that we shall free our hands, not in order that we may strike out blindly all round and molest the peaceful, but that we may strike in self-defence if necessary. Is it "utterly and fundamentally unChristian" to take up arms to repel a foreign invader? If not, then do I claim that neither is it unchristian to support Mr. Chamberlain.

J. RIDLEY.

13, South Western Terrace, Carlisle, July 13.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"PRINCE HAL, THE IDLER AND HINDERER."

THE Prince Hal of Shakespeare's story, was so fond of fun that he spent his time with companions as idle as himself, joking and playing jokes on other people. They did no work and laughed at the workers. They could take nothing seriously, not even the laws of England.

And what happened? Other idle folk thought that they would do the same. The number of evil-doers, law-breakers, grew greater, and respect for the laws grew less; for did not the King's son break these laws?

Englishmen began to think of the future, wondering what would happen when this wild young prince became king. For they already knew what it was to have a hinderer as king, and all the troubles that come of it.

The last king, Richard, had been an idler and hinderer, doing no work as king, spending his time and the people's money in amusements, and doing and allowing many things that made life harder for his subjects. So his cousin, Henry Bolingbroke, had himself made king, with the help of two more Henrys, the Percies, father and son.

And now it seemed to King Henry as if his own son, Henry, Prince of Wales, was going to be just such another idler and hinderer as the deposed King Richard. You can understand how uneasy this made the King for the future.

Besides he was a hard-working man, and his work was hindered by his son's jokes; for what is a king's work? It is to keep order, to protect the workers from being hindered, to protect the weak, to guard all from violence and injustice, and to punish those who break the laws and disturb the peace.

How could the King's officers succeed in keeping order in England if the King's son encouraged idlers and thieves? The Prince even went so far as to play at highwayman—for the fun of it! Naturally, neither the King nor the travellers who were robbed, could see where the fun came in.

Whilst the young Prince was thus hindering his father's work, the King was having a hard time of it in many ways, and really wanted his son's help. He had found it no easy task to keep order in those troubled times. The Percies and others who had helped him to the throne were now dissatisfied.

It seems as if Henry had deposed his cousin partly to get good government for England, and partly to get power for himself. The Percies seem to have helped him just for their own advantage, and they expected so much advantage in reward that it was impossible for Henry to satisfy them. So they wanted another change, and secretly planned with Henry's enemies in Wales and Scotland to join together against him.

Having deposed a weak, incapable king and set up a strong, capable one, they wanted to depose the strong one and set up another weak king, who would give them more of their own way. Thus they were going to disturb the peace for their own benefit, and prove hinderers in England.

A hint of their plot reached King Henry and preparations were made for war. At first, Prince Hal, idling in a London tavern, treated even the rumours of war as a jest. He and his companions must all go to the wars. He would get his friends made officers and they would all have fine fun. However, when the King sent for him and they talked face to face, Hal took it more seriously.

His father reproached him for his idle life, so like that of King Richard, and said he wished that young Harry Percy, called Hotspur, were his son, instead of his own Prince Hal. Hotspur was at least no idler, but a famous soldier. Henry even seems to say that this fighting Hotspur of the north, though now his enemy, is worthier to follow him asking than is Harry, Prince of Wales. The King's conscience is troubled by remorse for his share in Richard's death, and it seems to him as if God were punishing him now by means of his own son, another idler.

Young Harry's heart is touched by his father's grief and reproaches, and he promises to be in future "more himself." He would win a name for valour instead of idleness, he would try and prove as brave a soldier as the famous Hotspur.

In those days, fighting was the first work for a young prince to learn, and now that King Henry was threatened by war, young Harry's place was at his father's side, to fight against his father's enemies, the Percies. He would now work with his father against the hinderers, instead of being himself a hinderer.

Before their meeting is over news comes that the rebels have met at Shrewsbury. The King plans with his son that their armies shall meet and march on to fight the enemy there. At Shrewsbury the battle takes place, and Prince Hal helps his father to win the victory. He saves his father's life, and by slaying Hotspur removes his father's most dangerous enemy.

The real battle waged for many hours and hundreds were slain on both sides, and the memory of it is sad and terrible. It was a victory over those who were hinderers of England's welfare. But the victory that Shakespeare's play helps us to remember is not so much that of Henry Bolingbroke over Harry Hotspur. It is the victory of work over idleness.

You will like to hear that Prince Hal repaid the travellers whom he robbed. He did not give up his love of fun, but from this time he did not let fun interfere with his own work, or that of other people.

LILIAN HALL.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom, or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, JULY 25, 1903.

WHAT THE CENSUS MEANS.

WE gave some particulars, last week, of the Religious Census for London, recently completed by the Daily News, and referred to the interesting collection of comments on the results by representative members of the various churches, published in the issue of that journal for Thursday, July 16.

There is a very general agreement with the main contentions of Mr. MUDIE-SMITH, the organiser of the Census, and especially with the plea that if the churches are to make any deeper and more far-reaching impression on the unchurched masses than has hitherto been the case, they must abandon many of their stereotyped methods, and not be afraid to be natural and human, and must go out into the open to meet the people on their own ground. Nor is it doubtful that the effective power of preaching is as great a reality as ever, and as essential to the true life of a church. Thus the Rev. JAMES TRAVIS, of the Primitive Methodist Church, and President of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches, finds evidence in the Census that "real Gospel preaching has not lost any of its power over the people," while Mr. STOPFORD BROOKE, as representative of Unitarians, does not believe that there has been any real decline in the attendance at public worship, and adds: "If you get a man of intelligence, sympathy, and some formative ability in the pulpit, you can always fill your church to the doors; and more than ever now." And the Rev. J. E. WATTS-DITCHFIELD, of St. James-the-Less, Bethnal-green, at the conclusion of a series of vigorous comments, noting that Nonconformist preachers draw more men on Sunday evenings throughout London than the Church of England, confesses that there must be a weak point somewhere, and asks, "Is it in the services? Is it the type of clergy generally found? Or in the lack of grit in the sermons delivered?".

The Dean of WESTMINSTER is one of those who bear warm testimony to the care and accuracy with which the Census was carried out, and he finds the result more encouraging than had been feared. He welcomes it as an antidote to what he calls the pessimism of Mr. CHARLES BOOTH'S work on "Religious Influences in London." As to the figures of the Census, he concludes: "If we cannot take all the comfort which at first sight they seem to offer us, we shall yet feel that, tested by this one particular test, the London of our love and our hope has not failed us so grievously as most of us had been inclined to fear."

Canon SCOTT HOLLAND tells an old Oxford story to mark the different worth of present-day attendance at worship, compared to that of a former generation, when men were "gated," if they were not in chapel. The old compulsion of habit and public opinion is to a great extent gone; the people who now go to church are those who want to go, "whose souls are athirst." And he adds this testimony to a positive change for the better:—

> I am told, by one who has been away from London for some years, that, coming back to preach, he finds that even that most solid and portentous body of churchgoers who confine their spiritual aspirations within the limits of eleven o'clock Sunday matins are quite changed in tone from what they were as he remembered them. No longer does the unhappy preacher feel himself beating up in vain against stiff walls of stodgy plum-pudding. Now it is jelly that quivers. It is really alive. The men who are there, frock-coats and all, may be few, but they are positively listening. They have come to get something which they need and for which they have made an effort. They might have been golfing at Lillingston, and lo! they are here in church.

On the other hand, the judgment of Dr. JOHN HUNTER as to the value of numbers in church is eminently worth considering. We are in danger, he says, of judging by a false standard, and valuable as statistics may be for certain purposes, it is easy to think too much of them:

> The truest and best work of our religious and Christian institutions cannot be measured by figures and put into reports and newspaper paragraphs. It is easy to say how many men, women, and children attend a certain place of worship, but the statistics of thought and affection, of moral and religious quickening and growth, cannot be so readily given. Numbers by themselves are no test of the best influence and success. Reaching both the classes and the masses is not so very difficult if one is not particular as to how it is done. Church crowds are seldom worshipping congregations. The things which attract people of all classes to the churches are often as petty and pitiful as some of the published reasons for non-attendance. The idea of the worship of God, or any serious interest in ideal things, is quite foreign to many who are drawn to our Established and Free Churches. I never blame people for expecting too much from the churches and their ministers, but for not expecting more in all serious and lofty ways.

And Dr. HUNTER adds a very earnest plea for insistence on the need of public worship, in churches identified with the ideal aspects of life, for the nourishment of "reverence, and faith and hope, which are the springs of noble character and conduct." There must be on the part of the Churches no lowering of their ideal or of the quality of their work. "There are successes which are worse than failures."

We need everywhere a revival of religion—only there must be nothing weak and cheap and artificial in our methods. The souls of men must not be sought and won by other and less than truth and God. To have a redeeming and elevating influence in the community the Churches must work and continue to work for great things in a great way.

Dr. CLIFFORD is also one of those who plead for loyalty at all costs to principle and a great ideal. He warns his Baptist brethren against thinking too much of their success in the matter of numbers. "Our business is to grow men—many men if we can, but certainly men. Quantity? Yes, if possible; but quality assuredly. We exist to develop harmony and symmetry of manhood, intellectual, ethical, and spiritual strength of character."

One other lesson of the Census, we must hope, has been widely taken to heart. It shall be our last consideration here, and we cannot put it better than in the words of Dr. HORTON:—

> There is only one conclusion, so far as I can see, to draw from the Census as a whole. It is this: The time for mutual jealousies and estrangements is past. We who bear the name of Christ, at any rate—and for my part I would willingly embrace the Jews and the Ethical Societies—should agree to regard with mutual respect the small differences which divide us, and with cordial sympathy to work side by side, and even heart to heart, to present the claims of religion to London.
>
> Thankfully, however diffidently, would I stand on a common rostrum here on Hampstead Heath with my Anglican brother at Christ Church, with a Dominican from the Priory, and with Rabbi Green, that we might proclaim to the indifferent, to the suffering, to the sinful who throng the Heath on Sunday what God requires of us all, what Christ was, what He taught, how He touches our modern life; and that we might unitedly call on the multitude to approach God in prayer and to offer Him the worship which is His due.

CHRISTIANITY AND TARIFFS.

WE publish in another column a long letter in reply to the leading article which appeared under the above heading in our issue of the 4th inst. Our correspondent, Mr. RIDLEY, falls foul of our statement that

> To seek to restrict to one particular group of peoples, in however small a degree, the mutual advantages of trade relations, and the relations of friendship depending upon and following them, is to misapply the natural sentiment of kinship, is terribly short-sighted from a materialistic point of view, and is utterly and fundamentally unchristian.

He, however, makes no attempt to controvert our main contention, that the demand for Protection is based upon the contemplation rather of the difficulties of particular trades, in the competition for the supply of the wants of the community, than of the needs of the community as a whole. It is on this contention that we base a charge of conscious or unconscious selfishness against those who inspire the demand for Protection. And a selfishness which seeks its end at the expense of others, whether manifested by an individual, by a trade, or by a nation, is, we submit, beyond doubt "utterly and fundamentally unchristian."

Mr. RIDLEY charges us with adopting the tactics of the unscrupulous politican, in our reference to "dear food." It chances that he is mistaken, however, in supposing that we adopt the "catching cry" without being "particular about its truth"; and we assure him in all mildness, that we have "convinced ourselves that preferential tariffs necessarily imply dear food."

The reasons on which we base that conviction are a matter of simple addition. If an imported commodity costs so much untaxed, it will cost so much more when there is a duty upon it; and, since there cannot be two prices for one commodity in the same market, producers of the untaxed commodity on this side of the customs barrier will necessarily raise their charge for their product to an equality with the price charged for the taxed products of their competitors from the other side. The onus of proof lies with the challengers and not with the upholders of so simple a proposition, and when Mr. RIDLEY and his friends have brought up their proofs, and not till then, will the charge that protectionism is in essence unchristian have been met.

Similarly with regard to Mr. RIDLEY's charge of "matchlessly audacious disregard of fact" in our statement that increased importation of foreign goods has and will have its counterpart in stimulated exports and increased production, if not in one home industry, then in another.

"If this be true," says Mr. RIDLEY, "then the Board of Trade returns for the last thirty years are absolutely false and misleading." It is not the returns that are at fault, but Mr. RIDLEY's interpretation of them. Mr. RIDLEY will find the reason of the apparent disparity in values between imports and exports, which troubles so many whose investigations into the question have not been carried far, explained with great lucidity on page 103, et seq., of Mr. G. H. PERRIS's book on "The Protectionist Peril," which we noticed last week. In part, it represents the commissions of our merchants on foreign trade; in part, the earnings of our ships; and in part, interest and profit on foreign investments and businesses.

But in point of fact, the truth of our assertion is proved by the absurdity of the only alternative—that we are paying for the increase of our imports, as the New Zealand Premier so ludicrously supposes, by the annual exportation of "161,000,000 golden sovereigns." If that were true our country would, indeed, long ago have been reduced to the "pitiable state of weakness" at which Mr. RIDLEY appears to suppose—why, we cannot imagine—the Empire has already arrived.

We are far from believing, as Mr. RIDLEY appears to think we do, that our industrial and commercial progress during the past fifty years—and it appears we have progressed—is due solely to Free Trade. We are as ready as our correspondent to give steam and electricity and many other things their share of the credit. On the other hand, the fact that France, Germany and the United States have not been ruined is most certainly not due to their Protectionism. In each of them the ill effects of their fiscal policy has been mitigated, partly by the bounteousness of their own internal resources and partly by the stimulus which our own free ports have given to their trade. The supposition that this country, dependent on its imports to so enormous an extent for its food and other raw material, would escape the consequences of similar folly to the same extent is a very dangerous one indeed.

Again, we are only too painfully aware that Free Trade offers no final solution of the problem of poverty in our midst. Mr. Charles Booth has told us that some thirty per cent. of our London population, men, women, and children, are living in poverty, and Mr. B. S. Rowntree has made a similar statement with regard to the city of York. But these gentlemen's standard of comfort is a very different standard from that by which poverty was measured sixty years ago, and it would be preposterous to suggest that, on the average, the material condition of our poorer classes has not enormously improved in the past sixty years. We may surely hope that land, liquor and other legislation may produce a yet greater change in the sixty years to come.

As Mr. RIDLEY says, money to buy them with, and work wherewith to earn the money, are as necessary as cheap commodities themselves. When Mr. RIDLEY and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN show us a means of obtaining more work and better wages for our poor than they have at present, we shall hear them gladly, but meanwhile we take leave to hold fast our bird in the hand, the cheap commodities.

Mr. RIDLEY speaks of the "sordid commercialism" of Free Trade ideals, but it is our concern to see to it that the sordid commercialism of those who seek to be propped up in their competition with their rivals abroad by the taxation of the necessities of the poor, shall not be allowed to dictate the fiscal policy of this nation.

We have failed, says Mr. RIDLEY, to realise the ideals of our Free Trade policy. Does he really suppose that the closer intercourse with our neighbours which has followed in the footsteps of Free Trade, has done nothing to make war less probable and international goodwill more real? That is not our reading of the signs of the times. Neither do we admit that advocates of Free Trade among our neighbours are losing ground. In both Germany and America the exact reverse is the case. But the gain to us and to our neighbours of our free ports is not destroyed by the disadvantage to us and to them of their tariff barriers. Why, because we cannot get the whole good, are we to be asked to surrender the partial good which is already ours?

There is fiscal war, it is true, all around us, but it is war waged by others and not by ourselves. The amount of our imports is no proof of the evil this warfare is working, except in so far as that amount is limited by the limitation which the tariff barriers against us impose on the exports by which we pay for them. Were we to strike back in the way that Mr. RIDLEY and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN propose, there would be not "self-defence" in our blow but self-mutilation. This is in very truth a matter in which enlightened self-interest, as well as Christian precept, enjoins that we should overcome evil with good.

LEO XIII.

THE Pope's long life and its story, so far as external changes are concerned, is soon told. The Pecci were of Siennese origin; the Pope's father had served under Buonaparte, and the future Pope himself was born at Carpineto on March 2, 1810. He was educated first under the Jesuits in Viterbo, and then at the Roman Accademia, a college intended for student so far is tocratic birth who are preparing for holy orders. At that time, as everybody knows, the Pope governed as civil ruler the large tract of country called the States of the Church, and he did so chiefly by means of ecclesiastics who were often tonsured or in minor dress merely. There was no need that they should be in holy orders, much less that they should be priests. Thus it came to pass that young Pecci entered the Prelatura, then practically the only career open to an ambitious youth born in the Papal Kingdom, and was, before his ordination to the priesthood, entrusted by Gregory XVI. with various offices of minor importance. Next, in December, 1837, he was ordained priest, and had work to do and experiences to encounter such as will, in all probability, never fall to a priest's lot again. To hear of them seems to carry us back, not decades, but centuries. We can scarcely realise that so strange a world existed in the life-time of a man who has just passed away. Yet so it was. Young Pecci, a few weeks after he had received the priesthood, was sent to govern Benevento, where his principal difficulty lay with bandits who infested the country and (here is the notable point) were supported by the noble families of the district. He had no less anxious work as ruler of Perugia, then honeycombed by secret societies. In 1843, having been consecrated bishop, he went as Nuncio to Brussels, and it is interesting to learn that he crossed the sea, was presented to our late Sovereign, made the acquaintance of Archbishop Whately, and was able a short time ago to recall distinctly one of the humble London chapels (Lincoln's Inn, if we remember rightly) in which he had said mass. He also made a visit of two months to Paris, and returning to Italy was, in 1846, created Archbishop of Perugia. The red hat came to him in 1853, but he had almost till the death of Pius IX. little influence at Rome. His modest and sober views did not please the Pope or his entourage, and he was condemned to the obscurity of a provincial town. Few Englishmen had even heard his name when he was elected Pope in 1878 by forty-four votes out of sixty-one. It is rather difficult to account for the choice which the Cardinals made. We may, however, believe that they were weary of the hysterical vehemence of Pius IX.; that it was a relief to have for Pope a man of cultivated and refined taste, who was devoted to Dante, and found his favourite amusement in writing Latin verse. Again, Pecci had taken no part in Roman intrigues, and had therefore made no enemies. Add to this that he was in delicate health, nearly 70 years of age, and not likely, therefore, to last long. The Church would at all events have time to breathe, and indeed needed rest after the perpetual meddling of Pius IX.

Cardinal Pecci, who as Pope took the title of Leo XIII., in one respect at least certainly deceived common expectation. His has been the longest Pontificate on record, save and except that of his immediate predecessor. Nor can it be said that as ruler of his Church he has been by any means lacking in activity or initiative. What, then, has been the effect of his Pontificate as a whole? Cardinal Newman, just after his own elevation to the sacred purple, used these words of the new Pope: "In the successor of Pius I recognise a depth of thought, a tenderness of heart, a winning simplicity, and a power answering to the name of Leo which prevent me from lamenting that Pius is no longer here." Has that forecast been justified by the quarter of a century which is gone since Newman spoke? It is hard in any case to give a very definite answer to this question, and we are perhaps too near the events to judge them fairly. Still, we may set down the following points as worthy of consideration.

First, the contrast between the tone of Pius and Leo was very marked and significant throughout. Even the admirers of Pius were always nervous as to what he would say next. He was absolutely unrestrained in his utterances. Could anything, for example, be more reckless than his declaration, true though it was from the Roman point of view, that the German Emperor was in virtue of his baptism the spiritual subject of Christ's Vicar? Pius was never weary of denunciation, and as if the differences between the Church and the world were not serious enough already, he aggravated them enormously by the publication of the Syllabus, with its condemnation of modern progress, and by defining, in the teeth of tradition, the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin and the Papal infallibility. Leo, on the contrary, was singularly patient and urbane. Consequently he succeeded in establishing friendly relations with the German Emperor, and if he was less fortunate in France, it may be fairly said that this was no fault of his. He impressed upon the French clergy the duty of accepting loyally the established Government, and did something to restrain the extravagancies of the French Ultramontane Press. Again, he toiled hard to promote the study of ecclesiastical history and of the Holy Scriptures among the clergy, and if he greatly overrated the permanent value of the scholastic philosophy, we may well be thankful to him for the munificence with which he promoted the publication of Aquinas' works in a new and splendid edition. Nor will English Romanists fail to bless his memory for opening up to them a liberal education at the two great universities of this country, which had been closed against them not by their Protestant rulers but by their own bishops at the bidding of Pius IX. By another gracious act at the very beginning of his Pontificate he won the gratitude of every Englishmen worth counting. He recognised the transcendent genius of Newman, and the cloud which had hung so long over that great soul was lifted at last. We say that this was a joy to England, and not simply to the Roman Church in England. Englishmen are proud of Newman. They are proud of him as the greatest master of English speech, proud of him for the magic charm of his personality, proud of him because, himself possessed with the sense of unseen realities, he has more than any man of his age brought home to the heart and conscience belief in an omnipotent God, in the awful authority of conscience, in the powers of the world unseen. The Pope also promoted others such as Archbishop Hainald and Fürstenberg, Prince-Bishop of Olmütz, who, like Newman, believed the definition of Papal infallibility to be inopportune. The same honour would have been given to Dupanloup had he lived a little longer. We may be disappointed that Leo did not go further. It may seem strange that after his experience at Benevento he failed to see that the loss of the temporal sovereignty was a blessing in disguise to the Papal power; or that in his Brief of 1893 so learned a Pope should have committed himself to the absolute inerrancy of the sacred records. We may moreover lament that he did nothing to check the superstitions of the popular devotion to the blessed Virgin, or to emend the legends of the saints which disfigure the Breviary. Still even here we must remember that he dealt tenderly with so bold a critic as M. Loisy, and great allowance must be made for one who inherited the accumulated bane and blessing of the past.

The end came at last, and he died as we should wish to die, with courage and endurance, with humility and resignation, conscious of great duties imperfectly fulfilled and leaning on the infinite mercy of God in Christ.

WILLIAM ADDIS.

MICHAEL SERVETUS.

AN EXPIATORY MONUMENT.

SIR,—October 27, next, will be the 350th anniversary of the day on which Michael Servetus died at the stake at Champel.

The execution of the unfortunate Spaniard was an act of intolerance, directly opposed to the true principles of the Reformation, and of the Gospel.

We are desirous of publicly expressing our regret at this act, and seize this opportunity of most emphatically affirming our stedfast adhesion to the principle of the liberty of conscience, which was so very much ignored in the sixteenth century, both by churches and public authorities.

The proposal which we are submitting to you has had for one of its chief promoters Professor Doumergue, of Montauban, the historian of Calvin. It has been approved in principle, in France by the Fraternal Committee of the Reformed Churches, and by the Permanent Committee of the non-official General Synod; at Geneva by the Association of Ministers. It has been duly considered by a committee comprising men of all shades of reformed Protestantism, who have unanimously agreed on the text of the inscription which appears below.

Our object is to erect at Champel, as near as possible to the spot where the execution took place (No. 6, Chemin de Beau-Séjour), a monumental block of granite, bearing the two following inscriptions:—

ON OCTOBER THE 27TH, 1553,
DIED AT THE STAKE AT CHAMPEL,
MICHAEL SERVETUS,
OF VILLENEUVE, D'ARAGON,
BORN SEPTEMBER 29TH, 1511.

REVERENT AND GRATEFUL SONS OF CALVIN,
OUR GREAT REFORMER,
BUT CONDEMNING
AN ERROR WHICH WAS THAT OF HIS AGE, AND STEADFASTLY ADHERING TO LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE
ACCORDING TO THE TRUE PRINCIPLES OF THE REFORMATION AND OF THE GOSPEL,
WE HAVE ERECTED THIS EXPIATORY MONUMENT,
ON THE 27TH OCTOBER, 1903.

The realisation of this scheme will entail an expense of, at least, 5,000 francs (£200). We are hoping to receive contributions, however small, from Protestants of all shades of theology, from churches, from official and non-official bodies, in short, from all sincere friends of the Reformation and of the Gospel, who are devoted to the principles of the liberty of conscience and of religious liberty, that is to say, from all Protestants. In fact, the more numerous the participators in this proposed manifestation are the better shall we be enabled to say: "The whole Protestant Community repudiate this execution, this act of intolerance."

We beg you, sir, urgently to favour us with your support by returning the enclosed note signed and accompanied by a promise to subscribe.

THE COMMITTEE.

Ami Bordier.
Auguste Chantre, Professor of Theology.
Francis Chaponnière, Pastor.
Eugène Choisy, Vice-president of the Association of Pastors.
Alexandre Claparède.
Edouard Claparède.
René Claparède.
Charles Cougnard, pastor.
L. Cramer-Micheli, President of the Consistory.
Marc Doret, Professor of Theology.
Charles Eggimann.
Théodore Flournoy, Professor in the Faculty of Science.
Gaston Frommel, Professor of Theology.
J.-J. Gourd, Professor of Philosophy.
Charles Martin, Pastor.
Ernest Martin, Professor of Theology.
Henry Maystre, Pastor
Eugène Mittendorff, Pastor.
Edouard Montet, Dean of the Faculty of Theology.
Paul Moriaud, Professor of Law.
Auguste de Morsier.
Adrien Naville, Professor of Philosophy.
Louis Ruffet, Professor of Theology.
Charles Seitz, Professor in the Faculty of Literature.
Ernest Stroehlin, Professor.

Geneva, July, 1903.

[We are very glad to give publicity to the above statement and appeal, and shall be prepared to receive and forward to Geneva the names and the donations of those of our readers who may wish to have a share in the erection of this monument. If sending direct to Geneva, an intimation of adhesion, with name and address, should be forwarded to Monsieur le pasteur E. Choisy, 4, Boulevard de la Tour, Genève; donations should be paid to M. Barthélemy Bouvier, Banque Darier et Cie, Boulevard du Théâtre, No. 3, à Genève.

Donations sent to the office of THE INQUIRER will be acknowledged in these columns.—ED. INQ.]

A CITY OF THE DEAD.

UNDER the cliffs of Orvieto, beneath the débris of two millenniums, on slopes covered with small vineyards, patches of corn, and little farms, lie the remains of a city of the dead. They are not the dead of mediæval massacre, when faction fights raged furiously, and the different branches of the great Monaldeschi family, bearing the names of the "Stag," the "Viper," or the "Dog," wrought their hideous work of murder and plunder. In 1380, it is said, there were three thousand families within the walls. Six years later Berardo Monaldeschi fell on one quarter of the city with a troop of Breton mercenaries, and slew three thousand people. In 1424 there were but two hundred households left. The modern town with its faded palaces, its decaying public buildings, and the grass-grown square round the cathedral, has a melancholy air of prolonged dissolution in spite of the brilliance of the restored mosaics on the front of the famous Duomo, and the funicular railway which conveys visitors from the principal station in the valley to the heights above. Every student of Turner will recall the oil-painting in the National Gallery which seizes with so much fidelity the strange features of the site—the long, irregular, isolated plateau crowned with the buildings of the Palazzo del Popolo, the towers of one or two great churches, and the pinnacles of the Duomo; the belt of reddish tufa cliffs girdling the hill; the valleys—through one of which the Tiber runs—sweeping round it and at last uniting; the heights around which overlook it, and lift the whole scene into grandeur. The position of the city bears a strange resemblance to that of Samaria, save that the hill of Ephraim's ancient capital had no such protection as the circuit of cliff which guarded Urbs Vetus (contracted into Orvieto) of old Roman days.

But the city of the dead, of which a portion was first uncovered in 1874 (more excavations were made seven years ago), was already venerable when the Roman conquerors captured the proud Etruscan town upon the rocks above in 280 B.C., and carried off no less than two thousand statues. Here on the slopes descending towards the Tiber, and possibly all round the hill, lie streets of tombs beneath the waving corn and wandering vine. They are not, like the numerous sepulchres elsewhere, hewn in the rock; they are houses for the dead, standing in rows—in one street you may count six doors on one side, and five opposite them on the other. The walls of these houses are built of large blocks of the red tufa of the locality. The architecture is simple. No cement is used, and the massive stones, carefully cut, fit close. An outer doorway, tall and narrow, without ornament, leads through a small square vestibule to an inner door. This is the entrance to the chamber where the dead were laid. It is perhaps 12 ft. long, 9 ft. in height, and 6 or 7 ft. wide. The roof is constructed of flat blocks, laid one upon another in such a way as to meet in the middle. Outside, it has the appearance of flights of steps rising from opposite walls, and joined by a central ridge. Inside, the square angles of the projecting courses have been cut away, and a kind of stone pent-house results. The roof is enclosed by a high parapet of erect slabs, and ornamented with carved stone cippi, somewhat in the shape of stout fir-cones. Simple was the furniture needed for the dead within. A stone bench, perhaps two or three, ran along the wall. One tomb has been preserved as it was found when first opened. The bones of the departed still lie on their rude couches. A gold ring has dropped from a decaying finger, and rolled upon the ground. Hanging on the walls are cups and plates, some of earthenware and some of bronze. There are little vases which may have held perfumes; large jars for oil and wine stand on the floor. But the early date of the tombs is indicated by the absence of decoration on the walls; there are no sepulchral chests; the painted vases are of archaic style; and the beautiful mirrors so frequent in the tombs of the third century B.C. (no less than eleven were found in one tomb) had not yet been introduced. The relatives of the dead held feasts in their honour, perhaps for their actual maintenance in the ghostly life of the tomb; the remains of their cups and plates are found outside, with the unconsumed bones of fish, flesh, and fowl, as well as quantities of egg-shells. We still mould our pottery to the ancient shapes; we still ornament it with Etruscan patterns; how much more of their civilisation has gone to make ours?

On the hills overlooking Orvieto from the south, a little east of the point chosen by Turner for his picture, there is a rocky mound among the chestnut woods called Poggio Roccolo. Olives and poplars clothe the slopes below: the wild rose and the honeysuckle made the wayside lovely as our carriage slowly wound up the zig-zag road. At length we left it, and along a narrow rock-cut passage followed our guide to a tomb hewn in a low cliff below a little farm. It was a simple chamber with a ceiling carved to represent masonry; but the walls had been richly painted. Forty years have passed since the entrance was discovered, and the mural pictures have been grievously injured by damp; but with the help of the drawings made in 1863 by Count Conestabile, the designs can still be traced. On the right doorpost a demonic figure with bluish flesh and yellow wings brandishes a snake to warn off the intruder; it is Charun, the Etruscan equivalent of the Greek Charon; a similar figure, less distinct, matches him on the opposite side. Over the doorway, within, are two long striped bearded serpents, face to face, as if defying unauthorised approach; they are the emblems of the world of the dead. But that world is apparently not without its good cheer. The home of the departed may be only a rock-hewn room; its accommodation nothing but stone benches against the wall. But there are scenes of gaiety around. On either side of the doorway is a chariot with noble horses, red and grey. They are fastened to the pole by broad leather bands passed under their necks. The drivers wear white tunics with red borders; the hair of one is twisted high into a sort of peak. Beyond, on the right, are banqueting tables with rich drapery; carved footstools stand beneath; upon the couches are revellers, white-robed and laurel-crowned, in eager talk; one raises his hand with quick, keen gesture. The feast spreads round to the opposite wall, where sits golden-haired Tanaquil with a fillet round her head, and a band of musicians, all dressed in white, play in silence on a seven-stringed lyre and strange curved trumpets. Could some spell be laid on these figures to wrest from them secrets of life and melody, or extract their essence from the meats and wines? Who can tell the mysteries of these graves?

Another tomb hard by is not without further clues. It is seventeen feet square, partially divided by a partition projecting from the wall opposite the entrance. Here is the whole story of the feast: the carcase of a huge red ox is depicted hanging from a beam; between pigeons and fowls are a hare and deer. Hard by, one slave chops flesh on a low meat-block; through the open furnace-door a blazing fire is seen, and a young slave approaches with a large frying-pan, while the chief cook stands behind, chopper in hand. Elegant tripod tables are set out, with grapes, pomegranates, and eggs; musicians play; the chariot is driven by a fair-haired youth; but beside the horses stands a Lasa, or genius of the dead, the unseen attendant during life who followed the departed to the other world. She is in human form, but her spiritual rank is indicated by large bluish wings; knotted serpents thrust up their heads from her waist; she has a robe of deep red, and her necklace, ear-rings and bracelets, are all gold; in her hand she carries a scroll; when it is unrolled, will it tell the tale of the dead man's deeds?

It is probable, for on the partition wall are the dread forms of Eita and Phersipnai, who are easily identified with Hades and Persephone, the rulers of the under world. Yet these are no king and queen of terrors. They are seated in state at a great banquet. The royal thrones adjoin, and the sovereign and his consort have their feet on the same footstool. The queen wears a golden robe and splendid ornaments; she lays her right hand affectionately on the left thigh of her spouse; he places his left hand on her right shoulder; they look into each other's faces and converse with gracious gladness. There is no hell here. No grim figures of Charun with his mallet obtrude thoughts of cruelty. The life of the blessed is figured as a feast even in the kingdom of God; and that underworld was not wholly dark or terrible which lay beneath the sway of sovereigns so genial and serene.

But there are other aspects of this world of death. The Etruscans had spread their power far and wide through Italy. You may trace them in the north beyond Fiesole and Bologna to Parma and Modena, to Padua and Mantua; and Vergil's city was supposed to owe its name to Mantus, god of the nether world. Southwards they left their remains in Nola and Capua, in Pompeii and Sorrento. Tradition tells of their confederation of twelve cities, but there is no definite information what they were. In different lists as many as seventeen are named; some may have risen to power while others declined; but the Rasena, as they called themselves, left their traces deep on Italian civilisation. Their language can be read, for Latin letters have given the clue to their character though not to their meaning, as it cannot be understood. The people have been derived in turn from India, Egypt, Canaan, or Mesopotamia; they have been supposed to be Semites or Irish Celts, Slavs or Libyans, Tartars, Hittites, or Italiots. The books of their religion, which were numerous, have disappeared. But Livy described them as "devoted to religion before all other nations"; and the rhetorician Arnobius, pleading the cause of Christianity at the beginning of the fourth century, called Etruria "the mother of superstition." They organised extensive commerce, founded distant colonies, and controlled the Western sea. An engraved shell, found in a tomb at Vulci, belongs to a species known only in the remote Indian Ocean, and chiefly in the waters of Japan. They built huge cities, reclaimed marshes, diverted the course of rivers, drained lakes by tunnels hewn in the rock. They were educated and accomplished; they wrote histories, composed poems, acted tragedies; and for hundreds of years the noble youths of Rome were trained in their discipline before they began to frequent the schools of Greece. But their thoughts are still obscure, and their ideas are only known through the representations of writers often unsympathetic or hostile, so that the problems of their religion—how much was original, and how much borrowed from the Greeks or other sources—defy solution.

But the museums, from Florence to Rome, are full of the remains of their civilisation, gathered from the tombs. The higher gods, the veiled or shrouded, the dii involuti or superiores, as the Romans called them, are not here represented. No one could tell their names, their number, or their shape. They remained hidden in the deeps of heaven; their power was the more terrible because it was undefined. The mysterious creator had wrought the world to last 12,000 years—each millennium corresponding with one of the signs of the Zodiac—and popular belief in Tuscany assigned to the Etruscan nation ten centuries of existence. Beneath these ultimate powers were six gods and six goddesses of the second rank, charged with maintaining the order of the world. And in the third rank came a vast multitude of spirits or demons mingling perpetually in human affairs. They presided over every incident from birth to death; they concerned themselves with plants and animals and men; they dwelt in the spheres of air, earth, water, and the realm of the dead.

Among these spirits two types are prominent on the vases, and sometimes on the cinerary sarcophagi. There are the Charuns, armed with mallets, who sometimes grip the husband or son when the death-hour has arrived; or, holding an expiring torch, warn the living that the flame of their vitality is burning low. On a vase in the Faina collection at Orvieto, an old man stands between two Charuns, in a region guarded by three-headed Cerberus with serpent's tail. The King and Queen of Hades are seated in a car, drawn by strange dragons; behind them a winged woman holds a scroll with the word Vanth, supposed to mean death, or, on another, bears a closed book, the record of a finished life. But the deceased was not left without protection. In the funeral car (according to vases in the same collection) a stout knotted staff is laid upon the body; when he enters Hades he leans on it for support, and it may serve him for defence against tormentors. Moreover, the Lasa, pale and gentle, with large wings and tender expression, like a guardian angel, will befriend him; or if Charun hurries away the husband, some benignant power throws her arm round the neck of the widow, and seeks to assuage her grief, and play the part of comforter.

Such were the symbols of antiquity. How much Rome owed to Etruria we do not know. But Servius Tullius was said to have been an Etruscan named Mastarna. Before the foundation of the Capitoline temple on the Quirinal, a small sanctuary stood there dedicated to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, the holy Three to whom the Etruscan discipline required a temple to be dedicated when a new city was built. Like the gladiatorial games, the arts of divination, and the practice of augury, many of the Etruscan usages were no doubt adopted by Rome. It is not the only case in which the conquered has been the teacher of the conqueror: Now, anyone who will enter a museum, as at Chiusi or Perugia, may realise what was the life of this ancient people. Their pleasures, their arts, their commerce, their home affections, their religious imaginations, are all laid bare. They were the early teachers of Rome; and some of their lessons Rome doubtless transmitted to Western Europe. Who can tell what elements derived from this unknown people may not still be potent among us at this hour? Each step in a museum reveals the continuity of the present with the past.

E. C.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

WE have been glad to receive a copy of the third number of the Willaston School Chronicle, which contains, among many other things of interest concerning the school, a report of Speech Day, on July 1. From this we take the following report of the Head Master's speech:—

"The Head Master, after personally welcoming the parents and friends of the boys, said that a good deal had been done at the School since last Speech Day. He now thought of the School, at the end of the third year, as an organisation full of vital and energetic growth and heat. This was to be found in its institutions. A Debating Society had sprung into being, the School newspaper had been safely started, and an orchestra had been formed. For the first time the School was able to send a solid body of twelve boys for the examination of the Oxford and Cambridge Lower Certificate. There was a certain amount of difficulty to be encountered in submitting the boys to the test of an outside examination. In the first place the average age of the candidates was below the normal age. Secondly, the universities of Oxford and Cambridge had not gone so far in educational reform as Willaston School had. The examination did not suit us. He went on to mention two or three points in which the universities were meeting the wishes of reformers — one of which was, that in this examination there was a recognition of the oral and conversational method of teaching modern languages, to which we are exclusively attached. Another was, that euclid in the form in which it had hitherto obtained in the Oxford and Cambridge syllabus had disappeared. Nevertheless he had not the slightest hesitation in prophesying that there would be a very considerable success to announce to the parents of the boys. We were well represented in cricket and other athletic sports, having lost one match out of five, and that by one run. He hoped for the time when we should be successfully competing with older foundations for prizes and scholarships either at the old universities or the new. But that was not all, for he trusted that the School in the first place was the training ground and nursery of character.

"In conclusion he said, 'Prize honest manly hearts informed throughout with zeal, earnestness and truth.'"

Blessing she is; God made her so,
And deeds of week-day holiness
Fall from her noiseless as the snow,
Nor hath she ever chance to know
That aught were easier than to bless.

J. R. Lowell.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., acknowledges with many thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums: Mr. William Colfox, £10; Miss Cooper, 10s.; Mrs. Talbot, 10s.

FELLOWSHIP IN RELIGION.

MEMORIAL stones of a new Wesleyan Church at Darley Dale, to be built on ground adjoining the Whitworth Institute, on the road between Matlock Bridge and Bakewell, were laid last week, the first stone being laid by Mr. R. D. Darbishire, who had given the land and a donation of £500 towards the building.

Mr. DARBISHIRE, having laid the stone, "To the glory of God," spoke as follows :—

"Neighbours and friends, I think I may fairly so address you after several years of such association as it has been my privilege to enjoy in Darley Dale amongst you. I am greatly indebted to you for so kindly an expression of confidence as to have invited me to take part in your special celebration of to-day. I know, of course, that it is particularly our Wesleyan friends who are undertaking the erection of this chapel; but this erection of another place of worship concerns all our community and neighbourhood. It is another mansion, so to speak, in the House of our Father. We know that we each of us have our own views and form of expression of the truth to, in, and for which we live and die, and that our separate opinions do not interfere with our mutual respect, or our neighbourly regard. These truly pass the lines of dogmatic belief, and confirm us all side by side in brotherhood with Jesus, and with each other, and as all alike, sons of his God and our own, every one of us waiting for and welcoming with profound joy the kingdom of God within each heart. And it is for this new House of Prayer and Praise, for this common and united testimony to what we all hold to be the crown of our existence in this world, and our hope for the world to come, that we are gathered together here in the name of religion, that is to say, of the love of man and the love of God. In this spirit it is truly to our common honour to join in laying the first stone of this new House of God which we are thus promising to erect and maintain for His glory. And this day, and every day, we will say with King Solomon, 'Lord God of Israel, there is no God like Thee in heaven above or in the earth beneath, Who keepest covenant and mercy with Thy servants that walk before Thee with all their heart.' And in this spirit we will thus and now join to consecrate this chapel with the prayer that Jesus offered for our use."

All having joined in saying the Lord's prayer, Mr. Darbishire concluded his address with these words :—"I trust that you young people who have your lives before you, as I have mine behind me, will know what it means to found a church, and to frequent it. It is the strength of life and of hope for every boy and girl as it is for every man and woman. I am extremely glad to have been favoured with your presence to-day, and trust that some of my words will not fall unheard."

The second stone was then laid by the Rev. J. C. W. GOSTICK, who said :—

"I declare this stone well and truly laid to the glory of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

Warm gratitude was expressed to Mr. Darbishire for his generous help.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting took place at Ringwood, Thursday, July 16. There was a good attendance, including friends from Bournemouth, Bridport, Chichester, Poole, Parkstone, Wareham, Southampton, Portsmouth, and Newport. A committee meeting was held in the forenoon, and was followed by luncheon, to which over sixty sat down. The business meeting was then held, Mr. J. Cogan Conway, president, in the chair. Mr. F. Pinnock (secretary) and Miss Spencer (treasurer), presented the report and balance sheet.

The Report.

The Report recorded several special items, including a visit—by the aid of the B. & F. U. A.—of the Rev. J. C. Street, who preached and lectured at most of the churches on the roll, and a "mission" conducted at Poole by the Rev. Edgar Daplyn. Each effort was attended with much evident success. Mr. James Burton, M.A., of Liverpool, has been appointed minister of the Poole congregation, in succession to the late Rev. E. S. Anthony, to whose memory a lectern has been erected in the church amid tokens of widespread respect. The Rev E. C. Bennett has resigned his charge at Southampton, and no appointment there is at present in view. On the suggestion of the Rev. C. E. Pike, a very sucessful gathering of teachers and elder scholars from the different congregations in the district has been held at Southampton. The detailed accounts of the several churches showed, on the whole, satisfactory progress. The finances showed a balance in hand of about £60.

The PRESIDENT having given a short statement respecting the schemes proposed at the recent Triennial Conference, the various reports were adopted on his motion, seconded by Mr. H. BLESSLEY.

The officers and advisory committee having been re-elected, a discussion took place on the subject of public meetings connected with the quarterly committee meetings. It was decided to make inquiries at Eastleigh, with a view to renewed propagandist efforts there. Miss Spencer and the Rev. C. C. Coe were requested to represent the Association at the forthcoming International Council meetings at Amsterdam.

A resolution of regard and sympathy in connection with the death of the Rev. T. B. Broadrick was passed by a silent standing vote.

SERVICE AND PUBLIC MEETINGS.

After tea a service was held, being conducted by the Rev. C. C. COE. The sermon was given by the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, whose theme was, "The Greatness of God" (Psalm cxlv. 6). In the course of his address, he emphasised the thought that while the divine life about us becomes continually more wonderful to every intelligent mind, its greatness forbids alike unworthy theology and unworthy conduct. The soul must grow into the image of its God. A collection for the funds of the Association was made.

After the service, in which assistance was rendered by friends from orthodox congregations, a public meeting took place, Mr. J. COGAN CONWAY presiding.

The Rev H. S. SOLLY gave a very interesting address on "Emerson and Martineau," his remarks being chiefly on the former. After sketching Emerson's career, he called special attention to his emphasis on "Self-reliance." Doubtless, that note stirred them all to worthier efforts, but when they consulted those who seemed most self-reliant, such as Cromwell and his "Ironsides," they would find that what they relied upon was the divine spirit at work within them. It was upon that spirit that Emerson bade his hearers rely, in his famous "Divinity School Address." When we read Emerson now, much that he says seems ordinary; but to say it in his day required extraordinary courage. In regard to the philosophy of good and evil, Mr. Solly believed that Martineau went deeper into the truth than Emerson, and he commended the study of Martineau's principles along with that of Emerson's works.

The Rev. W. G. CADMAN spoke on the subject of the missionary spirit, which, he observed, appeared to be chiefly shown by men who accepted without demur the Unitarian name—such men as the late Dr. J. R. Beard, W. Gaskell, John Wright, and others. When he noted the tendency in some directions to drop the name in favour of some other, he was reminded of a certain poet by the name of "Briggs," told of by Charles Kingsley. His verses did not meet with much success, and thinking his name had much to do with it, he adopted the high-sounding name of "Vavasour." The sequel showed, however, that the public still failed to appreciate his muse. If, instead of troubling overmuch about names, they all cultivated a truer enthusiasm, and a more heart-felt religion, the results of a wider influence for good must come.

Mr. J. EWART (late of M.C.O.) and the Rev. W. G. TARRANT also spoke, and after a vote of thanks to the President, the meeting closed with a Benediction.

CHURCH OPENING AT MERTHYR.

THE last services in the old Twynyrodyn Chapel at Merthyr Tydvil were held on Sunday, conducted morning and evening by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, and in the afternoon by the Rev. D. J. Williams, minister of the congregation; and on the following day the new chapel in Thomas-street was opened, the service being again conducted by Mr. Bowie.

The new chapel, on the appearance of which the congregation and the architect, Mr. S. E. Johnson, are to be congratulated, is built to accommodate 150 persons, and has a schoolroom underneath, together with various offices. There are three large windows on each side, and a very handsome one over the front entrance, the latter being formed of an embattled porch. The building is of red pressed brick, with Bath stone dressings, and a red-tiled roof.

The opening ceremony was preceded by a luncheon in the Angel Assembly-rooms, at which Mr. Gwilym James, J.P., chairman of the Merthyr District Council, presided.

The Rev. R. J. JONES, M.A., Aberdare, proposed "The Founders and Past Members of the Unitarian Chapel at Merthyr," and instanced many well-known names in the history of the place, which dated, he said, from about 1820. Colonel T. PHILLIPS, Aberdare, and Mr. C. R. JAMES responded, both giving interesting experiences of their early days in the chapel, and of the good educational work done there by the late Charles Herbert James and Thomas Stephens.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE submitted "Success to Liberal Religion in Merthyr," and Mr. GOMER THOMAS, treasurer of the Building Fund, responded. He said the building would cost about £2,500, of which £1,100 had already been subscribed, and they had the old chapel as an asset. As Unitarians had always been to the front in helping other denominations, he hoped some practical help would be extended to them.

Mr. JOHN LEWIS, Pontypridd, in proposing "Civil and Religious Liberty," said Unitarians had worked zealously in attaining all the great reforms and extensions of liberty of thought and action, and it was to be regretted that purely intellectual differences had kept other people from them in the past. Mr. W. L. DANIEL, chairman of the Merthyr School Board, responded, and testified to the true and faithful stand always made by Unitarians in the battles of civil and religious liberty. He hoped their new chapel would be the means of still further helping on that cause, and of all that tended to uplift the people.

The new chapel was opened by Mrs. Stephens, widow of the late Thomas Stephens, of literary fame, who did such eminent and ungrudging service at the old chapel throughout his life. Then followed the first public service within the building, conducted by the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie preaching the sermon of dedication.

In the evening a service was conducted by the Rev. J. P. Kane, and a public meeting was held under the presidency of Mr. C. R. James, when addresses were given by the Revs. R. J. Jones, M.A., W. Copeland Bowie, and Professor J. H. Weatherall, M.A., Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, Mr. G. Carslake Thompson, and others.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Bedfield and Monk Soham. — The Sunday-school anniversary was celebrated last Sunday by special services. In the afternoon the missionary (Mr. R. Newell) gave an address in the chapel before an audience of over the hundred, and in the evening held an open-air service in a meadow at Monk Soham. The subject in the afternoon was "the duty and method of training children in religion," and in the evening, "An open door." The occasion was used to explain to strangers present some of the principles of Unitarianism, and the advantage of belonging to a religious body where the door is always open to all, irrespective of creed or dogma, where liberty of thought is held and allowed, and conscience is regarded as supreme in matters of religion. On Monday evening, a tea-meeting was held, when Mr. Newell, who presided, spoke briefly of the future, which seemed full of promise. To the parents of the scholars he commended the Girls' Club, the Holiday Club, and a Boys' Provident Saving Club, which he wished to establish. He hoped also that the young men of the village would look upon him as a friend, anxious to meet and help them. The Rev. Lucking Tavener, of Ipswich, also delivered an inspiring and helpful address.

London Guilds' Union Rally. — On Saturday, July 11, at the invitation of the Highgate friends, members of the guilds at Highgate, Essex Church, Mansford-street, Stratford, and Kentish Town, to the number of about eighty, met at Hampstead Station for a walk over the Heath. The party proceeded by Golder's hill, Parliament-hill, Highgate Ponds, and Waterlow Park to the Highgate schoolroom, where a sumptuous repast, provided by members of the Highgate Guild, awaited them. After tea several friends entertained the company with songs and recitals. An informal meeting was held, presided over by Mr. Alfred Thompson, at which hearty thanks were accorded to the hosts for affording such a delightful opportunity for friendly intercourse. The secretary (Rev. John Ellis) referred in sympathetic terms to the bereavement in the home of one of the Guild secretaries. He also announced that at the united meeting to be held at Mansford-street in October the subject for conference would be "Church attendance."

Newton Abbot.—On Sunday evening the congregation celebrated the second anniversary of the opening of the present meeting-place in Gladstone-place, when the Rev. Chas. Roper, of Manchester, preached a most eloquent sermon from the words, "Come let us reason together," in exposition of Unitarian Christianity. Notwithstanding the most unpropitious weather, a good congregation assembled, the chapel being comfortably filled. The collection exceeded last year by about ten shillings.

Blackpool: South Shore.—The new hall of South Shore Unitarian Church was opened on Sunday, services being conducted by the Rev. J. Page Hopps. Not only was Blackpool, North and South, well represented, but many friends from inland towns attended, and by their cordial co-operation added much to the success of an eventful day. Large congregations assembled both morning and evening—in the evening to overflowing—and the services and sermons were all that could be desired. In the afternoon a scholars' service was held in place of the ordinary Sunday-school, and was conducted by Mr. S. Crompton, Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy giving the address. The day passed off satisfactorily in every way, not the least pleasant remembrance of it being the earnestness and heartiness with which all joined to render the services an inspiration and an encouragement. The friends who attended the services on Sunday expressed themselves as much pleased with the simple beauty and the admirable arrangement of the new building. It is the design of Mr. J. B. Thornley, architect, and Mr. J. Calvert, of South Shore, was the general contractor. The congregation and school are now in possession of their new hall and are looking forward to a time of increased usefulness to themselves and to their neighbours. The happy event will in a quiet way be celebrated to-day at an outdoor gathering and tea, to which school and congregation have been invited by Mr. and Mrs. J. R. G. Grundy.

Sunderland. — The Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held on Sunday last. Rev. F. Wood, minister, preached morning and evening, and Mr. J. G. Sterling, superintendent, conducted a children's service in the afternoon, when Mr. A. W. Harris, of London, gave a short address. The children sang selected hymns, and Master James Want, from the Blackfriars Mission, gave a special solo on each occasion. Altogether the services were very enjoyable.

Swansea.—The Sunday-school anniversary was celebrated last Sunday afternoon, when special hymns were sung and recitations given by the children. Miss M. E. Brock gave an address on kindness to animals, and Professor Weatherall, of Carmarthen, on the exhortation "Be strong." Mr. C. H. Perkins presided. The Rev. W. Tudor Jones, who, since Easter, has been away studying at Jena, is to be welcomed home on the first Sunday in August.

Whitchurch: Salop.—On Sunday evening, July 12, the service of the Church of the Saviour was conducted by Mr. R. Mansell, of Shrewsbury, who made special reference to the great loss the Rev. C. D. Badland had sustained by the tragic death of his wife. At the close of the service a resolution of deep sympathy and condolence was passed by the congregation with Mr. Badland in his terrible bereavement. On Tuesday evening, July 21, a memorial service for Mrs. Badland was conducted by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, who delivered a most touching and impressive address, basing his remarks on the story of the death of "Dorcas" (Acts ix.), and spoke of Mrs. Badland's sterling character and Christian virtues, devoted to helpful and unselfish service. The Dead March was played at the close. There was a large congregation, every church and chapel in the town being well represented, also the Temperance League, with which Mrs. Badland was associated.

Redcar.—The golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bell was happily celebrated on Friday week. Mr. Bell as a life-long total abstainer and ardent temperance worker and social reformer, has been closely associated with Middlesbrough, and is well known in the circle of our churches. One of his daughters is wife of the Rev. J. E. Stead, of Park-lane, Wigan.

Cradley.—The Sunday-school anniversary and the flower services were held on Sunday, the 19th inst., at Park-lane Chapel, Netherend, and were very successful. Large quantities of flowers were used in decorations, and the scholars each made a floral offering at the morning and evening services. Accompanied by their teachers, the boys and girls sang a processional hymn on both occasions, handing a bunch of flowers to the minister, who received them within the communion rails. The minister, the Rev. A. H. Shelley, preached special sermons, and the choir sang appropriate anthems. Large and representative congregations attended, and the collections were unusually good.

Bolton District Sunday School Union.—The quarterly meeting, held on Saturday July 11, took the form of a ramble in Borsden Wood, conducted by Rev. Thos. Robinson, of Altrincham, and was attended by a large number of teachers and others, about 140 afterwards sitting down to tea in the Hindley School. After tea the Rev. C. J. Street, president of the Union, took the chair, congratulating the Union on the excellent attendance, and emphasising the value of such meetings. The Rev. T. Robinson then delivered a most interesting and instructive address, illustrating the wonderful refinement of nature, as evidenced more particularly in the provisions made for plants obtaining nourishment and propagating their species. The probable evolution of the flowering and grain-bearing plants from the grasses was touched on, and the adaptation by plants, by means of coloured petals, of "advertisements" to attract insects to assist in fertilisation, also referred to, the speaker explaining how the marks and streaks on the petals of flowers acted as pointers to direct bees, &c., to the honey-bags. Mr. Robinson exhibited slides and objects of interest under the microscope. At the close of the lecture the Rev. J. Moore, who took the chair after Mr. Street had left, spoke in appreciative terms of the address, and a cordial vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Robinson, on the motion of Rev. W. Harris, seconded by Mr. Isaac Barrow, and supported by Mr. W. Whalley.

Clydach Vale (Farewell Meeting).—On Saturday evening, July 11, a meeting was held to bid an official farewell to the Rev. David Rees, who is taking up ministerial work at Wick and Bridgend. After tea, Mr. and Mrs. Rees were both presented, the former with a few volumes of Dr. Martineau's works, and the latter with a silver tea-pot, as a token of heart-felt appreciation of their services. A number of speeches were made, with warm expressions of regard and gratitude, and at the close of the meeting Mr. Rees responded, stating that, though his term of office amongst them had been short, he had formed friendships of a lasting character, and had been the means to a certain extent of mitigating the violent opposition to Unitarian work in the Rhondda.

London (Stoke Newington Green).—The members of this church and its Conversation Society have embraced the opportunity afforded by the "silver" wedding of the Rev. W. Wooding and Mrs. Wooding to offer them some expression of the respect and affection with which they are both regarded. By invitation of Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Turner, a large number of friends assembled at their residence on Friday, July 17, when an address of congratulation and good wishes was presented to Mr. and Mrs. Wooding. A sum of money which had been subscribed by about one hundred members was at the same time handed to Mrs. Wooding, wherewith to purchase a pianoforte as a momento of this interesting occasion.

London (Stratford, E.).—The Sunday-school annual excursion into Epping Forest on July 18 was greatly enjoyed, and the very sincere thanks of the whole congregation, and of the teachers, are due to the kind and generous friends who so liberally contributed to the expenses.

Maidstone. — The Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted on July 12, by the Rev. S. S. Brettell, M.A. On Wednesday, July 15, the scholars, accompanied by their teachers and friends, were taken for their summer treat to Sandgate, a quiet seaside town on the Kentish coast, where a delightful day was spent.

Mottram. — Sunday, July 12, was the annual "scholars' walk" in connection with the Sunday-school; a procession of 250 scholars, teachers, and congregation walked through the village, hymns were sung in the Market-square, and an address on "What we stand for" was given by the Rev. H. Bodell Smith. There were special services in the chapel, afternoon and evening, with extra hymns and music by the choir and scholars, the minister being the preacher. At evening service there was the annual distribution of prizes to the scholars, presented through the senior superintendent, Mr. J. H. Elkin, assisted by the secretaries, Messrs. James Sidebottom and Irvin Swindells. About 80 scholars out of 120 received prizes (books), 38 scholars having made 100 out of 104 possible attendances, and 13 having been at school 104 times. There were large congregations, the evening service being crowded. On Monday, July 13, the members' quarterly meeting was held, commencing with the Communion Meal (a plain tea), and reformed Communion service, during which bread was broken in remembrance of "the Master" and the Covenant of Membership was renewed by all present hand in hand. This was followed by the business meeting, when the excellent report by the secretary, Mr. I. Swindells, showed a gratifying increase in finances, and in other ways. It was resolved to hold an annual sale of work in aid of the funds, and to promise £25 towards the East Cheshire Christian Union bazaar to be held next year.

Sweet as a Rose, where "Sanitas" goes.

"SANITAS."
BEST OF ALL
DISINFECTANTS,
AND THE ONLY ONE FIT FOR DOMESTIC USE.

"SANITAS."
FRAGRANT, NON-POISONOUS,
CLEAN AND NATURAL.

"SANITAS."
1/- Pint Bottles and 1/- Tins, Powder.
3d. Bars Soap.
Of all Chemists and Stores.

"HOW TO DISINFECT" BOOK FREE.
"Sanitas" Co., Ltd., Bethnal Green, London, E.

Contractors to H.M. Government.

NEW RICHES FROM OLD MINES.

Who would value raw grains if all the arts of milling and preparing them were lost?

Similarly, nuts (which are foods of enormous value) have been unappreciated because the art of preparing them has been neglected.

HUGH MAPLETON, Colonial House, Ardwick, Manchester, is now making from nuts, rich, nourishing, digestible foods. Write to-day for descriptive price lists.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, July 2.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton. Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M., Mr. E. BRIDGER ATHAWES, "Ethics, Religion and Theology."
Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.
Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 7 A.M., Rev. J. LONSDALE DOWSON.
Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M and 7 P.M., Rev. J. H. CROOKER, D.D.
Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Deptford, Church-street, 11.15, A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. J. MARCHANT.
Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M., Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON.
Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.
Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. Gow, B.A.
Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M., Rev. R. H. GREAVES, and 7 P.M., Mrs. J. H. CROOKER.
Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., "The Permanence of Unseen Things," Rev. ALFRED THOMPSON.
Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.
Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.
Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M., Rev. H. S. PERRIS, M.A., 7 P.M. in Regent's-park.
Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. G. WARD.
Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.
Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. S. FARRINGTON.
Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. C. A. GINEVER.
Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.
Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Mr. D. DELTA EVANS.
Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, East-hill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Dr. MUMMERY.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M; Rev. J. M'DOWELL.
BEDFORD, Library (side room), 11.15 A.M., Rev. ROWLAND HILL.
BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.
BLACKPOOL, Unitarian Church, Masonic Hall, South Shore, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS.
BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. C. C. COE.
BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. M. LIVENS.
BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET.
CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., Mr. J. W. BROWN.
DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.
GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. GARDNER PRESTON.
LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. HARGROVE, M.A.
LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. ERNEST PARRY.
LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. J. JUPP.
LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. R. C. MOORE, of Horwich.
LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, M.A.
NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. E. PIKE.
OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. J. E. ODGERS, M.A.
PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.
PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 P.M., Mr. THOMAS BOND.
SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. OTTWELL BINNS.
SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.
SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.
SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.
STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church, Tyler-street, 7 P.M.
TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
WINDERMERE, Albert Hall, Cross-street, 11 A.M., Rev. J. CROWTHER HIRST.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.
WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M., Mr. J. W. DAVIES.

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH.
SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F. Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS.

SOUTH-PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY
SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.—July 26, at 11.15 A.M., JOHN A. HOBSON, M.A., "The Ethics of International Trade."

PULPIT SUPPLY.—Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY, 28, Downshire-hill, Hampstead, N.W.

PULPIT SUPPLY.—Wanted for a Unitarian pulpit near Belfast on three or four Sundays, from Aug. 9th to Sept. 13th. State terms to X., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, W.C.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses. —For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

MICROSCOPES, second-hand, excellent condition, from one-third original cost. Slides, great variety, best makers, from 3s. per doz. Write for particulars, THE NEW AGE PRESS, 8, John-street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

BIRTH.

PERRIS.—On July 18th, at 61, St. Augustine's-road, London, N.W., the wife of the Rev. H. S. Perris, of a daughter.

MARRIAGE.

SILVER WEDDING.

WOODING—ASQUITH.—On July 22nd, 1878, at the Wesleyan Chapel, Hampstead, by the Rev. Mark Wilks, William Wooding to Emily Evelyn, only daughter of the late Joseph Dixon Asquith, Esq., Morley, Yorkshire.

DEATHS.

CHITTY.—On July 17th, in his 20th year (through accident in the Island of Sark). Claude Grisbrook, youngest son of Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Chitty, of Dover.

COX.—On July 21st, at Thirkleby, Oxton, Birkenhead, aged 67 years, Annie, widow of the late Henry Cox, of Liverpool, and third daughter of the late George Thirkell, of Liverpool.

Board and Residence.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged.—Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

BOURNEMOUTH. — ARNEWOOD. En Pension. Grand position in West Cliff-road; sea views; South aspect; close to Winter Gardens, Promenade, and Pier.—Apply, MANAGERESS.

BOURNEMOUTH.— Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH, DEVONSHIRE.

A HOLIDAY RESORT FOR YOUNG LADIES OR SCHOOL-GIRLS, WITH OR WITHOUT CHAPERON.

Charming little Devonshire town. Perfect Sanitation. Sea and Moorland. Bracing air. Walks, excursions, picnics, splendid bathing. Main line G.W.R.

Terms and other particulars from THE PROPRIETOR.

FELIXSTOWE.—Comfortable HOME for Permanent BOARDERS, Adults or Scholars; also APARTMENTS on reasonable terms.—Apply, Mrs. ROBINSON, Kimberley, Ranelagh-road, Felixstowe.

Situations, etc.

WANTED. — Capable Lady Help, servant kept, no small children.—Full particulars to C., West Dene, Pendennis-road, Streatham, S.W.

LADY, who speaks French, seeks re-engagement as Governess or Nursery Governess. 7 years' experience. Good references. For further particulars apply to M D., 12, Richmond-terrace, Cardiff.

HOUSEMAID, where parlour-maid or man-servant is kept. Good personal references in Hampstead. Age 39. Temporary or could take charge of house. B. C., 4 Golden square, Heath-street, Hampstead, N.W.

MAN AND WIFE required as CARETAKERS for a Chapel in the South of London. Salary, £40.—Apply by letter to Mr. E. MOORE, 18, St. Olave's-road, East Ham, E.

WANTED for Boys' School a Lady Matron to manage and control domestic arrangements. Private rooms and board. Commencing salary, £50. Apply, G. LEWIS, Willaston School, Nantwich.

TRAINING FOR LADIES AS CHILDREN'S NURSES.

The next course begins early in September.

For particulars, apply to LADIES' SANITARY ASSOCIATION, 8, Sandow-terrace, Liverpool.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOHNSON, Pier-street.

In Cloth, Price 1s.; Stout Paper, 6d.

THE HUNGARIAN UNITARIANS.

Some Account of their Origin, Vicissitudes, and Present Condition.

Compiled from various sources by M. LUCY TAGART.

"Miss Tagart has done well to collect a number of most interesting papers and sketches bearing upon the history and the existing state of our Unitarian brethren in Hungary and Transylvania. . . . The booklet excites and keeps attention from beginning to end."—Christian Life.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING OFFICE, 5, Furnival-street, Holborn, E.C.

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS

By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

DAILY MEDITATIONS

(Fourth Edition Revised.)

NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.

Cloth, red edges, 6d.; roan gilt, 1s.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C

THE FREEHOLD FARM.

The Garner'd Seed-Corn of all Intuitioned Thought.

INTUITIONISM THE RELEASE OF THE MIND.

46 pp., 8vo.

By F. LINFORD WILSON.

Published by H. SEERIGHT, and obtainable of W. REEVES, 83, Charing Cross-road, W.C.

Price One Shilling.

NOW READY, a limited edition of the Booklet commemorating the Bicentenary of Rivington Chapel; 56 pages, 6 Illustrations from photographs; 8vo., bound in cloth, price 1s., post free, 1s. 3d. From Rev. S. THOMPSON, Rivington, near Bolton, or ANDREWS CROMPTON.

FREDK. LONG & SON,

AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,

4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

BEDFORD COLLEGE FOR WOMEN

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON)

YORK PLACE, BAKER STREET, W.

PRINCIPAL—MISS ETHEL HURLBATT

The Session 1903-4 will open on Thursday, October 8. The College provides instruction for Students preparing for the University of London Degrees in Arts, Science, and Preliminary Medicine, also instruction in subjects of General Education. There is a Training Department for Teachers, a Hygiene Department, and an Art School. Students can reside in the College. An Extension of Premises will be made for next Session.

Full particulars on application to the Principal.

HIGHGATE UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

SPENNS MEMORIAL.

The New Buildings will be opened on Saturday, July 25, by W. A. Sharpe, Esq., President British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Tea at 5 30 p.m., followed by a Public Meeting at 6.30 p.m. Chairman, F. Withall, Esq., supported by Revs. J. H. Crooker and Mrs. Crooker, W. Copeland Bowie, R. H. Greaves, John Harrison, Esq., and others.

Collection in aid of the Building Fund.

Mrs. J. H. Crooker will preach at Highgate on Sunday evening, July 26, and on Sunday, August 2, the Rev. J. H. Crooker will preach both morning and evening.

Schools, etc.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN, NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON (Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

SINGLETON SCHOOL, DUBLIN FOR TRAINING GIRLS FOR DOMESTIC SERVICE.

Required in October, or earlier, a Lady of experience and special training in domestic science, to act as Principal of the Singleton School. Salary £60, with board, residence, &c., and assistance in the duties. Apply to Rev. G. H. VANCE, Hon. Sec. to the Damer Governors, Ashfield Park House, Harold's Cross-road, Dublin, &c.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress, Miss ESTHER CASE, Certificated Student of Girton College, Cambridge, Classical Tripos.

2nd Mistress, Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc.

In the arrangement of each pupil's work, the aim is to secure thoroughness in all that is undertaken without undue pressure and strain.

The house stands on high ground in a good open position. A few boarders received.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,

ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17 Mincing-lane, E.C.

Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.

Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.

F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.

Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.

STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2½% repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES

Purchased and sold for customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate. — Saturday, July 25, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3188. NEW SERIES, No. 292.] LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 1, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 505
ARTICLES—
In Praise of Holland—III. 508
A Visit to Hadleigh 509
The World-Mission of Unitarianism .. 513
The Homes of Wordsworth 515
The Unitarian Gospel 517
Protests against the Educational Rate .. 517
LITERATURE—
Response in the Living and the Non-Living 507
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 511
LEADERS—
Holiday Eyes 512
The "Cotton Corner" 512
CORRESPONDENCE—
Free Catholic Churches 511
Re Summer Excursion 516
Channing House School 517
The Fellowship of the Prophets 516
Social and Family Ethics 516
Leo XIII. 516
MEETINGS—
South Wales Unitarian Association .. 518
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 518
ADVERTISEMENTS 519

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE publish this week a review by Professor A. M. Worthington, C.B., F.R.S., head of the Royal Naval Engineering College at Devonport, of the striking work on "Response in the Living and Non-Living," published last year, by Professor J. C. Bose, D.Sc., of the Presidency College, Calcutta. Professor Bose, who is a member of the Brahmo community, it will be remembered was recently in this country, commissioned by the Indian Government, in the pursuit of his scientific investigations.

THE circular with reference to the proposed erection of an Expiatory monument to Servetus, of which we last week published a translation, appears in Le Protestant of July 25, with an editorial commendation, and a plea for a large number of small subscriptions, rather than a few large sums, to make up the 5,000 francs (£200) required. The Committee of the non-official General Synod, the Délegation Libérale, and the Consistory of the Reformed Church of Paris, each subscribes 100 francs; the theological faculty of Montauban, 50 francs; and the students of Montauban 20 francs; M. le pasteur Castel, 5 francs. We shall be very glad to receive individual subscriptions of, say, 2s. 6d. and 5s. from those who may be glad thus to show their sympathy with the movement.

THE Rev. Joseph Wood, minister of the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, and Mrs. Wood, left that city for Liverpool on Tuesday afternoon, the 28th inst., for a tour in America, to begin a well-earned holiday of six months, which was granted to Mr. Wood by his congregation in the cordial hope that both Mr. and Mrs. Wood, who have been very much indisposed for many months past, will be thoroughly restored to health. Many prominent members of the church went to see Mr. and Mrs. Wood off at the Birmingham Railway Station, to wish them God-speed and a pleasant journey and safe return. A host of friends elsewhere share, we are sure, the good wishes of Mr. Wood's congregation on his behalf.

NEXT week a series of week-day lectures will be given at Manchester College, Oxford, in connection with the University Extension Summer Meeting. Dr. Drummond will lecture on Monday and Tuesday mornings on Anselm's Cur Deus Homo, and on Wednesday, the Rev. W. H. Drummond on "Early Lives of St. Francis and the Study of the Gospels." The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter will lecture on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday on "Supposed Parallels between Buddhism and Christianity." In the following week, the Rev. E. I. Fripp will lecture, on Monday and Tuesday, on "Religious Ideas in (1) Everyman, and (2) Doctor Faustus," and the series will close on Wednesday, (August 12), with a lecture by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, on "Aristotle: On the Soul—its influence on Mediæval Thought." Even this goodly array does not exhaust the store provided for fortunate hearers; the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter will lecture also on Sunday evenings, August 2, 9, and 16, on "The Gospels, and How to Read Them."

MR. ION PRITCHARD sends the following important note re the meetings at Amsterdam:—"May I be allowed to say that if there are any of your readers who still desire to attend the meetings of the International Council at Amsterdam (Sept. 1-4) they should communicate with me at once, as I am now engaged in preparing the hotel lists. The main body of the party from England will leave London on Monday morning, Aug. 31, travelling by way of Queenborough and Flushing, and reaching Amsterdam shortly after 11 P.M. A few will travel by Harwich and the Hook of Holland, or viâ Hull, making their own arrangements with the railway and steamship companies. I would point out, however, that it is necessary for all who attend the meetings to be in possession of the membership ticket issued by the Netherlands Committee. These tickets may be obtained on sending 4s. 2d. to me at Essex Hall. I am glad to say there is now every prospect of a large and representative attendance from the British Isles."

"WHAT, then, had the Diet of Worms done for the Church in Germany? And whither had vanished Aleander's victory." With these questions, the answer to them, indeed, already implied, Dr. Charles Beard concluded all that was permitted him to write of the magnum opus of his busy life. The story of "Martin Luther and the Reformation in Germany," was told to English readers only so far as the close of the first great heroic period. But, incomplete as it stands, the work is a monument to the learning and industry and painstaking conscientiousness of the writer, ære perennius, of more worth than any sculptured stone or inadequate likeness by which we strive, so often in vain, to perpetuate the memory of our honoured dead. Their works, if worthy, follow them, where our poor praises are no longer heard. It is pleasing to know that this labour of his last years of declining health is appreciated beyond the boundaries of the little denomination which his talents adorned, and we believe it will be grateful to our readers to know the opinion lately expressed of it by one who was as far as possible removed from him in religious affinity. It was in a lately published work of Mr. W. S. Lilly, the well-known historian and critic, secretary to the "Catholic Union of Great Britain," that we lately came across the following appreciation:—"Among English writers on Luther, the first place must be given to Dr. Beard. It is an irreparable loss that he lived to execute no more than the first volume of what would certainly have been a monumental work." ("Renaissance Types," 1891, page 232.) A man who can win the reluctant commendation of those who are so utterly opposed to all his conclusions, ought not to be lightly honoured, nor his works left unread, by those to whom he ministered and who share his profoundest convictions.

THE Wesleyan Conference at Cambourne, judging by the reports in Methodist papers and the daily newspapers, has been marked by a spirit of cheerfulness, and the practical ability which on these occasions is seldom lacking. Of the new President, the Rev. Marshall Hartley, a Methodist writer remarks, "We have a business man in the chair, rather than a statesman." Those who have noted Wesleyan movements during the last few years will perceive the fitness of the choice.

THE matters which specially belong to the domestic interests of the Wesleyans themselves need not here be referred to. But as a sign of the times, the tentative measures being taken, or considered, for the improvement and unification of the theological colleges have some interest; more interest attaches to the Wesleyan attitude in regard to the Education question. The Wesleyans have decided to retain their schools in their own hands; by a large majority they rejected the resolution which declared that Wesleyan managers could not consistently accept relief from local rates; and consequently the word of sympathy thrown as a crumb to the Passive Resisters does not count for much. Yet the general trend of the discussion shows that, on the whole, the Wesleyan influence will work for fair-play and common sense in a difficult and much vexed question. The resolution endorsing the proposal of a treaty of arbitration between this country and France, carried unanimously, was a good example of the way in which a great religious body may very well exercise wholesome political influence without identifying itself with any special party. One of the least satisfactory items in the Conference news is the brief discussion on Methodist Union. While the minor Methodist bodies feel themselves more and more closely drawn together, the Wesleyans seem little inclined for anything beyond a certain harmless interchange of civilities with the younger members of their own kin.

THE Liverpool Daily Post (July 29), in a leading article on sermons to children, says:—

The children's preacher par excellence in this district is the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, whose pulpit talks to boys and girls have just been published by the Sunday School Association, under the title of "Come unto Me, O ye Children." Mr. Armstrong has published various books that reveal him as the profound thinker and the liberal and enlightened theologian. But nothing from his pen is comparable, in the bestowal of unalloyed delight, to this little book, which reveals him as the lover and kindly instructor of young people. In his "talks" he guides them towards paths of thought for the traversing of which it is well they should be prepared; and often in such a manner that they are at the very heart of some literary or historical masterpiece, and are learning its soul-lesson before they realise that they are not reading or listening to some mere interesting fairy tale.

AFTER speaking of several of Mr. Armstrong's sermons in detail, the writer of the article draws special attention to the closing sermons, in which the children are told "how it comes about that we in Hope-street Church worship God in a different way from our neighbours who go to the Church of the Blind across the road." With that story our readers are familiar. The article concludes:—

It speaks well for Mr. Armstrong that he can talk to children of religious freedom without any suspicion of rancour, or of that intolerance into which those who are specially keen on their own religious freedom are invariably led. No child will read these "talks," or hear them read, without being gently transported into high realms of spiritual and intellectual contemplation; and the effect will be the same—if not more so—on the mind of any grown-up reader who loves children and has Mr. Armstrong's power of entering into their thoughts and aspirations.

THE funeral of the Rev. Ernest Fontanès took place at Paris on July 10, and in accordance with his own express desire, with a true Huguenot simplicity. There was no word personal to himself, only the heartfelt prayers of Professor Jean Réville and M. le pasteur Arnaud, President of the Havre Consistory; and the reading of passages of Scripture—which he had himself chosen—at the house, 1 Cor. xiii. and at the cemetery, the Beatitudes. The tribute which might not be uttered at the funeral, M. Jean Réville has now offered in a memorial article published in Le Protestant of July 25.

ERNEST FONTANES, says M. Réville, received from his birth (Jan. 31, 1828) the baptism of Liberalism. The influence of his father, the Rev. Ferdinand Fontanès, of Nîmes, and of that other Liberal Christian leader, Samuel Vincent, was most potent over the young man, to whom his father gave this motto, for the guidance of his life: "Go just so far as Truth shall lead you." Absolute sincerity, both of thought and expression, marked his career. He knew nothing of compromise in matters either theological or ecclesiastical; yet he was no bigot, but could enter into the position of those who differed from him. What he could not understand was that others should be less frank than he was himself.

FROM school at Nîmes Fontanès passed to the Universities of Geneva and Strasbourg, and completed his theological training in Germany, where he attended lectures at Bonn, Heidelberg, and Berlin. Belonging to the vigorous race of 1848, he is to be remembered, says M. Réville, with such teachers as Athanase and Etienne Coquerel, Viguié, Cougnard and Colani, and, we may add, Albert Réville. In that group, so rich in talent and various aptitudes, his gift was not that of the original thinker, the critic or historian, but distinctly of the orator. Fontanès, says M. Réville, was par excellence the inspired orator and poet. He had an exquisite voice, musical, with a great range of modulation, a perfect elocution and command of the purest French; his manner was simple, and yet noble, not seeking for effect, rendered the more striking by the expressive beauty of his countenance. No one had a greater command of the powers of persuasion and of lofty poetry than Fontanès, in his hours of inspiration, wherewith to raise the souls of his hearers to God. He had in a supreme degree the gift of charm, and he could soar to the heights of religious feeling, and carry his hearers with him into the ecstasy of communion with the Eternal.

HIS whole life was devoted to the service of the Reformed Church of France. After serving as assistant minister at Montpelier from 1852 to 1856, he entered on his long ministry at Havre, where he exercised a profound religious influence, and even after his removal to Paris in 1887, he remained President of the Consistory of Havre. In Paris the bigotry of the orthodox section of the Church prevented his appointment to a parish, and he had no recognised official standing, but preached with great acceptance in the hall of the Geographical Society in the boulevard Saint-Germain. Only last year he retired, amid many expressions of gratitude and warm regard, M. Fontanès published only occasional sermons and lectures, all instinct with his clear thinking, fearless utterance, and moral fervour, and the earnestness of his Christian discipleship, the last being his farewell sermon, preached last year in Paris and at Havre, on "Fifty Years of Ministry."

ATTENTION is drawn by Miss E. J. Busk (1, Gordon-square, W.C.) to the "Great National Jubilee Bazaar" of the United Kingdom Alliance, as a contributory to the fund of a hundred thousand guineas which is sought for the furtherance of the Alliance's work. Miss Busk says:—

As a Unitarian and a member of the London Committee, I venture to address you. The Temperance subject is very urgent just now, because the next General Election must decide whether the country is to be governed by the "publicans or by the public," as was said at the great convention held in the Albert Hall, London, last Friday, under Sir Wilfrid Lawson. The brewers have lately converted their businesses into companies, and thereby, no doubt, secured many votes among their shareholders, so we must all work zealously to counterbalance their votes, and we, by our bazaar, wish to be enabled to distribute largely, literature and speakers to assist.

Contributions may be sent to Miss Busk as above.

THE August number of the Coming Day announces the marriage, at Little Portland Street Chapel, on July 13, of John Page Hopps and Alice Elizabeth Hallawell, late secretary of the Croydon Eclectic Society.

SHORT NOTICE.

The First Christian Generation: Its Records and Traditions. By JAMES THOMAS.—Such value as Mr. Thomas's book possesses lies in the connections he brings out between the Christian origins and the Roman world. In other respects we do not find the volume satisfactory. He discusses the Christian traditions from the standpoint of a rigid and unimaginative rationalism, and finds them so faulty that we wonder as we read why he takes the trouble to expose them. Our confidence in the finality of his conclusions is, however, shaken by the fact that he is not acquainted with the best modern work upon his subject. We give a single example; he devotes nearly 200 pages to an analysis of the book of Acts without revealing any acquaintance with the researches of either Blass or Ramsay. (Swan Sonnenschein, 1903. 6s.)

The common problem, yours, mine, every one's,
Is not to fancy what were fair in life,
Provided it could be, but finding first
What may be, then find how to make it fair
Up to our means.

Robert Browning.

LITERATURE.

RESPONSE IN THE LIVING AND NON-LIVING.*

THE object of this work may be apparently regarded as twofold; first, to give an account of experiments made by the author, which show that the disturbance of electric condition, long known to take place in pieces of animal tissue removed from a recently living body, in response to certain mechanical stimulation, is paralleled with quite remarkable exactness by similar responses, not only in the fresh stems, roots, and leaf-stalks of plants, but also in inorganic substances, such as metallic wires, when similarly stimulated; and, secondly, to draw from these results the conclusion that there is in physiological inquiries "no necessity for the assumption of vital force"; that these phenomena "are on the contrary physico-chemical phenomena susceptible of a physical inquiry as definite as any other in inorganic regions."

In what follows we shall endeavour to keep separate these two aspects of the book.

Of the experiments themselves, regarded from the point of view of the physicist, we can say that they appear to have been executed with all the skill, acumen, and experimental resource which we have been accustomed to find in Professor Bose's work in other fields. For the purpose of the general reader we may describe a typical experiment. Let him imagine a freshly cut stalk of celery, or, say, a fresh radish, lying horizontally and tightly gripped in the middle by a small vice, and to each end let there be fixed a suitable thimble-like insulating handle by means of which either end of the stem can be twisted at will, backwards and forwards, about the axis of the stem as axis of rotation. If now a galvanometer with a very high resistance in its circuit be suitably connected to two points A and B, equidistant from, and on opposite sides of the middle vice, it is found that in general no current flows through the galvanometer. The two points A and B are in fact iso-electric. But if, say, the A half is "stimulated" by twisting the handle on that side, then a current, called the response-current, is observed to flow, in such a direction as to indicate that an electro-motive force has been generated, which acts through the stem from the more to the less stimulated part (a direction defined by Bose as negative). The extent of the deflection of the beam of light reflected by the galvanometer mirror affords a measure of the current and presumably of the electro-motive force which generates it, and can be made to record itself on a sensitised paper carried by a revolving drum. In this way the rise and fall of the response-current can be studied, and it is found that the magnitude of the electro-motive force generated at any instant is influenced in a specific manner by extremes of temperature, by the application to the stem of chemical re-agents (stimulants or poisons), and to depend also both on the magnitude of the stimulus and its repetition (Fatigue phenomena).

If now an equivalent arrangement is made in which a metallic wire is substituted for the plant stalk, then it is found that on twisting the wire, a corresponding response-current is generated (though in the opposite direction indeed), and that this current is controlled in the same way by similar influences. So that Professor Bose does not hesitate to speak of "poisoning" either a wire or a plant, and of certain chemical re-agents as "stimulants," or, on the other hand, "depressants."

By a careful and lucid collation in the same diagrams of the photographic records of the response-curves of animal, plant, and metal respectively, Professor Bose enables the reader to judge for himself of the very close similarity of behaviour in each case, which is what he wishes to emphasise.

It is not, however, only to mechanical stimulus that there is an electric response in the organic world. It has been for some time known that the action of light on the retina produces electric variation in a freshly excised eye. Thus, when the two galvanometric contacts are made, one with the cut end of the nerve and the other with the uninjured cornea, there is a normal steady current (called the current of injury) through the nerve to the retina. If now the retina is illuminated, an increase in this current is at once observed. This increase is known to be influenced in a very characteristic manner by changes of temperature and by periodicity in the light stimulus and to show curious reversals and after effects on the stoppage of the light. "It may now be asked," writes Professor Bose, "whether such a complex vital phenomenon as this retinal response could have its counterpart in non-living response." And to this question he replies by means of an extremely beautiful experiment. Taking a rod of silver he beats out one end of it into a hollow cup, the inside of which he sensitises by exposure for a short time to the vapour of bromine. The cup may now be filled with water and connection made with the galvanometer by non-polarisable electrodes.

There will now be a current due to the difference between the inner surface of the cup and the rod. This difference may be balanced, however (for convenience), by a compensating electro-motive force. We have thus an arrangement somewhat resembling the eye, with a sensitive layer corresponding to the retina and the less-sensitive rod corresponding to the conducting nerve stump. The apparatus is next placed inside a black box with an aperture on the top. By means of an inclined mirror, light may be thrown down upon the sensitive surface through the opening. The balance is at once disturbed and a response current produced whose direction corresponds to that in the actual eye. "The response of this cell to the stimulus of light," Professor Bose goes on to say, "is in every way similar to that of the retina. . . . In both the intensity of response up to a certain limit increases with the duration of illumination; it is affected in both alike, by temperature; in both there is comparatively little fatigue; the increase of response with intensity of stimulus is alike in both, and, finally, even in abnormalities—such as reversal of response . . . and decline and reversal under continued action of light—parallel effects are noticed."

In Chapter XIX. on Visual Analogues, the author points out how the oscillating phenomena of intra-ocular after-images which follow the exposure of the living human eye to bright light, with which everyone is more or less familiar, are curiously similar to the after-oscillations of the response curve in his mechanical, sensitive, silver cell.

Now, a similar alternation of intensity is observed, if, when the eyes are closed, a picture is called to memory by an act of the will. "It will be found" (Professor Bose here quotes E. W. Scripture's The New Psychology, p. 101) "that the picture cannot be held, but will repeatedly disappear and appear." Thus we find some of the facts of memory ranging themselves alongside of purely physical phenomena. The whole of this chapter will be found very interesting and suggestive.

Coming now to the conclusions which Professor Bose would have us draw from his experiments, we have to point out that it is only indirectly and by way of suggestion that the experiments will be of service in physiology. Of themselves they prove very little. Even in the experiments with inorganic substances, Professor Bose attempts no explanation of the genesis of the electro-motive force, and it is by no means certain, and is in our opinion not even probable, from what we know of the phenomena of contact electricity, that the explanation in the case of metals will be found to hold for plants, or for animal tissues. To be sure, the experiments will help to clear the air of cant, and Professor Bose seems to think that this is very necessary, for in several passages he would lead the reader to understand that the electrical response in animal tissue is considered by physiologists to be due to some unknown superphysical vital force, and relegated to a region beyond physical inquiry. (See page 13.)

Again on p. 81, he says: "We have seen that by physiological phenomena are generally understood those of which no physical explanation can be offered, they being supposed to be due to the play of some unknown vital force existing in living substances and giving rise to electric response to stimulation as one of its manifestations." Such statements are very misleading, and will be repudiated by modern physiologists who have invented the very methods of observation employed, with modifications, by Professor Bose, and whose aim is nothing more nor less than to find out, if they can, by strict experimental inquiry what the physical explanation really is of the response phenomena in living tissue. We have little doubt that such passages as these mark a stage in Professor Bose's own emancipation from earlier misconception, and he must not be surprised if they produce some irritation among the physiologists from whom, apparently without recognising it, he has really derived his inspiration.

* "Response in the Living and Non-Living," by Prof. J. C. Bose, M.A Cantab., D.Sc. Lond., Professor, Presidency College, Calcutta; with illustrations. Longmans, Green & Co. 1902. 10s. 6d.

We must in conclusion put our readers on their guard in respect of another matter also. Professor Bose has no light whatever to throw on the mystery of the difference between living tissue and dead. In his "General Survey and Conclusion" we read that "Living Response in all its diverse manifestations is found to be only a repetition of responses as seen in the inorganic. There is in it no element of mystery or caprice such as we must admit to be applied in the assumption of a hyper-mechanical vital force, acting in contradiction or defiance of those physical laws which govern the world of matter. Nowhere in the entire range of these response-phenomena, inclusive as that is of metals, plants, and animals, do we detect any breach of continuity."

Anyone reading such a passage may well be surprised to find that earlier pages of the same work contain the following:—

"Isolated animal tissue is subject to unknown changes inseparable from the rapid approach of death." Plants, on the other hand, "offer a great advantage in this respect, for they maintain their vitality unimpaired during a very great length of time" (p. 15) and again on p. 69: "It will be seen that those modifications of vital activity which are produced in plants by temperature variation can be very accurately gauged by electric response. Indeed, it may be said that there is no other method by which the moment of cessation of vitality can be so satisfactorily distinguished. Ordinarily we are able to judge that a plant has died only after various indirect effects of death, such as withering, have begun to appear. But in electric response we have an immediate indication of the arrest of vitality, and we are thereby enabled to determine the death point, which it is impossible to do by any other means."

We feel sure that we should enjoy hearing Professor Bose explain accurately what he meant in these passages by "death"; "the rapid approach of death"; "the moment of cessation of vitality"; and "the arrest of vitality";—in the presence of, say, a logician, a physiologist, and a gardener.

A. M. WORTHINGTON.

SERVETUS MONUMENT AT GENEVA.—Donations for this fund received from the following: "Courage never to submit or yield," £10; Mrs. E. W. Shannon, 10s.; the Rev. V. D. Davis, 2s. 6d.; the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, 2s. 6d.; Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, 2s. 6d.

MUCH sympathy will be felt towards our old and honoured friend, the Rev. Henry McKean, who a fortnight ago was knocked down by a horse and trap while crossing the road near his residence, Oldbury. His injuries were very serious and the shock severe, but we are glad to hear that his attendants at the hospital, where he was promptly taken at the time, are now satisfied with his progress.

IN PRAISE OF HOLLAND.

III.

TO AMSTERDAM.

WE imagined ourselves staying the night at the Hotel de Abdij at Middelburg to be ready to start on a further voyage of discovery the next morning. There is a pleasanter but slower way to get from this part of the country to Amsterdam and the Province of North Holland than by rail, and one highly to be recommended on account of the glimpse it gives of Holland as seen from its waters.

A Pleasant Water-way.

We must be up in good time and walk through the quiet streets to the quay on the canal that cuts through the Island of Walcheren. There we shall find a little steamer which has come still earlier in the morning from Flushing, and is bound for Rotterdam and Dordrecht. Nothing can be more restful and more full of interest than the hours from nine to six spent on this little vessel, if the weather is fine. The waterway is first the broad canal as far as Veere, and here we pass through the locks into an arm of the sea, across which we notice the sand dunes of Tholen Island. Between islands we thread our course until we come to a broad arm—the Hollandsch Diep—which is spanned by a railway-bridge, the famous Moerdyk bridge of fourteen arches. As we look beyond the bridge the water in front of us seems shallow, and islets which look like tufts of trees are scattered about. This is the famous Biesbosch (reed-wood), which was once fertile land dotted over with cheerful villages, but now all has been drowned by the ravaging sea. We soon turn out of this broad expanse into a narrow water lane—the Kil—and before long the Cathedral tower of Dordrecht comes into view. And all the time we have had something more charming to look at than the changes of land and water. We have stopped at many a landing stage on the way, and our little floating population has changed and changed again at each stoppage. Farmers with their wives with full baskets of all shapes and sizes; elderly ladies of varieties of costume; young maidens with sweet country faces; strong, healthy-looking lads, have been constantly coming and going, and while we sit watching the panorama of sea and land and cloud pass before us, or enjoy a comfortable meal served on deck, we are surrounded by bright smiles and cheerful voices, and only regret how small an intelligent share even as a listener we can take in the gossip which flies in wonderfully sounding dialect from mouth to mouth.

Dordrecht to Rotterdam.

It is almost a sin to rush by Dort (as Dordrecht is called) either by rail or steamer: It is the artists' delight. Finely situated with water on two sides, its picturesque old streets, with the backs of the gabled houses rising straight from the quiet canals, crossed here and there by a bridge, give endless scope for camera or pencil. The Cathedral deserves a visit, if only to mount to the top of the tower and see water and land near and afar.

Rotterdam can be reached direct by water or rail, but if there is time, a better plan is to take boat for Gorinchem (best known as Gorkum) and spend an hour or two loafing about its clean pleasant streets. Should you want to sample the school-going youth of the place, set up your camera in the street and forty or fifty will soon be even at your elbow; and don't be surprised or annoyed if a goodly contingent form themselves into your bodyguard, and leave you not until they have seen you safely on the platform of the railway station.

A Glorious Cycle Ride.

To reach Amsterdam by rail you pass Rotterdam, The Hague, Leiden and Haarlem, all recognised places for sight-seeing; but instead of describing this road to Amsterdam let me call attention to a glorious cycle ride which would lead us to the same goal and which can be taken either in whole or in parts, and either to or fro.

The start shall be made from the Hague. We ask for the old way to Scheveningen, and bowl along the cycle path for two miles under a avenue of trees till we come to the main street of old Scheveningen. A narrow busy street, peopled with women and girls with dark blue petticoats, ample in width and length, coloured shawls over the shoulders, and queer plain little white night-caps at the back of the head, showing the neatly parted hair from forehead to crown; with men and boys in dark blue baggy trousers and loose lighter blue jerseys, the hair long and sticking out from under the black caps; and in the summer with a goodly sprinkling of men, women, and children of Holland and Germany decked out in modern seaside fashions. At the end of the street the road rises and you find yourself at the top of the dyke, and, behold, in front of you is the magnificent German Ocean, and to your right, stretching for half a mile or so along the busy beach, the line of big hotels and villas which is new Scheveningen.

By the Sea-side.

In July, August, and September, beach life at Scheveningen is at its brightest, and it is bright. The bathing machines are out and about all day long, and so are the beehive-like wicker chairs and the natty little tents. Concerts of good music in the afternoons and evenings at the pier and Kurhaus—children playing on the sands, a merry throng—the going out and the coming in of the large fishing boats, shaped exactly like half a walnut shell—the fish auction on the sand—the glorious sea in front of you. All this sunny brightness and briskness is contagious.

Let us take advantage of the tide and of the wind, too, if we are to enjoy our ride, and mounting our cycles, rush along the firm dry sand to the north, and speed away until we come to another, a smaller, more modest seaside place, Katwijk by name. Here we must leave the strand and cross over the great sluices, which, while the tide is coming in, keep back what may be the last thin stream of the Rhine (called the Old Rhine from Utrecht through Leiden to here), and at low tide let it loose to wash its muddy bed clean into the sea. Here we are on a line with Leiden. Back to the sand, let us go and cycle on about three miles to Noordwijk, seaside place number three. On, on, ten miles more, and we are at Zandvoort, seaside place number four; in its quieter way more charming even than Scheveningen. Haarlem is not far off, and is reached by a unique walk over dunes, by the ruined castle of Brederode and the lovely village of Bloemendal (Flowerdale). To complete the ride, get on the saddle again, and in six or seven miles we are at Ijmuiden, (mouth of the Y), the entrance through wonderful sluices into the Noordzee Canal which saves Amsterdam from being a dead city on the Zuiderzee. Here we can put our cycles and selves on board a little steamer, after a thirty miles, run, and be carried along the broad canal, within sight of Zaandam and its perfect forest of windmills, until the steeples and buildings of Amsterdam come in sight and we land at the quay of Holland's chief city.

ROTATOR SENEX.

A VISIT TO HADLEIGH.

THE SALVATION ARMY COLONY.

A GOOD many years ago now, I first made the close acquaintance of the social work of the Salvation Army, and within the last few weeks I have paid two visits to its Industrial and Farm Colony at Hadleigh, in Essex. On the occasion of my last visit I stayed the night there and next morning was shown over various departments.

Men who get to the Salvation Army Colony at Hadleigh are effectually severed from old associations. They are several miles from the nearest railway station. They are engaged in a healthy occupation all day long in the open air, having wholesome food to eat, and at night a decent bed to sleep on; and their overlookers are men who are anxious to encourage them to climb up once again into useful and honourable manhood. Naturally enough, the Army is rejoiced if it can induce the colonist to acknowledge the claims and efficacy of the Gospel as its officers preach it; but that is not a condition of residence or of help. As a matter of fact, I suppose there really is more hope for a man when, determined to live a better life, he feels conscientiously compelled to go to the penitent form, and declare in open assembly that he is ashamed of his past, and, God helping, will strive thenceforth to acquit himself as a child of God. Still, there are no pains or penalties for any man who does not acquiesce in this regard.

A PLEASANT APPROACH.

Well, I left Fenchurch-street Station one evening by the 6.20 train, and arrived at Leigh shortly after 7 o'clock. A good while before the train runs into Leigh Station one is reminded of the proximity of the Colony, for along the line are conspicuous boards bearing in big letters the legend "Salvation Army Colony." Up on the sky line are the gaunt old ruins of Hadleigh Castle. There are two ways of getting from the railway station to the Colony; one by the dusty road, the other by a path through the fields. Needless to say, the latter is by far the pleasanter. The broad Thames lay glistening in the evening sunshine; and on its bosom stately ships were coming and going with the nation's commerce. Away and beyond was the fair garden of Kent, not so beautiful on its Thames-washed shores as further inland. Thrush and blackbird and lark were still singing as I wended my way by the ruined castle, and the scene was exceedingly restful and idyllic. Just past the ruins is the Colony dining-room. There the path diverges, leading on the left to the dormitories, and on the right to the shops, offices, school, and to the cottages where the married men live. A house situated at the main entrance of the Colony as you enter from the highway is utilised as a general office. Peeping into its many rooms, and observing desks and telephones and typewriters everywhere, one at once forms an estimate of the immense amount of work there is involved in the conduct of such a large establishment. For in answer to almost our first inquiry we were told that the Colony comprises nearly 2,000 acres, divided into arable and pasture land, brickfields, orchards, and, by no means least, a poultry farm. There are employed nearly 180 of that sad class of men who, having come to themselves, are wishful of beginning life afresh; while about 80 more skilled labourers are engaged on the ordinary workman's terms, as gangers and overseers. These are not necessarily either soldiers or officers in the Army, but men engaged as any farmer or market gardener would engage them, and at the same rate of wages. How needful such a leavening is may be gathered from the fact that only the other day a "rescued" labourer was set to hoe parsnips, and, notwithstanding his instructions, he managed to hoe them all up!

Let me here say that during my visit I made the acquaintance of a number of officers, and found them, without exception, most kind and willing to show me as much as it was possible for me to see in the limited time at my disposal. Brigadier Iliffe entertained me in his own home for the night, and I much enjoyed his kind hospitality, and also the interesting and unreserved conversation we had together before retiring to rest.

A SUNNY MORNING.

The weather was charming during my visit. Heavy rains had fallen the previous week, and caused a remarkable growth of all vegetation. The hay had been cut, and some of it was already carted. It was about six o'clock when I awoke next morning. The sun was shining gloriously, and the larks were singing joyously as if there could be no care or wickedness in the world, or at any rate in that part of it. I knew that the men would be stirring, as they breakfast at 6.30, and commence work at 7 o'clock; and I knew they must be hearing the larks singing also. Could they, however hardened they might be, resist the sweet influences of music and beauty which emanated from nature at that hour and in that place? One would think that even the callous and despairing must, under those conditions, breathe forth a thanksgiving to the God who created so fair and luxuriant and peaceful a world. Life seemed worth living even to the man who had fallen lowest. By the bye, I found that my friend the Brigadier had on his shelf a book by Dewey on the Unitarian view of the Gospel, and he told me that until he read that book he had had very erroneous notions as to what Unitarianism stood for. His regard for the heretical faith increases on a closer acquaintance with Dewey.

After breakfast, I was placed in charge of an adjutant who had carefully mapped out our course of procedure so as to cover as much ground as possible. Up through the main street of the village of Hadleigh we walked, admiring the quaint cottages, which had a long, long history behind them, and which looked as if tottering to their downfall. It is an extremely picturesque village.

AN INEBRIATES' HOME.

At the far end of it is a large old-fashioned house, standing in its own grounds, and surrounded by some fine and handsome old trees. This house has balconies all round it, and reminds one very much of French architecture, but it lacks the French shutters. This is an Inebriates' Home for men. It is licensed as such by the Government, and yet the General would not undertake work of this sort save in his own way. There is nothing of the prison about it. No high wall round it. No locks on gates and doors. Its inmates can come and go as they like. No one passing by would conclude that it was anything more or less than a country mansion. There are two public-houses in the village, and if the men were so inclined they could enter them. But they are put on their parole; they are appealed to from the first on highest grounds, and it is seldom that they abuse the trust reposed in them. They go there for a year, and for every one a guinea per week has to be paid. It is not a retreat where men can laze away their time, and contract habits little less desirable than drunkenness itself. They are compelled to work five hours each day, and they can choose their occupation. Some work in the garden, others engage in wood carving. The condition of the grounds does them credit, and the crops will certainly go some way towards their maintenance; while the merit of their carving is remarkable. A lady came over from Southend for a while to give them lessons, but they now teach each other, and certainly there is some exceptional talent amongst them. Samples of their work are on view, and you can see them busily engaged at their craft in the conservatory. The Army claims that the percentage of reforms at this Home is over 70. Fresh air, congenial work, liberty, wholesome food, and healthy recreation are the panacea which produces such satisfactory results.

THE BRICKFIELDS.

From there we went to the brickfields, where we saw the whole process of brickmaking. Everything is up to date, and there is a great demand for the Army's bricks. As to the supply of clay, there is no end of it. One can scarcely conceive of an end to brickmaking at Hadleigh when one scans the acreage of the clay beds there. The work connected with brickmaking is very heavy, and not every man who comes to the Colony is strong enough to engage in it, even assuming it were the best thing for him in other respects; and so the brickmakers are more highly paid than any other workers. Having seen them actively employed, I am sure they deserve all they get, whatever it may be.

THE POULTRY FARM.

The poultry farm was the next place we visited. It consists of twenty-six acres, all dotted over with hen runs. The object is not to supply the market with chickens and eggs for table purposes; but to produce birds of pure strain and to improve the various breeds. In 1901, for instance, 1,600 birds were sent abroad to all parts of the world. Many recently have been sent to South Africa, some of which were valued at £20 a piece, while one fetched as much as £40! Many prize birds are to be seen there, looking as handsome and healthy as any birds can; the conditions under which they live being perfect. It is a revelation to read through the list of prizes taken at various shows by birds from the Colony; and looking through the testimonials received, one finds some names familar to Unitarians. Of course, they are exceptional birds that fetch such prices, birds fit for exhibition; but anyone wanting a special breed of fowls for their own poultry run can obtain them at a very reasonable figure. The incubators were still at work when I was there; but they cease at the end of June. The manager of this farm is an enthusiast both with regard to the Army and to poultry. Years ago, when he heard of General Booth's decision, he suggested this branch of the work as likely to be both useful and remunerative, and he was willing to give it the benefit of his own long and special knowlege. His offer was accepted, and he has since devoted himself to his task with an unqualified success.

Passing on, we next came to the cowshed and the piggeries. The former is by far the largest and most airy I ever saw, and is capable of accommodating 100 cows. The herd contains some prize cattle, and the bull I saw is the winner of a second prize. So also of the pigs, they are of a prize breed, and are sold as such, and not merely to be converted into ham and bacon.

THE SCHOOL.

The Army is anxious about the education of its children, and has a school of its own on the Colony. The infants have a building to themselves, and they are beguiled into the paths of learning as interestingly as possible. The older children are taught at present in a corrugated iron building; but the number of scholars has so grown that the building is inadequate, and plans are already being made for the erection of a larger and better one. They are under Government inspection, and are well taught. I was given the privilege of saying a few words to them, and as I looked into their faces, I was struck by their bright and healthy and intelligent and, let me add, bonnie looks. It seemed impossible that so many of them should have come out of slum surroundings, and been reared by parents who had besotted and degraded themselves. One hundred and twenty-one were present that morning, including the children of the Army officers and special employees, and a few from the village whose parents from one reason or another prefer to send them to that school. Peeping inside the Colony shop, I was reminded forcibly of a co-operative store. Everything was business-like and smart.

THE FRUIT FARM.

Our steps next lay in the direction of the fruit farm; 300 acres are under fruit and market gardening, and no strange observer could suppose that the work was mainly done by members of the submerged tenth fraternity who came there absolutely ignorant of agriculture. A great deal of the stuff grown there is disposed of at Southend. In the large barn I watched the packing of gooseberries and lettuces which were to be conveyed by road in the early hours of the following morning. The manager of this part of the farm is an expert, and not a Salvationist, though his sympathy for fallen humanity is evident.

The cottages provided for employees and for married colonists are of various sizes to meet various needs. Some are built of brick and others of iron. They are cosy and convenient and sanitary, having gardens attached which the tenants cultivate after working hours. Colonists also are allowed to have allotments, and are encouraged in their careful cultivation by the offering of annual prizes. A peep into the tomato houses made one wonder where all the fruit could be disposed of!

THE CITADEL.

In the street of the Colony the Citadel is situated; and as my guide, the adjutant, was chaplain, so to speak, and had charge of all the distinctly religious work of the Colony, he naturally took me to see the "Temple," and mightily pleased I was with it. Its interior was bright and cheery in the extreme. The adjutant has a love of flowers, and so from the roof there hung a great many wire baskets, all containing plants of the ivy geranium trailing over the sides, and as full of blossom as they could be. It was a great pleasure to go in and do nothing more than gaze upon the floral beauty so tastefully provided. Every colonist, whether a Salvationist or not, has to attend at the Citadel on Saturday evening for the roll-call. Sometimes a religious service is held that evening, and sometimes an entertainment. The Saturday following my visit a friend from London was bringing a concert party down to enliven the hours, and the new Governor was to be introduced.

LIFE AT THE COLONY.

And, finally, let me say something as to the eating and sleeping arrangements made for the single men who go down there to be reformed. Every man is paid just what he is thought to earn. At first, it goes without saying, he does not earn his keep. However, he is fed. In a short while he is expected to be worth one shilling and fourpence a day, which he receives at the end of each day's labour. Wages are paid in brass checks, and are only current at the Colony shop, &c. He can spend fourpence, fivepence or sixpence for his bed, according to his tastes and his earnings. When he can afford sixpence he has the luxury of sleeping between sheets, and has his bed made for him. Naturally, too, this brings him into somewhat better company—"birds of a feather flock together." Assuming a man gets one shilling and sixpence a day, and pays sixpence for his bed, he has the rest for his food and anything else he may desire. It does not seem much, but it is astonishing what can be bought with it. The food provided is substantial, and sweet and good. However, a man has to look carefully at every penny before he spends it, otherwise he will never afford a penny for a shave, or three-halfpence for half an ounce of twist tobacco. Though the Army prohibits drinking, it does allow smoking. Well, there is an incentive held out to the men. By working industriously they become recommended for a grant of a shilling or even of two shillings per week. Out of this a third is kept back and banked, and whenever clothes are required to be bought, it can be drawn; but if not used in that way, it is given to the men when they leave the Colony. The rest of of the grant is paid in coin of the realm, so as to accustom the men to the use of real money, otherwise there is a tremendous risk incurred when they pass out of the Colony, and assume once more the ordinary routine ways of civilised life. The dining-room arrangements are also graded. First of all, a man sits at the bottom table, so to speak; he has to wait upon himself, and has only what he can pay for, save at special request to the governor. This means that although he does not by any means starve, he has to let his beard grow for lack of barber's pence; nor can he smoke tobacco, nor get an extra piece of washing or clear-starching done. When he merits it, however, he is promoted to what is called the "eightpenny table," where he is waited on, and has as much as he can eat without paying for it. Such a man receives no wages, but he gets a weekly grant with which to meet his incidental expenses. Above this table are a "ninepenny table" and even a "tenpenny table," at which, in separate rooms, meals are served and little luxuries added. On these three higher-rated tables there are clean white cloths, and on the two highest there are beautiful flowers arranged which impart a home-like appearance. I was privileged to have dinner at the "tenpenny table," and I thoroughly enjoyed the food set before me. I met with some grumblers amongst the men. They seemed to think that there should be no penalties attached to wrong-doing, but that a man going down there should find a bed of roses upon which to lie, and have all sorts of luxuries put into his mouth without involving any trouble or anxiety on his part.

EFFECTIVE HELP.

I am convinced of the efficacy of this grand effort to uplift fallen humanity, and am sure that it deserves our sympathy and our financial support. The officers told me that as a whole the Colony does not pay; the promised subscriptions which gave encouragement in the beginning are not all maintained, gaps made by death are not filled, and the deficit has to be met partially by enhancing the value of assets and by gifts of members of the Army. Every year emigrants are sent out to Canada, and most satisfactory accounts are received from time to time of the exemplary manner in which old colonists behave themselves, and remain true to those higher ideals of life and conduct to which they were pledged. The bye-word on the Colony used by officer to man and by man to his fellow for encouragement's sake is, "Stick it, brother!" I left Hadleigh somewhat reluctantly, for I would have liked to see even more of the life and work there; but I came away delighted with what I did see, and a greater admirer of the social and rescue work of the Army than I was before.

CHARLES ROPER.

"FREE CATHOLIC CHURCHES."

SIR,—I have noticed recently in several communications addressed to THE INQUIRER that the phrase our "Free Catholic Churches" has been introduced, almost as if it had been adopted by general consent as the title of the congregations represented at the Triennial Conference. I am not quite sure what those who use it mean by the phrase; but, before this vogue becomes more extended, and the name gets into common use, I think it might be worth while to subject it to examination, and see if it is appropriate before it is fixed upon us.

What is meant by "Free Catholic Churches"? In the first place, the Churches referred to are Protestant Dissenting Churches, and of late years the term "Free Churches" has come into use to include all varieties of English Dissent, or Nonconformity. In this case, therefore, I take it that "free" means, not under external government, "free from State control" in the sense in which the Established Church is not free. If I am correct in this, then I think the terms should be transposed, and we ought to say "Catholic Free Churches," and not "Free Catholic Churches." There are a number of Free Churches which are united under the title of "Evangelical Free Churches." "Free Churches" is the common term, and embraces the Evangelical and ours, by whatever name they may be called. The orthodox Free Churches prefixed the term "Evangelical," it is well known, in order to exclude Unitarians. The Free Churches being thus divided, and one section having adopted "Evangelical" as their distinctive name, our section should be called "—— Free Churches." If we transpose the terms they are liable to be misunderstood. "Free Catholic" resembles "Old Catholic," which means those who hold to ancient Catholic doctrines and practice, but refuse to accept new ones, claiming still to be true Catholics. So "Free Catholic" would suggest to all the world those who hold Catholic doctrine but reject the supremacy of Rome.

But, even if "Catholic Free Churches" is better than "Free Catholic Churches," we should still have to ask whether "Catholic" is an appropriate term to apply to our churches.

If the term Catholic is used to indicate comprehensiveness, as a wider term than Unitarian ("under half a dozen banners"), then, at least, it is an awkward combination that is proposed and suggestive of tautology. Some of our friends consider "Unitarian" is not wide enough, because in the Conference we are not necessarily all Unitarians, though we may all be so in fact. "Catholic" would then be understood to mean theologically free; but if so the whole title would amount to "Free Free Churches." But for the present I pass this by, to ask whether "Catholic" can be taken to mean open, unrestricted, comprehensive? if that is the idea which it is intended to convey.

"Catholic," I may probably be told, may be used in this way, as it means "universal," but "universal" must apply to something for which universality is claimed, something which extends through the whole. Applied to a church we must only consider it in connection with that church, as there are things which are universal or catholic with which a church has nothing to do. It means either that the Church is universal, or that it possesses some characteristics which are universal in that Church, or both.

But Catholic is more correctly used in the sense, applied to a visible church, that wherever it exists it is the same church, marked by the same characteristics, including without variation the same particulars. Catholic means, not only extended, but the uniformity and invariability of that which is extended. If it were different in different times and places it would not be a Catholic Church (*). It must be identical in all respects, and identity means uniformity and invariability.

The word is used in this sense by Creech (1683) in his translation of Lucretius.

"Now these are Catholic Laws, these rules do bind,
Not animals alone, but every kind."
Sed, ne forte putes animalia sola teneri
Legibus hisce, eadem ratio disterminat omne.†

And this quality of uniform and invariability is declared of the Catholic faith in the well-known definition—

Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus creditum est.

The signification of "Catholic," both etymologically and by usuage, is that which, wherever it exists, is uniform and invariable. One objection raised by Dr. Martineau to the name of "Unitarian" for our Free Churches was that they have not always been and may not always be Unitarian. Variability and an absence of uniformity is claimed as their special characteristic. Thus "Catholic," which means the opposite, cannot be the right name for them. If "free," in "Free Catholic Churches," refers to our theological and not our political freedom, then the terms are mutually destructive.

It may be said that "Catholic," by an easy transition from universal, is sometimes used as a synonym for Comprehensive, but I doubt if this is ever done by exact ecclesiologists and theologians. Universal may sometimes be used as meaning that which embraces all,‡ but that is not the sense of Universal when used as an equivalent for Catholic, which refers to something which is not the whole, but which runs through the whole like a law of nature. We do not say that the Cosmos is universal, we should only apply the term in its widest sense to something which is to be found throughout the Cosmos.

I wrote above of "Catholic" Free Churches in distinction from "Evangelical" Free Churches. "Evangelical" was used in opposition to "Rationalist" (and is so used by the Evangelical Nonconformists), but for a long while Evangelical has been used by historians and theologians in opposition to Catholic in one definite sense—"Catholic" as equivalent to Romish or papal, and "Evangelical"§ as equivalent to Protestant (Lutheran and Reformed). I find this use in Mosheim, D'Aubigné, Mocller, Froude, Babington, and Harnack, to mention only a few authorities which are within reach of my hand as I write. Harnack, the most recent and most widely read of theologians and religious historians, indeed extends the use of the term "Catholic" beyond the concrete signification of Romish or papal, and includes under that description the Orthodox Greek Church ("Orthodox" in this case equals "Catholic") and defines "Catholicism" as a religion of "tradition, doctrine, and ritual." He even speaks of the "Catholicising of the Protestant Churches," by which he means that they are becoming Churches of ordinances, doctrine and ceremony.*

The Rev. Charles Beard attaches the same sense to the term Catholic. The principle of Catholic Christianity, he says, is the nourishing of the religious life by sacraments which can be duly administered only by a sacerdotal order. "Whatever Church says and means priest is on the Catholic side of the great controversy of Christianity; whatever Church says and means minister in that act proclaims itself Protestant."† "Catholic" does not mean tradition, doctrine, ritual, sacerdotalism; but the Sacerdotal Churches claim that continuous and widespread uniformity which alone can justify the use of the term Catholic; thus Catholic, Orthodox, and Sacerdotal have become synonymous terms. How then can we apply the term "Catholic" to our churches in order to distinguish them from the Evangelical or Orthodox, when the term is always understood in a sense contrary to that intended?

Looked at from any point of view, I am unable to see that the term Catholic can be correctly used in connection with our group of Free Churches.

WALTER LLOYD.

* Both Dr. Martineau and Dean Hook dispute the title of the Roman Church to be Catholic on this ground—That its doctrines have not been uniform and invariable.

† Lucretius: De Rerum II. 718.

‡ The Conference certainly is not universal, it embraces only a few Free Churches.

§ "Evangelical." The term is used by that class of dissenters whose private judgment leads them to regard as scriptural the facts of our Lord's Divinity and Atonement, to distinguish them from another class of dissenters whose private judgment leads them to hold these sacred truths as unscriptural.—Hook, "Church Dictionary."

* "The Essence of Christianity," p. 295.

† "Hibbert Lectures—The Reformation," p. 135

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE best "column" for children just now is that in which they "form line," (obedient, as always, to Captain Mother and General Father), "shoulder spades" and "trail buckets," and (not forgetting the food supply) set off for the sea-shore. The schools, poor things! have "broken up," the desks are deserted, the school-fellows are parted from each other for awhile. Books are brought home, most of them—I will implore—to be neatly stacked on the shelf till that far-off, happy(ish) day when the broken-up schools will mend themselves. Of course, I shall not object to one or two books continuing in use. Remember that lovely man, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and his advice to put the "sweet and serious morning" to real good use even in the holidays. But I hope my young friends will especially turn to that Big Book of Nature, with its birds, insects, shells and stones—and learn how good it is to live—when we are good. W. G. T.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom, or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, AUGUST 1, 1903.

HOLIDAY EYES.

THERE is far less of the spirit of gladness in our world than there ought to be. We live mostly without wonder in a world of wonders. Now and again, when a poet or painter takes us by the hand, wakes us from drowsiness, and makes us see, we find ourselves like SAUL, for a little time, "among the prophets." Why is it for a little time only? Surely, because we only now and then spare a glance at nature's glory.

There is far less singing in the world than there ought to be. When face to face with things lovely, men should fall in love with them and fitly say so. But most of us are dumb, and count it a virtue that we do not grumble. We bear in silence, and do not suspect our stoicism to be largely stupidity. Meanwhile, the kindly heavens are patient. Not once and again, but daily, we are sought out by angels of beauty. If VAUGHAN and WORDSWORTH were entirely right, and if we must leave the celestial glory behind us, farther at each step, we might justly be mournful. But their suggestion is poetry: the fact is otherwise. "Heaven lies around us in our infancy": yes, and always. Blest is the child that has flitting consciousness of his beatitude. More blest is the child-man who daily enters anew, with full consciousness and responsive spirit, into the kingdom of his Father. An added sense belongs to the maturer mind. The child has sight, the man insight. The child crows with pleasure at the pretty picture; the man feels the art of the Artist.

At this time, when the divine benediction floods the summer with beauty, the blinded eyes should see, the dumb should sing, and the soul-artist should be born. Hues warm and tender woo the wandering eye, as summer shining on the cornfields alternates with the welcome shadows of the woods. He who misses his fortune now, may gather into barns, indeed, and yet a Voice says to him "O fool!" But who is soberly thrifty—we would suggest no artificial raptures—may find wealth of thought in things close at hand.

Let the holiday-maker consider, for example, just this simple matter of the colours of the world-picture that make the scene so warm and vital. The eye of man is but a defective optical instrument, we are told. Its visual range is about one octave, yet, within this limit, what realms of chromatic intelligence it commands. The materials seen—how comparatively few and simple! There is the blue sky, an arch of jewel variously tinted—amethyst, sapphire, turquoise. The physicist tells us that the "arrangement" involved in this display is merely a scattering of minutest particles through air flooded with sunlight. Add a puff of volcanic dust, and gorgeous splendours of sunrise and sunset ensue. Again, there are the clouds in their strangely incessant variety, bathed in faint flushes of pink or in glowing fervours of scarlet, an upper world of brilliant radiancies and restful shadows. We ask whence this array? The Artist has but set a little steam in the glow of the solar fire.

Now, it is certain that even the eyes of the worker may see these things and ponder them, as he threads the streets of the town. But with how much clearer vision he sees the wonder when set free for a while for this very thing. At such a time, beneath that marvellous vapour-canopy the gracious earth waits his wandering feet, and at each turn new beauties, new miracles of colour, greet him. Let him who runs read. The grass is green with how many greens, and silvered and saffroned and purpled into how many more tints than he can name? Will he not consider these things? The moorland expands the heavenly-earthly dream around him, the distant sea shines, not in vain, or certainly not meant so. To please, to soothe, to touch slumbering faculties, to breathe patience and hope, and to teach GOD'S child a little more of the value of his heritage—to beget thought, thought of the poor—the real poor who miss these treasures, and thought of the Light that makes lovely even simple lives and quite ordinary duties: such things seem meant in the merciful visitation of these holy-days.

THE "COTTON CORNER."

FOR some weeks Lancashire has been under a cloud of apprehension and dread of impending disaster, which have done much to spoil the pleasure of the summer time and rob the holiday season of its proper gladness. Merchants and manufacturers have had grave cause for financial anxiety, while, in a threatened stoppage of their work, industrious artisans have had to look forward to severe privations, a prospect which the remembrance of the cotton famine has rendered only too terrible. Already, in many mills, short time is being run, and it does not need much imagination to realise what it means to families where there are little children and small savings, when the breadwinner is obliged to hang listlessly around for two out of the six working days; worse, much worse, might easily have come to pass, nay, at the time of writing, may even yet do so.

A bold attempt has been made to "corner" cotton. A group of speculators—operators they might prefer to be called—taking advantage of a certain natural shortage, have attempted to buy up and control the available and prospective supply of raw cotton, with a view to reselling at prices which mean the greatest difficulty to all, and ruin to very many of those who are engaged in the various branches of the cotton industry.

If they succeed, it means enormous fortunes to themselves, and embarrassment, loss, or ruin to hundreds of spinners, manufacturers, and other employers of labour; no work, with hunger, sickness, and the extreme of want, to thousands of operatives and their families. If they fail, it means probably ruin to themselves, but also a large measure of the same distress and suffering to others as would have been incidental to their success.

Asked to characterise such transactions, we do not hesitate. The words "greed," "robbery," rise to our lips, and if we picture to ourselves the suffering children of the workpeople we are inclined to add sterner words still. For we know that such periods of distress do bring with them a large measure of disease and death to the little ones. We compare such men to the robber barons of the middle ages, who forcibly levied arbitrary tolls upon their industrious and defenceless neighbours. We denounce them as enemies of society, and we are justified in so doing provided always that at some other time, and in some other connection, we do not bow the knee to Baal and do homage to their wealth and power.

Yet one can imagine their turning round upon us with the questions, "Why all this indignation? What are we doing on the large scale that you would not do on a small scale? We are buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest market we can find or make. Do not you do the same? We are breaking no law. We are but using our financial resources, our business experience and abilities, to forward our own interests. Do not you do the same? You say we are regardless of the interests of others. How far do you stop to consider those interests in your own business affairs? You say we are seeking a great profit without giving anything adequate in return. Are you always careful to give value for value in your dealings? How can the scale of our transactions make immoral that which if done by you in your petty way would be legitimate? Business is a struggle carried on under conditions imposed by economic laws. The interests of others are matters outside business, questions of philanthropy. We shall probably use our big fortune, when we win it, quite as philanthropically as you will your little one."

To such reasoning we might find it difficult to reply, unless we had thought out more profoundly than is usual, the conditions upon which alone business can be legitimately carried on. Moreover, if we did so, we might possibly find that we, on our small scale do fail to observe those principles, the infringement of which on a great scale causes such disastrous results; that we also do treat our business as a game to be played out according to rules of its own, such as we would not apply in other departments of our life; and that, after all, we are not perhaps the persons who should cast stones at the big offenders.

What those principles are, we cannot now stop to inquire in detail. Let it suffice here to say that they are, at bottom, the same great principles of morality, for us largely embodied in the teachings of JESUS, which we acknowledge as binding upon us in other spheres of our activity; that to spend a fortune in accordance with those principles is no atonement for having it made in defiance of them; that to set up a special and different code of regulating our business transactions is a futile evasion of moral responsibility, and must in the long run prove destructive of sound and beneficial commerce itself; above all, that so long as we have any religious belief, our practice in our daily business life must be made to square with it, nay, indeed, must be an outcome and exponent of it.

Is it not in the separation between the religious and the ordinary daily life that the great root of the mischief is to be found? We can, in imagination, see the robber baron on the holy-days of his Church kneeling to receive the "Body of his Lord." We can see him as, wounded in some lawless fray, he lies dying and clasps to his lips the image of his "Crucified Redeemer." We wonder at the inconsistency of his life. We we need not impute to him insincerity in these acts of religion, but we feel that what he really needed for his salvation was to carry with him in his daily life the constant reverent and adoring thought of the living JESUS, unselfish, loving, merciful, and pure. Is not our need the same as his,—that the highest ideal of life to which we have attained should be ever with us, a standard no less for our business than our private life, a judge that by its very presence at once condemns and stimulates to better things?

THE WORLD-MISSION OF UNITARIANISM.*

BY MARY B. WESTENHOLZ.

I HAVE been asked to speak about the world-mission of Unitarianism. Let me begin by stating, what to my idea is the special mission of Unitarianism, its calling, its vocation in the great Christian community of which it forms part.

I must begin by reminding you, that while to many of you the definition, Unitarian, probably has a double meaning, implying both a man's religious faith, and his membership of a certain religious community, a certain set of churches, with us it is only used in one sense, to indicate a man's religious standpoint. As the designation Atheist, Theist, Trinitarian, so Unitarian simply refers to a man's spiritual views; and only in this sense shall I use the word here.

And one thing more. When I stand here expatiating upon, and explaining my views and ideas of Unitarianism, its gospel and its mission, do not for one moment think that I am setting up my opinions against those of men whose wisdom, knowledge, and experience are as far beyond mine, as mine are beyond those of the young ignorant child. I have been asked to state my views on certain topics, and having accepted the invitation, I feel bound to do so, as simply and as truly as I can, not considering how far they may coincide with or differ from any other man's or woman's; but surely you must realise, that I cannot do it without trembling at the thought of how immature and commonplace they must seem to many men here present.

The Distinctive Mission of Unitarians.

And now let me try to explain to you, what in my eyes is the special religious truth with which we as Unitarians have been entrusted, for the spreading of which through humanity we shall be held responsible. It may not be—no, it is not, the essential point in the Unitarian faith. Other truths range above it in importance, for instance, that there is a God, that this God is our loving Father and just Lord, that we may enter into close communion with Him; the brotherhood of man; all these truths form, I believe, the very essence, the life and soul of the Unitarian faith; but, thank God, they are not ours alone, we hold them in common with almost all other Christians. In fact, they are exactly the ties, which bind all the different Christian Churches together in one religious brotherhood. To spread them is the common mission of all Christians. The Unitarian here forms no exception; on the contrary, it is his happy fate here to feel his membership in the whole Christian community.

But what then is the truth which has been revealed to Unitarians, and to Unitarians alone amongst all Christians? What is the special mission that we are called upon to fulfil?

I believe it to be this, that not through doctrines and creeds transmitted from one man, one generation to another, but through a pure and noble life do we acquire spiritual knowledge, do we gain "full assurance in our own minds" about religious truths. As far as I know, all other Christians hold their special position in Christianity by some special religious dogma or creed. We alone have none. We alone seem to know, that the only way to win the faith of Christ is to lead, to strive to lead, the life of Christ; that the only possibility for us to attain to his close communion with God lies in our following in his footsteps. We do not believe in short-cuts through creeds and sacraments. Guide and help each other we may—do we not reverence and follow the great prophets, the godly men of our race?—but it is not through teaching each other religion that we may do so, but by helping each other to that spirit "which alone knows what is in God." Be pure in heart, and you shall see God. Obey your conscience, "God's Word," and you shall feel His presence. This truth is revealed to Unitarians. To spread this truth in Christendom is, in my eyes, the mission of Unitarians.

Divergent Views of Religion.

Two years ago, after the meeting here of the International Council, travelling home, we stopped some days in a Continental town. One of the men who had been a delegate to the meetings here, living there, showed us great kindness and hospitality. He is a minister, and he took us to his church. There was nothing, either in the building or its fittings, that gave to us the impression of its being a Christian church. I do not even think our friend uncovered his head when he entered it. There was, somewhere, either in the windows or on the walls, a gallery of portraits of good and wise and eminent men. Who they were I do not remember. I think I saw Goethe amongst them, but I am not sure, for suddenly I came upon the portrait of Christ—and I could not look again at the pictures. I turned away as one does from a painful sight. We asked about the service, and were told that they had no Liturgy. Did they preach from texts taken from the Bible? Yes, from the Bible as well as from other good books. And prayers? Did they have prayers? Did they use the Lord's prayer? Sometimes yes. I think he said that they had prayers, when anyone felt inclined to pray aloud. I understood that he did not pray himself, that not realising God as a personality he could not pray, but by this time my mind was very much troubled, and I am not sure that I understood him aright. We spoke about other things, and afterwards passed a very pleasant, extremely interesting afternoon together. But, when I sat in the train my troubles began again, and my heart was very sad. Here was a man, who to the best of my knowledge was a good, wise, and religious man. A man with whom I had passed this glorious pentecost, a man who had been my companion on Mount Tabor, and yet a man whose religious views I could not share, nor hardly comprehend. Was it possible, that the perfect freedom I had won, the fearless search for truth on which I had entered, could ever lead me to the place where he stood? Having shaken off all authority of prophets and churches, was I now drifting along? Was there no magnetic needle by which I might safely go, no solid rock whereupon to plant my feet? I felt deeply depressed. Then suddenly I remembered these words of Christ's: "My doctrine is not mine but His that sent me. If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." And all my troubles were at an end. It was the man who had been as near to God as ever man was, who had said this, and I felt he was right. I said to myself, I will strive to be pure, and true, and loving, and fearless, and by the spirit that shall be born out of this honest struggle will I be guided. And my mind was at rest, and my heart at peace.

* A paper read at the Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Essex Hall, on Thursday morning June, 4.

Now you who are born and bred in Unitarian communities may not be able to realise what it was I felt. But from that day I had formed my idea about what is the mission of Unitarianism.

Knowledge of God through Practical Faithfulness.

To the millions and millions all over the world, and in all Christian churches, who having lost all faith in human authorities are calling from their inmost heart, "Lord, I believe, help Thou my unbelief," we have a message to bring. Be pure of heart and you shall see God. Obey your conscience and you cannot fail to grow in spiritual knowledge. I have no sympathy with proselytising. I think it is in absolute opposition to the spirit of Unitarianism. Let each man walk in peace as he is called. I feel and prize the great blessing it is to be amongst, and worship with, men and women who hold the same religious views as I do, think as I do; but the congregation of which I feel myself a member is made up of all men who strive to live in God, whatever may be the church or theology through which they have attained to this spiritual state of mind, and I never feel called upon to argue about or correct the theological doctrines of a God-loving, God-fearing man, who is at peace with himself, however erroneous those doctrines may seem to me. But with all the means that are at my disposal, would I try to persuade any man whose heart is cold, whose mind is sceptical, but whose soul is athirst for the living God, to try the law about the pure heart and the obedient will, so sure am I, that it can but work for salvation.

To do this, I think, is our mission. Now how are we to set about fulfilling it? How are we to reach all these suffering, labouring, searching men and women with the message that has been entrusted to us?

Every Nation must Work Out its own Salvation.

I feel that most of you here present know more about this, and have a far greater experience than I have. You cannot and will not expect to hear anything new: what you are here to learn is, I suppose, what on this point are the notions, the ideas of a fellow-labourer from a foreign land. I know very little about how the Unitarian mission is being carried on in the different nations of the world, but this is clear to me, that to succeed it will have to be undertaken in different ways in all the different countries. As every man, so every nation must work out its own salvation for itself, in its own individual way. In any work undertaken for a people's benefit and progress, its special character, its disposition and development must be taken into consideration. If you are to succeed you must never run contrary to them. You cannot successfully force improvement on a man or on a people. You cannot make a seed grow where the soil and climate are against you.

In Denmark within the National Church.

I love your free Churches. When a few years ago the Unitarian movement began in my country, I thought they were the model we should have to copy, the ideal we should try to realise. But I had not been in the movement for many months, when I knew that they would never live or thrive with us, that what we should attain to, even if we should succeed in forming a few independent churches or congregations, would only be a kind of doomed caricatures, or at best weak little cuttings that would never take root and thrive among our people, but, like the Christian sects in Denmark, such as Adventists, Methodists, and others, it would have to live and feed on the nourishment it got from the mother-plant. And I felt that though this might satisfy all my own spiritual needs and cravings, the question of missionary work would be at an end if this should be our fate. And with a few exceptions all the members of Det fri Kirkesamfund, the Unitarian Congregation, felt as I did, that this could not be the right course for us to take.

Knowing, as we do, that to thousands of our countrymen the knowledge of Unitarian Christianity would mean deliverance out of harassing doubt and scepticism or practical indifferentism, we feel it to be our duty to do what is in our power to help them to this blessing. Being convinced that not through a secession from, but only through a reform of the National Church—the people's Church—shall we be enabled to perform the task we have set ourselves, we are now firmly resolved to remain in that Church, openly proclaiming our heresy towards the orthodox creed and dogmas, and work for a reformation of it which shall lead to Unitarian Christianity being preached from its pulpits, and living under its roof on equal terms with Orthodoxy.

The Way of Development.

I shall not here enlarge upon our plans of work, our hopes, and chances. I should not succeed in making them clear and comprehensible to you. What recommends them is, that while making for religious sincerity and honesty, they are built on the traditions of development in our church-life, and are in conformity with our national character, which is more marked for its strong common sense and practical perseverance, than for those higher qualities of which heroes and martyrs are formed. And even should I succeed in giving you some kind of idea about the work and task that lies before us, I fear that I should give you quite a wrong impression as to what has been done, what is being done. All—all that has as yet been done is that a few of us—I am speaking of the Danish Unitarians—think that they see the way we ought to go, and that of these few, some fewer still have seized the spade and the axe to go to work to clear the way. In fact, the task that lies before us is so great, the forces we command so few and weak, that many of us cannot take heart to enter on what to them seems a doomed undertaking, predestined to failure.

Can Unitarianism Prosper?

And here I am back on common ground. It is no more the question, How are we practically in each given case to fulfil our mission? that I am thinking of. It is the cry from our faint, troubled hearts, How are we to fulfil our mission? to which I am trying to find an answer. How are we to do it? Can it be done? Is it not a graceless task we have set before us, a hopeless undertaking? What progress has Unitarianism made from the days of the first and greatest of all Unitarians, through 1900 years down to our own time? What has been its success compared to that of Orthodoxy? We have had prophets as great and wise and noble as has Orthodox Christendom. The adherents to our faith have been as warm, true, and devoted as have been any belonging to the Orthodox Church. And see, where are we to-day compared to our orthodox brethren? While in every Christian nation, Orthodoxy is the recognised, the official form of Christianity, I do believe that you could not find one man in every thousand Christian men, who knows anything about Unitarianism, and yet in my belief out of every thousand Christians, hundreds are Unitarians by faith, or would be so, if they had any notion that there may exist a true personal religious life outside all creeds and churches. It would seem as though the way lay open for Unitarianism to success, and yet—yet look at what progress we have made, look at our number, look at our position to-day. May not our hearts well feel heavy and our hopes run low?

I have found an answer to these troubling questions, an explanation which satisfies and reassures me. I feel very small as I stand here speaking thus to you. But however far you are beyond me and in advance of me, I know, and I know it from the writings of many of your best and wisest men, that you too suffer from this sad feeling of impotence, you too need what encouragement you can get, to bear the strain of apparent failure, and yet go on fearlessly and hopefully. And I will not be held back by timidity, from offering what I have to give.

Well, then, I have come to think that our fate is what it needs must be. It is all right, there is nothing wrong, nothing to discourage us in it, and we are not to expect it to be otherwise.

Unitarianism the Principle of Health.

Unitarianism represents the hygiene, and Orthodoxy the medicines, in the spiritual world. Holding that man's soul is in a natural state of evolution, Unitarianism maintains that what it needs to grow towards perfection and godliness is training, hardening, strengthening of all its good dispositions; whereas Orthodoxy holds that the soul of man is ruined, spoilt, and depraved, and that it can only reach its destination, salvation from sin, sorrow, and suffering, through miraculous intervention, and mystic cures.

Now observe how in the material world the science of hygiene fares compared to that of medicine, drugs, and pills. Compare the fate of the apostles of a healthy, vigorous, abstemious life, to that of the doctor and the druggist. These latter earn their bread, sometimes fortunes, by their skill, and hold respected positions all over the world, while he whose endeavours are bent upon making men live in obedience to the laws of health, may toil and labour, spend his time and his money on his mission, and is often looked upon as a tiresome bore, a ridiculous fanatic by the bulk of people, from the steps of the throne to the lowest slums. Have not the governments of all nations to enforce the observance of the simplest sanitary rules through a strict and vigilant police, while laws forbidding miracle doctors to practise, preventing the sale of quack-medicines, are still needed to guard the people from all kinds of innocent or vicious impostures?

The Pioneers' Task.

It needs a brave heart and a good healthy capacity for hoping, besides a firm conviction, to take up the cause of hygiene and stand by it cheerfully and faithfully. It is true, history tells us, that it is making its steady progress through humanity, but the men who form the vanguard are generally dead and gone before the truths they discover and advocate are recognised and accepted by the masses. And the men who have stepped into their shoes, inherited their vocation, are again marching ahead, a little lonely corps of pioneers, unnoticed and unappreciated by the multitudes. For by the time we have all come to recognise the importance of sunshine, fresh air, and cold water for our well-being, they are laboriously toiling to clear the way for the new laws that have been discovered, and theirs will never be the triumph of victory. The victor's reward does not fall to their lot.

And yet, do you call theirs a sad fate? Do you think their calling poor? In my eyes it is so great and glorious that I almost fear to say that such is our fate. To search for, to proclaim the laws of spiritual growth and development, is our calling, our special task in the great Christian brotherhood. And not till the day comes, when all these laws shall be known and respected as are now the simplest physical laws—such as this, that fire when touched will hurt—shall the Unitarian, if he is true to his vocation, be one of the many, rank in the main force of God's warriors, mingle his voice in the Te Deum of the victors.

Mutual Encouragement.

This is a thought, a fact that will brace a healthy mind and make a strong heart send the warm blood pulsing through all the veins. But our minds are not always healthy, our hearts are often weak. Where, then, are we to go for help and support, when the burden of loneliness, disappointment, and failure lies heavily on our shoulders, when doubt cries loudly to us that our task is insoluble, and faint-heartedness tells us that our work is in vain? We all know what is the one unerring answer to this question, we can all point to the one unfailing source of help and comfort. But beside this I believe that every man or woman here present could make some answer of his own to this question, could tell us something out of his own life, his own experience, which might be of help to to the rest of us.

A Grateful Acknowledgment.

I have got something to say, something it would do me good to hear if I were you. When last I stood here, I remember that I spoke to you of the Danish Unitarian Congregation as your younger brother. To-day I will speak of you as the elder, the big brother. That is what you have been and are to us. I wish you could hear the way in which we silence each other by saying, "Our English brethren do so and so." I wish you knew how often it is said, "Why cannot we write, and speak, and preach as the English Unitarians do? Let us try to be more like them." Yes! I wish you knew what a feeling of comfort, support, and security it gives us to know that you are here, a true, strong, faithful brother within our reach. In a family, in a flock of children, each child must be taught, must learn to follow its own calling, to stand upon its own feet, to feel and be independent, and do its work, fill its place in its own individual way. Lucky the young child, who, when he starts by unknown roads, into an unknown land, feels the firm, warm grasp round his hand of a stronger, wiser brother's. But happy too the big brother, who toiling painfully along with all kinds of fears and misgivings lurking in his heart, is made manly, faithful, and self-forgetting by the conviction that great trust is placed in him.

When you feel sad and low, when success seems out of your reach, when all your efforts, all your sacrifices seem made in vain, remember that to others things may have a different aspect. Looking at the task that lies before us, the work we have to do, you may well feel like the weak, inefficient child, but call to mind then that to those who are still weaker, far less capable than you, you are the big brother, the big, beloved, and admired brother who can always help.

Of a Good Courage.

Yet let us take heart. Let us suffer cheerfully and work bravely, the weak amongst us thankful that they have stronger brethren by their sides, the strong, or perhaps I may only say the less weak, taking courage from the conviction that the weak are looking to them for guidance and comfort. Do not let us look too much or too closely at the difficulties and dangers that lie in wait for us. Do not let us calculate how far we have to go before we reach our goal. Let us march on. My hope, my courage, my energy will rise and fall—are often very low. Doubt will set in on almost all points, till at some moments it will hide even God from my eyes. But never, never for one moment do I doubt the great Unitarian truth, that only through a fearless, honest, persevering struggle after a pure and sinless life, shall I come to stand face to face with the one living God.

We cannot know, we can hardly guess, what our conceptions of God, of man's soul, and of the relation between God and the soul shall be on the day when our mission shall be fulfilled, when all human hearts shall be purged of every vile, mean, selfish thought and craving, and man's will shall be one with God's will. But this we may dare to say, that on that day the daily prayer of all Christendom shall have been heard. The Kingdom of God shall have come.

THE HOMES OF WORDSWORTH.

I.

THE most conspicuous examples of will-power are those of men who have forced their way through adverse circumstances to a notable eminence in the world's affairs, as statesmen, warriors, or commercial magnates: they have sought prominence and have finally attained. A higher and more persistent quality of will is required to choose and consistently follow a course of life which looks to no eminence, and disregards all generally accepted objects of ambition. Of such singleness and power of character Wordsworth is a supreme example. His genius and principles of life required that he should avoid the conflicts of public deeds, and submit himself to the life-long influence of simple country life. He made his choice and adhered to it. His biography, therefore, does not consist of many striking events and triumphs among men, but in the growth of a poet's mind, its assimilation of the meaning of the beauty and power of nature, and the expression of the insight that came to him. Will-power that with other objects and in a different man might have mastered a kingdom, or organised some world-wide commercial enterprise, was required to shut out distracting influences and devote ability and concentrate attention on the work of a poet of nature to which he was called. In reviewing his life, the places in which he lived are of unusual importance. Many great men we feel might have done their great deeds in some other and quite different surroundings, with merely a modification of details in their history and no very significant variation in the result. Wordsworth's choice of a place, his adherence to it, and his expression of it, are of essential significance; and a review of his homes and their surroundings, together with his domestic companionship, are of first importance in the understanding of him and his writings.

He was born in 1770, at Cockermouth where the stream that gives its name to the town joins the Derwent. His father's house remains where it was, but its near surroundings have changed more than those of any of Wordsworth's later homes. It was and is a large, regular, four-cornered house facing the broad main street of the town. It stands back from the road and has a wall in front, and one also on the left, shutting out the small side street which leads from the main road, alongside the house, to the river, thus enclosing a garden court before the house. There is a wide central gate in the wall opposite the front door, with high posts of masonry surmounted by urns. Steps lead up to the front door: these are covered by a canopy borne by two pillars and lead to an ample porch. Many such houses exist, in country towns, such as were inhabited by substantial merchants and professional men a century ago. Wordsworth's father was attorney-at-law and law-agent to Sir James Lowther, and the house is such as would be considered suitable to his position. The regular, flat-fronted stuccoed house has four flat windows on each side the entrance door, all alike, and on the second story nine corresponding windows, one being above the door. Behind, there is a walled garden extending to the river Derwent which flows below: a terrace against the river wall makes a distant prospect possible.

On the same side of the river, higher up, the Cocker joins the Derwent, and yet a little higher on the river bank are the ruins of the castle.

These things were familiar to Wordsworth in the earliest days his memory could recall, but there is much to be seen which he saw not, and which would not have contributed to his poetic associations with the place. A large factory has been built in the meadows opposite his earliest home, the most conspicuous object in the view from house or garden, and close to the castle is a large brewery. There are other products of industrial ugliness which would have made the poet unhappy. Cockermouth is not now a picturesque town: it has many squalid houses and but few with anything agreeable in their outward appearance. But the country round is pleasantly undulating till it rises to the Lakeland mountains. The eight mile drive or walk to Crummock Water is a delightful approach to the glories of the district, and the distant view of the mountain range may well remind us of the poet's childhood, when he began to feel afar off the charm of the district he was to make specially his own, and in it interpret nature to many. The mountains of which he had glimpses, specially Skiddaw, which was least distant, and the ever present stream, began to develop him as their interpreter. His own words best tell the influence of the place:—

One, the fairest of all rivers, loved
To blend his murmurs with my nurse's song,
And from his alder shades and rocky falls,
And from his fords and shallows, sent a voice
That flowed along my dreams. For this, didst thou,
O Derwent! winding among grassy holms
When I was looking on, a babe in arms,
Make ceaseless music that composed my thoughts
To more than infant softness, giving me
Among the fretful dwellings of mankind
A foretaste, a dim earnest, of the calm
That nature breathes among the hills and groves!
When he had left the mountains, and received
On his smooth breast the shadow of those towers
That yet survive, a shattered monument
Of feudal sway, the bright blue river passed
Along the margin of our terrace walk;
A tempting playmate whom we dearly loved.
Oh, many a time have I, a five years' child,
In a small mill-race severed from his stream,
Made one long bathing of a summer's day;
Basked in the sun, and plunged and bathed again
Alternate, all a summer's day, or scoured
The sandy fields, leaping through flowery groves
Of yellow ragwort; or when rock and hill,
The woods, and distant Skiddaw's lofty height
Were bronzed with deepest radiance, stood alone
Beneath the sky. PRIESTLEY PRIME.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

Re SUMMER EXCURSION.

SIR,—Will you allow me space in your paper to answer the various inquiries which come from different parts of the country, as to whether the Central Postal Mission is arranging any summer excursion this year.

It is not our intention to do so, more particularly, as we hope that some who usually join these parties may be induced to go to Amsterdam for the International Religious Conference, which takes place in September, and which I hope to attend. Tickets dating from Monday, August 31, and full information can be had by applying direct to Mr. Ion Pritchard, Essex Hall, Essex-street, London, W.C.

Yours truly, M. LUCY TAGART.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL.

SIR,—I promised, in a letter addressed to you a few weeks ago, to announce the names of the trustees to whom Miss Matilda Sharpe has now confided the care of this school. They are:—Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, Bart., Mr. Sidney Martineau, Mr. F. J. Nettlefold, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Mrs. W. Blake Odgers, Mr. Frank Preston, Miss Emily Sharpe, Miss Matilda Sharpe, Mr. W. A. Sharpe, Mrs. W. A. Sharpe, Mr. F. Withall, Mr. H. Wade, Mrs. William Wooding. The committee of management, formed of seven of these ladies and gentlemen, appears in your advertisement columns. They are taking this opportunity of widely circulating a new prospectus of the school, and I trust that all our friends who may receive it will not fail to read it, and where they can do so will help us by their recommendations.—I am, yours faithfully,

W. ARTHUR SHARPE, Hon. Secretary.
4, Broadlands-road, Highgate, N.

THE FELLOWSHIP OF THE PROPHETS.

SIR,—With your kind permission, may I be allowed to point out that the new Year-Book is that of the body of ministers on the roll of the National Conference? Its publication was agreed upon in the same way as the new hymnal now being prepared, and quite independent of the National Conference officials.

Its newly arranged form is intended to serve as a suggestion, and should this lead either to the improvement of the "Essex Hall Year-Book," or to the publication of an official year-book by the National Conference, its intended purpose will be achieved.—Yours truly,

WILLIAM STUBBS, Publisher.
"Chronicle" Office, Cirencester.

SOCIAL AND FAMILY ETHICS.

SIR,—The essay which Mr. Weatherall criticises was written a good many years ago in protest against Mr. Herbert Spencer's contention, that the ethics of society ought to be different in principle from the ethics of the family. If the protest is no longer needed, I rejoice. In any case, I am grateful to Mr. Weatherall for his challenge to us to get behind formulæ, whether mine or his, and try to give ourselves an account of the facts. I have not, at present, the opportunity of re-examining my essay in the light of his remarks; but if, later on, I think I can usefully say anything in recantation or development (mere explanations or complaints of misunderstanding help no one), I am sure your columns will be open to me.—Yours,

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

LEO XIII.

SIR,—I have just been reading Mr. Addis's article on Leo XIII. That he was a great improvement on his predecessor few people will question, but on the very day that I read Mr. Addis's article I read also the following passage from Leo's encyclical on "Scholastic Philosophy," addressed to ecclesiastics throughout the world:—

> Let the teachers whom you shall discreetly choose make it their aim to instil the doctrine of Thomas Aquinas into the minds of their scholars, and to set in a clear light his solidity and excellence above all other teachers.

One of the works recently published by the Jesuits is called "Aquinas Ethicus," and consists of extracts from the "Summa Theologica" of St. Thomas Aquinas. The translator is the Rev. Joseph Rickaby, S.J. We give the following quotation from this work from Vol. I., pp. 332, 333:—

> Are heretics to be tolerated?
> R.—With regard to heretics, two elements are to be considered, one element on their side and the other on the part of the Church.
> On their side is the sin whereby they have deserved not only to be separated from the Church by excommunication, but also to be banished from the world by death. For it is a much heavier offence to corrupt the faith, whereby the life of the soul is sustained, than to tamper with the coinage, which is an aid to temporal life. Hence, if coiners or other malefactors are at once handed over by secular princes to a just death, much more may heretics, immediately they are convicted of heresy, be not only excommunicated but also justly done (sic) to die. But on the part of the Church is mercy in view of the conversion of them that err; and therefore she does not condemn at once, but after the first and second admonition, as the Apostle teaches (Titus iii. 10). After that, however, if the man is still found pertinacious, the Church, having no hope of his conversion, provides for the safety of others, cutting him off from the Church by sentence of excommunication; and further, she leaves him to the secular power to be exterminated from the world by death.

If a Pope, who is generally regarded as liberal, could sanction such teaching as this at the end of the nineteenth century, is it strange that Englishmen should refuse to obey a law which compels them to pay for it? C. J. SNEATH.

Balsall Heath, Birmingham.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—A. B. (thanks); E. S. L. B.; R. C. B.; D. B. F.; P. P.; E. M. R.; J. R.; R. R.; D. B. S.; H. S. S.

PROTESTS AGAINST THE EDUCATION RATE.

Mr. R. D. Darbishire has addressed the following letter to the Manchester Guardian, in whose columns it appeared on the 25th ult.:—

Sir,—I have received my note for rates due on my house in South Manchester, and observe that the rate "for municipal purposes" is marked as including educational rate. It seems a pity that the amount of the latter rate should have been so smothered while many citizens are objecting to pay that particular charge or a portion of it.

I have seen and heard calculations made with a view to eliminating the particular portion of the education rate which may be supposed to be charged in respect of certain denominational arrangements which many of us object to be obliged to support, and I have seen recommendations to pay the rate subject to the refusal to pay a certain calculated "denominational" subsidy.

On this point, in the first place, it occurs to me that the refusal to pay this particular portion of the rate is illusory; for whatever is paid on account of the education rate will undoubtedly be passed by the authorities to the credit of that general outlay, and a portion of the money so paid will go towards the objectionable business, and the refusers' intention will obviously be rendered futile to that extent.

But I believe that there is another ground on which the refusal of the school rate becomes a most serious obligation on citizens—for the express purpose of declaring their refusal to recognise the legality of the enactment of last year.

This, of course, is founded on the conviction that that enactment, carried by means which can only be profoundly reprobated, and at the instance of a weak and profligate Government, acting by means of a political dodge and, as is generally believed, in compliance with the dictation asserted by a most strange ecclesiastical alliance, in singular and singularly un-Christian opposition to citizens who are known as the Nonconformists, is neither more nor less than unconstitutional.

The enactment in question distinctly betrays the national right to equal civil and religious liberty for every citizen, and in so far at once institutes a distinctly unlawful levy, and affects the abolition of popular administration of the funds the people are to be made to contribute.

We cannot help it if the authorities take the course of forcing us to pay a tax of that kind by what is simply tyrannical and unlawful oppression. But I venture to think every citizen is bound to withhold a voluntary payment of this tax, and to force the authorities to complete their violation of right and duty. As it is, I have paid my rates, except the amount charged for "city and educational purposes."

I resent—I repeat it—this illegal exaction, and the more because I personally am anxious to pay for education, and, moreover, also for every conscientious religious education, so long as it is not to be enforced by clerical bigotry or intrigue or dogmatic compulsion.

I earnestly entreat every fellow-citizen to join in this protest, and having done so presently to take every lawful means of effectually removing from our Statute-book the illegal and hateful provision of the present—alas, that I should have to say so!—law.—Yours, &c., R. D. Darbishire.

The Hon. Rollo Russell, who resides at Haslemere, has addressed a letter to the Rev. G. H. Aitken, the rector of that town, explaining why he must protest against the education rate. Mr. Russell's letter is as follows:—

Dear Mr. Aitken,—A rate is, I suppose, about to be levied for the support of the schools of this parish and district. If I find it impossible to pay the Education Rate without, at least, a protest, I ask you to understand that my objection is not in any degree to the manner in which the schools here are managed, or to any teaching which, so far as I know, the children receive. On the contrary, I cannot but admire the management of any institution animated by the spirit of justice which you have always shown. I know that you do everything possible to mitigate the oppression of sectarianism and of dogma.

But first, I am bound to maintain, as our forefathers have maintained, the right of representation on any body which demands money from the citizen in the name of law. This Government, in defending their Bill, solemnly assured the people of England that it would bring education under complete popular control. Where is that control? There has been no election of members of Parliament to give the parents of children the opportunity of expressing their views by their votes. There has been no election of County Councillors. There has been no open election of school managers. I am asked, therefore, to pay rates for schools where I have no representation, in absolute violation of the assurances given to the nation by the Government. So far has the policy of seclusion been carried, under the shelter of this iniquitous Act, that the education authority sits with closed doors, and refuses admission to the Press and fears publicity. We are being plunged every day further into the darkness which pleased Laud and Strafford, but which a nation of free men, such as fought their barred way to liberty under the leadership of John Hampden, must heartily detest. It was unjust taxation which caused the Great Rebellion, it was unjust taxation which lost for us North America. The present taxation is even more galling, for it forces us to pay for the teaching of doctrines to the young in the same religion which more than half the nation believe to be unsound, untrue, misleading to the child, and dangerous to the commonwealth.

Can we say that men who conscientiously refuse to pay for the teaching to children, in the schools of the nation, of dogmas fastened upon the Church, under threats, by prelates of the sixteenth century, are wrong? The teachers in schools under the new Act are, as a matter of fact, in the position of Civil Servants of the State, or of Officers in the Army and Navy. There should be no test, no limitation of fitness by the dogmas of the Dark Ages. Yet in thousands of our public schools throughout the country the test is in operation, and the managers are almost wholly of one religious community, whose doctrines are imposed on the children. There is an open door from the School to the Church. Many children of Free Church parents are thus brought into the fold of that body, which in the plainest words, on all great feast days, which ought to be occasions of unity, Christmas Day, Easter, Whit Sunday, and Trinity Sunday, condemn all Dissenters and the greatest men of all ages and countries to the punishment of everlasting fire in hell.

Is any grosser spiritual wrong done on earth than this? Mysteries in which no human being can be expert are dealt with as familiarly as if they were arithmetical items, and the more reverent child of faith is declared, "without doubt," to "perish everlastingly."

It is deeply deplorable that the Church of England, which we long to see laying foundations in breadth and truth, should be endeavouring to imprison the new spirit, as it has been called, but which is really largely the spirit of Christianity and of common humanity, within the labelled jars of an ancient particularity.

For many years we have been paying heads of colleges, in provinces of the country, who teach their pupils that the Divine presence is confined to Anglican Churches, and who heap reproach and damnation on all who differ from their tenets. This was hardly to be borne, and we may have been wrong in paying for the privilege of commination. It was, however, little known, and small areas only were directly affected.

But when training colleges, practically public, maintain tests, when the common schools are made seminaries of sectarianism, when head masters must be Anglican, when our splendid School Boards are abolished, when taxation is exacted with no provision for representation, when the education authorities sit in secret, and when the Government attacks on all sides the honoured securities for British rights, the wrong becomes intolerable. With good reason, the country revolts. If only all parties had been consulted, and the Government had dealt fairly with education on a modern basis, this most deplorable strife need not have arisen. There can be no solution but in national unsectarian teaching, which will leave to the various churches, to the Sunday-schools, and to the homes of the parents, such religious instruction as the parents may desire.—With the greatest respect, yours very truly,

Rollo Russell.

THE UNITARIAN'S GOSPEL.

The following is a summary of the opening sermon delivered by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie at the new Unitarian Chapel at Merthyr Tydfil on the 19th ult., the proceedings on which occasion have been already briefly reported. Taking as his text the words from the Gospel: "I have not come to destroy, but to fulfil," he showed how these words gave a glimpse of the ordinary prejudices against Jesus, and how, too, the words formed an answer to the misrepresentations and prejudices against Unitarians. The charges against Jesus had been levelled against every reformer or apostle of a new movement throughout the ages. Unitarians had not escaped, and a popular notion about them was that they occupied their time and ingenuity in attacking what other people reverenced, but no greater misrepresentation could be made It was their desire not to destroy anything that was good, true, and noble, or helpful in the religions of the past or the faiths of the present, but to take out of them all that was purest and best, and apply it to their own time. They lived in times of grave doubt and disbelief; the enormous progress of physical science and human thought had changed their whole conception of the universe, with the result that old creeds were crumbling away, and a sense of bewilderment prevailed all around them. Many forms of advice were tendered to mankind, and it was as much a counsel of despair to advise them to cleave to all the old creeds as it was to advise them to reject everything. Unitarians claimed that religion was a necessity of their very being, and they urged the wiser course of rejecting error and superstition, and treasuring the good and true in religion and life, each man to listen dutifully only to his own conscience, to obey it thoroughly and follow reason frankly, fearlessly, and without hesitation. As they studied the best in the teachings of the great religious leaders of the world, and looked around on the wonder and beauty of the world, they found themselves left with a faith still—so uplifting, purifying, strengthening, and ennobling that it gave very life to their life, inspiration to their inspiration. While their forefathers had rejected the perplexities of doctrine and the old Calvinism, they had the example of Jesus to follow and the thoughts and experience of the wise and good in all the ages. They did not pretend to know all about God, but they could not believe that He confined His word and revelation to one people or to only one period in the world's history. The doctrine of the deity of Christ with his bodily resurrection and supernatural powers had passed away, but there was left to them that noble, pathetic, nspiring figure—Jesus of Nazareth, with his deep, tender, patient love for man, and fervent faith in God. The doctrine of the universal fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man remained as pure and ennobling as when it was expounded by Jesus to the fishermen of Galilee, and the personality of Jesus remained as fresh and beautiful as under the old conditions. Unitarians had no antagonism for others, but claimed that in that new church people could worship untrammelled by the fear of any new discoveries. If they had no religion of creed, they had one of character, and they would ever cultivate justice, freedom, and progress, and all that uplifts the human mind, liberates the human will, and ennobles human life.

SOUTH WALES UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

There was a strong muster of ministers present at the annual meetings on July 22 and 23, most of whom contributed their part to make them a success. We noticed among the audience also several orthodox ministers, one of whom took part in two of the discussions.

On Wednesday evening there was a Communion Service, Rev. T. Arthur Thomas conducting, with the help of Rev. John Davies. This was followed by a service with two sermons. On Thursday, duties began early, the Committee of the Association meeting at 8.30 a.m.; a Committee of the Sunday-school branch met at 10.30; and at 11.30 there was a service with a sermon by the Rev. W. James, B.A., J.P. The sermon dealt chiefly with Emerson. We understand it is to appear in the September number of our Welsh magazine. At 2 p.m. the President (Rev. T. Lloyd Jones) delivered his address, in which he dealt, among other things, with the Rev. Rhondda Williams's recent utterances on Unitarianism. This address is also expected to appear in an early number of the Welsh magazine. At 3.30 the Sunday-school Committee met under the Presidency of the Rev. W. J. Phillips, when two papers were read, followed by an interesting discussion. At 7.30 p.m., after the introductory service, the Rev. J. HatHren Davies preached the Association sermon, and the series of meetings was brought to a happy close with a sermon by the Rev. J. Davies, Alltplaca.

At the Committees several important topics were discussed:—(1) A suggestion made at the last quarterly meeting at Oxford, that the Association should publish a hymn and tune book for the use of the Sunday-school, not meeting with sufficient support was allowed to drop. (2) On the motion of the Rev. T. J. Jenkins it was decided to establish a temperance society in connection with the Association. (3) The question of our colleges and the future supply of the Welsh pulpit, after considerable discussion, was adjourned for further consideration at the next quarterly meeting, to be held at Pantdefaid. (4) The Rev. David Rees brought to the notice of the meeting the question of the losses to Unitarianism through leakages. (5) The question of a Welsh handbook of the Bible was deferred.

The Rev. David Evans, Cribyn, will be President for 1903, and the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford, Vice-President.

Copies of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's "Back to Jesus," translated by the Rev. J. Hathren Davies, were offered for sale at these meetings. The Association has just published new editions of papers by the Rev. R. J. Jones and W. James.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Aberdare.—The old meeting-house has just been repainted and otherwise renovated at an expense of more than £100, and on Sunday Mr. Simon Jones, B.A., of the Home Missionary College, Manchester, officiated morning and evening.

Blackpool (North Shore.)—The anniversary services last Sunday were conducted by the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal. His discourse in the morning was upon the words: "Gather up the Fragments." In the afternoon Mr. Mills gave an able address to the Sunday-school scholars and friends on "Building up the Character and Resisting of Temptation." The evening's service was well attended, and the sermon, "Man Shall not Live by Bread Alone," was especially appreciated. Solos were rendered by Miss Bluck and Mr. J. E. W. Dugdale. The offertories were satisfactory.

Boston.—On Saturday, July 25, a party of twenty-four Sunday-school workers from Derby, Ilkeston, Leicester, and Nottingham, met at Boston as an expression of sympathy with the effort to re-establish a Sunday-school in connection with the Unitarian Chapel. After a visit to the old church and other buildings, tea was served, and in the evening a meeting was held in the chapel, when Mr. J. C. Warren, of Nottingham, gave some interesting particulars showing the descent of the present congregation from that which gathered round Dr. John Cotton, once vicar of Boston and afterwards one of the Pilgrim Fathers. Afterwards, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas introduced the subject of "Doctrinal Teaching in our Sunday Schools." In the discussion which followed, opinion differed considerably on details, but almost all considered that it was an imperative duty to teach our children, young and older, what are our principles and why we hold them dear. Hearty votes of thanks for hospitality and to speakers closed a very helpful and enjoyable meeting.

Darlington.—Miss Lucas is one of those who have been invited by the Town Council to join the Borough Education Committee as "outside members."

Dudley.—The Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday, July 26, by Rev. George St. Clair, minister pro tem. The chapel was prettily decorated with flowers, and the children being massed within and about the communion rail added to the pleasing effect. In advancing to their places, they carried bouquets of flowers, and sang a processional hymn. Later, hymns were also assigned to them; and in the evening there was a large attendance of parents and friends to listen. The collections were made by the lady teachers, and amounted to over £5. Teachers, scholars, and friends, it was announced, would enjoy an excursion to the Clent Hills on Saturday, August 1.

Godalming.—The anniversary services were celebrated on Sunday, when, in spite of the stormy weather, good congregations assembled. The Rev. Hubert Clarke preached in the morning. The afternoon and evening services were conducted by the Rev. E. S. Lang-Buckland (of Guildford), who, in the afternoon, gave a discourse on "The Wise Life," and in the evening preached a most interesting sermon on the influence of the working classes on the development of a true theology in Christendom. Between forty and fifty visitors attended tea. The musical portion of the services was greatly helped by the Meadrow String Band, which accompanied the singing and also played selections from Handel's "Samson" and two movements from Mendelssohn's organ Sonata Op. 65 No. III., arranged for strings and organ.

Hale.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held at Hale Chapel on July 19. The preacher was Rev. F. K. Freeston, whose visit gave pleasure to many friends and inspiration to old and young. At the services, held only in the afternoon and evening, the chapel was full, and fine weather enabled all to enjoy the peacefulness of the place. Anthems were sung by the choir, and in the afternoon one of Löhr's "Rest Day Songs" by the children. Part of the evening service was conducted by Rev. A. Leslie Smith. The chapel at Dunham-road, Altrincham, was closed in the evening for the occasion, and the Rev. Dendy Agate and members of that congregation were present at both the services in Hale Chapel.

Horsham.—On Sunday last, at the Free Christian Church, two sermons were preached by the minister, the Rev. J. J. Marten, on behalf of the friendly societies' hospital fund. The morning service was attended by the members of the town Fire Brigade, in uniform, and by the friendly societies' committee. The collections realised about £6.

Hull.—On July 19 the members of Park-street church had the great pleasure of a visit from the Revs. Dr. and Mrs. Crooker, of Ann Arbor, Michigan, in the course of their tour through England. At the morning service Dr. Crooker delivered a very impressive sermon on the modern recognition of the right method to be employed in the endeavour to gain a truer conception of the relation of the soul to God. At the evening service, conducted by Dr. Crooker, Mrs. Crooker, M.A., was the preacher. She spoke with great eloquence of the duty and beauty of self-sacrifice.

Leeds (Mill Hill Sunday School.)—Mr. Thomas Wilberforce, formerly a teacher and superintendent in the above schools, distributed the prizes gained by the scholars in the examinations annually held under the auspices of the Yorkshire United Sunday School Union, to the number of about eighty, in the Priestley Hall, on Sunday last. Mr. Wilberforce, who was very warmly welcomed, alluded to his past connection with the school, and remarked that he had spent twenty-five years in the work of Sunday-school teaching. He gave some excellent practical advice to the young men and young women in the schools, advising them to dearly cherish the simple and beautiful Unitarian faith taught both in school and chapel. It would, if faithfully studied and lived, enable them to become not only worthy citizens, but good Christians. On the proposition of Messrs. Fred. Clayton and Robinson, Mr. Wilberforce was thanked for his services. The Rev. C. Hargrove presided.

London: Highgate.—On Saturday the new hall and other buildings in memory of the late Rev. Robert Spears were opened by Mr. W. A. Sharpe (President of the B. & F.U.A.) in the presence of many members and visitors. Among those who took part were Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, J. H. and Mrs. Crooker, R. H. Greaves, and Messrs. Tremain, Cooper, and Chancellor. Mr. Crooker pointed to the interesting fact that he had succeeded the Rev. J. T. Sunderland (formerly of Highgate) at Ann Arbor, Mich., and the Rev. R. H. Greaves had preceded him at Troy, N.Y. Friends from neighbouring churches added to the success of the meeting, which was full of promise for the future of this active congregation. During the evening a musical programme was carried out under the direction of Miss A. Withall, B.A. Mrs. Crooker took the service on Sunday, and her discourses were much appreciated.

London: Stamford-street, Blackfriars.—On Wednesday the annual exhibition of window plants and domestic handicrafts was held with much success. Nearly a hundred exhibitors took part, and their exhibits were declared most creditable by the judges, who were Mrs. Stanley, Mrs. H. Ballantyne, and Miss Cole, all of Brixton, and Mr. Anderson, gardener to Mr. F. Nettlefold, specially attended to the plants. A large number of prizes and certificates were handed to the exhibitors by Mrs. William Mace. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant presided, and the Rev.

W. Copeland Bowie and Mr. Welch also took part in the proceedings. Credit is specially due to Miss A. Dean and Miss H. Tayler, secretaries of the exhibition.

Northampton.—On Sunday evening last Mr. Harvie took for the title of his sermon "'In the Cross of Christ I Glory'—the Hymn and its Author." A sketch of the life of Sir John Bowring was followed by an exposition of his well-known lines, and it was shown that the surprise often expressed at the fact of a Unitarian composing and Unitarians using the hymn was not at all justified.

Sheffield (Upper Chapel, Appointment).—The Rev. Christopher J. Street, M.A., of Bolton, has accepted an invitation to the pulpit, in succession to the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A. The new minister will enter on his duties here on October 25.

Southend (Resignation.) — Circumstances rendering it necessary for Mr. C. F. Dear to reside at Sandown, Isle of Wight, he has resigned the pastorate of this church, and terminates his ministry on September 6.

Walsall.—On July 19 the Sunday-school anniversary was celebrated, the preacher, morning and evening being the Rev. J. B. Higham, B.A., of Wolverhampton. A special children's service was held in the afternoon, when a very interesting address was given by Mr. J. Davis, of Bescot. All the services were very well attended, and the interesting subjects and the eloquence of Mr. Higham were very pleasing to the congregation.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., acknowledges with thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mrs. F. Nettlefold, £1 1s.; Mrs. Jevons, £1; Mr. and Mrs. Cogan Conway, £1 1s.; Mrs. Boys, 10s.; the Misses Boys, £1; Mr. Roy Mackenzie, 5s.; Holly Hill Guild, £4 4s.

NEW RICHES FROM OLD MINES.

Who would value raw grains if all the arts of milling and preparing them were lost?

Similarly, nuts (which are foods of enormous value) have been unappreciated because the art of preparing them has been neglected.

HUGH MAPLETON, Colonial House, Ardwick, Manchester, is now making from nuts, rich, nourishing, digestible foods. Write to-day for descriptive price lists.

BIRTH.

COOK—On July 25th, at Ullet-road, Liverpool, to Mr. and Mrs. Fredk. Cook, a son.

MARRIAGE.

HIBBERT—HEYWOOD.—On the 27th ult., at Norbury Church, Hazel Grove, by the Rev. G. N. Wilmer, Alan, eldest son of the late John Hibbert, of Brookside, Godley, to Bertha, only daughter of Robert Heywood, of Hyde.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, August 2.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton. Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M.,

Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 7 P.M., Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS.

Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M and 7 P.M., Rev. PHILEMON MOORE, B.A.

Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.

Deptford, Church-street, 11.15, A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. J. MARCHANT.

Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M., Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON.

Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.

Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.

Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, B.A.

Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. H. CROOKER, Morning, "Our Thought of God." Evening, "Applied Christianity."

Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street.—Church closed during August.

Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.

Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.

Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.

Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M., Rev. H. S. PERRIS, M.A., 7 P.M. in Regent's-park.

Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Mr. W. H. SHRUBSOLE, F.G.S.

Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.

Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. S. FARRINGTON.

Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mrs. Crooker "The Unity of the Human Family."

Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.

Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6. 30 P.M

Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, East-hill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Dr. MUMMERY.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M; Rev. J. M'DOWELL.

BEDFORD, Library (side room), 11.15 A.M., Rev. ROWLAND HILL.

BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.

BLACKPOOL, Unitarian Church, Masonic Hall, South Shore, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. W. HAWKES.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. C. C. COE.

BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. LANSDOWNE.

BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET.

CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., Mr. J. REMINGTON WILSON.

DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.

GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. E. RATTENBURY HODGES.

HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. GARDNER PRESTON.

HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. B. MARTEN.

LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. OTTWELL BINNS, of Scarborough.

LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. ERNEST PARRY.

LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth.—No service.

LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. E. PIKE.

OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. Dr. DRUMMOND.

PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.

PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 P.M., Mr. THOMAS BOND.

SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.

SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.

SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.

SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church, Tyler-street, 7 P.M.

TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

WINDERMERE, Albert Hall, Cross-street, 11 A.M., Rev. J. CROWTHER HIRST.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.

WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M.,

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH.

SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F. Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS.

SOUTH-PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.—Aug. 2. at 11.15 A.M.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses. —For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

MICROSCOPES, second-hand, excellent condition, from one-third original cost. Slides, great variety, best makers, from 3s. per doz. Write for particulars, THE NEW AGE PRESS, 8, John-street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

Board and Residence.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged.—Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

BOURNEMOUTH. — ARNEWOOD. En Pension. Grand position in West Cliff-road; sea views; South aspect; close to Winter Gardens, Promenade, and Pier.—Apply, MANAGERESS.

BOURNEMOUTH.— Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH, DEVONSHIRE.

A HOLIDAY RESORT FOR YOUNG LADIES OR SCHOOL-GIRLS, WITH OR WITHOUT CHAPERON.

Charming little Devonshire town. Perfect Sanitation. Sea and Moorland. Bracing air. Walks, excursions, picnics, splendid bathing. Main line G.W.R.

Terms and other particulars from THE PROPRIETOR.

FELIXSTOWE.—Comfortable HOME for Permanent BOARDERS, Adults or Scholars; also APARTMENTS on reasonable terms.—Apply, Mrs. ROBINSON, Kimberley, Ranelagh-road, Felixstowe.

INVALIDS or others received in Lady's old-fashioned country house, high situation, lovely grounds. Pony, cows, and poultry. "Open air" treatment thoroughly understood. Good nursing, every home comfort. Clerical and medical references, also reference may be made to Miss Thornely, High Close, Hampstead.—Apply to CROSLEY, Eynsford, Kent.

ABERYSTWYTH.—Comfortable apartments, or board residence. Well recommended.—Mrs. STEPHENS, Tan-y-graig, Buarth-road.

BOARDING HOUSE.—THE FELL, TROUTBECK, WINDERMERE, is situated 550 feet above sea-level, and about 2½ miles from the station at Windermere. Every home comfort.

NEWQUAY, CORNWALL.— Hazell Mount, Bay View Terrace. Sea and country view. APARTMENTS.—Mrs. VICKERS.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOINSON, Pier-street.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2½% repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES

Purchased and sold for customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Schools, etc.

CHANNING HOUSE, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N.
HIGH SCHOOL for GIRLS
and UNITARIAN BOARDING SCHOOL.
("Recognised" by the Board of Education.)

COMMITTEE OF MANAGEMENT.

F. J. NETTLEFOLD, Esq. | W. A. SHARPE, Esq.
Mrs. BLAKE ODGERS. | Mrs. W. A. SHARPE.
F. PRESTON, Esq. | HAROLD WADE, Esq.
Mrs. WILLIAM WOODING.

Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A. Honours Lond., Head Mistress.

BOARDERS' FEES:

Fifty Guineas a year, and Seat in Chapel One Guinea. Music, Six Guineas extra: or £17 17s. a term: with Music, £19 19s.

Ministers' Daughters £10 13s. 6d. a term, or with Music, £12 5s.

Outside Sanatorium, Laundry at Home, Electric Light. Good Playground and Garden. Tennis, Hockey (in field hired near School).

Opportunities afforded for Sight-seeing, Concerts, &c.

The Terms include Board, Lodging, necessary Laundry, all class lessons up to London Matriculation, Drawing, Class-singing, Physical Drill, Divinity.

Extras.—Music, Shorthand, Type-writing, Dancing, Gymnastics, Cooking.

Day Scholars, 3 to 5 Guineas a term; Music, 1½ Guineas extra. Kindergarten, 2 to 2½ Guineas a term.

Next Term begins Sept. 16th.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN,
NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON
(Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

SINGLETON SCHOOL, DUBLIN
FOR TRAINING GIRLS FOR DOMESTIC SERVICE.

Required in October, or earlier, a Lady of experience and special training in domestic science, to act as Principal of the Singleton School. Salary £60, with board, residence, &c., and assistance in the duties. Apply to Rev. G. H. VANCE, Hon. Sec. to the Damer Governors, Ashfield Park House, Harold's Cross-road, Dublin, &c.

WAVERLEY SCHOOL, 24, HAMILTON ROAD, SHERWOOD RISE, NOTTINGHAM.

PREPARATORY TO THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
HEAD MASTER, Mr. H. T. FACON, B.A.(Lond.).
Next Term begins Wednesday, September 16th.
Prospectus on application. BOARDERS received. Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, Essex House, Campden-hill, W.

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
14 & 15, SOUTH MARINE TERRACE, ABERYSTWYTH.

PRINCIPAL ... MRS. MARLES-THOMAS.

This School is splendidly situated in one of the healthiest parts of Wales, overlooking Cardigan Bay, and close to excellent golf links. Pupils have passed the London and Welsh Matriculation; Cambridge Higher Local; Senior and Junior Cambridge Locals, besides the usual Theoretical and Practical Music Examinations. Scholarships have also been obtained at the Welsh University Colleges.

Gymnasium, Swimming, and excellent Hockey Club.

LIDGETT PARK SCHOOL for GIRLS.
North Park Avenue, Roundhay, LEEDS.

Principals, Miss SHUTE, B.A., and Miss BLOK (Training College, Leyden).

House healthily situated. Boarders taken.

Situations, etc.

SUPERIOR PERSON, age 25, seeks situation as Housekeeper or Plain Cook. Thoroughly trained good references.—M. C., c/o Miss HALE, Hopefield, Honeybourne, Evesham.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17 Mincing-lane, E.C.
Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.
F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.
Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.
STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

TO CHOIRMASTERS.—100 Hymn-Tunes and 10 Chants, by H. W. HAWKES, Waterloo, Liverpool. 6d. nett. Postage, 1½d. per copy.

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.
Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

THE FREEHOLD FARM.
The Garner'd Seed-Corn of all Intuitioned Thought.
INTUITIONISM THE RELEASE OF THE MIND.
46 pp., 8vo.
By F. LINFORD WILSON.
Published by H. SEERIGHT, and obtainable of W. REEVES, 83, Charing Cross-road, W.C.
Price One Shilling.

FREDK. LONG & SON,
AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,
4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

SUSTENTATION FUND FOR THE AUGMENTATION OF MINISTERS' STIPENDS.

The Treasurer acknowledges, with thanks, the following response to the recent Appeal.

	Donations.
Mr. P. J. Worsley, Bristol	£10 0 0
Mr. Charles Harding, Birmingham (with another £5 if necessary) ...	5 0 0
Mr. A. W. Worthington, Stourbridge...	5 0 0
Mr. Edgar Chatfeild-Clarke	5 0 0
	Subscription
Mr. George J. Notcutt, Ipswich ...	1 1 0

EDGAR CHATFEILD-CLARKE, Treasurer,
63, Bishopsgate Street Within, E.C.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD. 27 Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, August 1, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3189. NEW SERIES, No. 293.] LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 8, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 521
ARTICLES—
Arcadia—With Differences 525
Religion and Freedom of Thought .. 526
Haarlem, Leyden, Alkmaar—I. 529
In Praise of Holland—IV. 530
Is there a Gulf? 531
The Homes of Wordsworth—II. 531
The Doway Benedictines 532
LITERATURE—
Mr. Bryce's Biographical Sketches .. 523
Short Notices 523
Articles in the Reviews 524
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 527
LEADER—
The Schools and the People 528
CORRESPONDENCE—
Colwyn Bay Services 527
The Fellowship of the Prophets 527
OBITUARY—
Mrs. L. N. Williams, Aberdare 533
Mrs. Woodhouse, Gorton 533
POETRY—
A Hard Frost 532
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 533
ADVERTISEMENTS 534

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE is something strange in the matter of "The Fellowship of the Prophets," concerning which the Rev. Henry Austin, of Cirencester, sends us a note this week. It will be remembered, no doubt, that the secretaries of the National Conference wrote to us a short time ago (see INQUIRER, July 25) disavowing any connection with what purported to be "The Year Book of the National Conference, compiled by a Council of Ministers, &c." It appears that circulars announcing such a publication were issued, inviting sixpences in advance as the price demanded; and we understand that replies have been received by trustful senders to the effect that the "Year Book" is already "out of print!" Last week we received and published an explanatory letter on the subject from "William Stubbs, Publisher, Chronicle Office, Cirencester." Our minister, Mr. Austin, who, after a pastorate there of nearly forty years, ought to know something of that not very large town, neither knows "William Stubbs" nor the "Chronicle Office." What does it mean?

AMONG the delegates and visitors from America who will attend the meetings of the International Council at Amsterdam, we observe the names of the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., President of the American Unitarian Association; Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D., and Mrs. Crooker, of Ann Arbor; Mr. Edwin D. Mead and Mrs. Mead, of Boston; Rev. Henry W. Foote, of New Orleans; Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford, of Chicago; Rev. N. B. G. Pierce and Mrs. Pierce, of Washington; Rev. A. M. Lord and Mrs. Lord, of Providence; Rev. W. M. Brundage and Mrs. Brundage, of Albany; Rev. G. W. Kent, of Providence; Rev. T. Robjent and Mrs. Robjent, of Laurence; Rev. F. Preston, of Hamilton, Canada; Miss Mary B. Hawley, of Chicago; Misses Fanny and Elsie Field, of Cincinatti; Miss Emma C. Low, of Brooklyn; Miss Lucy Whitlock, Mr. Percy Atherton, and Mr. C. A. Wheeler, of Boston. Rev. M. D. Shutter and Mrs. Shutter, of Minneapolis, will represent the Universalists of America. Rev. John Vischer, of Forsetburg, will represent the Liberal Dutch congregations of the United States.

INCLUDING the official representatives of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, we learn that some 160 delegates and visitors from the British Isles will attend. Ireland, Scotland and Wales will have their representatives as well as England. The hotels named in the circular issued from Essex Hall are now full, but other accommodation may still be provided by people who desire to attend the meetings.

AND where is the next meeting of the International Council to be held? It is whispered that an invitation is almost certain to be offered at Amsterdam to meet two years hence in Switzerland, and Zurich is named as the scene of conference. If so, the "expiatory" process with regard to the death of Servetus will surely be complete. That representatives of absolute freedom in theology and of unbounded brotherhood in religion should meet by express invitation in the land that witnessed that martyr-death, will be one more signal proof that, however slowly, the great Reformation of which Servetus was a pioneer is being accomplished in Christendom.

THE responsibilities of the office of head of the Roman Catholic Church have fallen upon Giuseppi Sarto, Cardinal Patriarch of Venice, who is to be known henceforth as Pope Pius X. Little has been known of him so far in this country, and though honoured in his own, he was not generally supposed to be on the road to the highest dignity. Correspondents of the newspapers describe him as hitherto characterised chiefly by lowliness of mind, and assiduity in the pastoral work. He is said to be much beloved at Venice, and if his portraits do not belie him he is a man of an earnest and sensible temperament, without pretensions to singular genius. That he possesses respectable abilities and consistent force of character seems to be indicated by the fact that he has reached his present high position from quite a humble social origin. He was born in 1835, and his age is therefore much the same as his predecessor's was when he became Pope. Whether he will rival Leo's length of years, however, is a prophecy few would venture to make.

CONJECTURES have been rife as to the probable effect of the new appointment. The French and German parties are said to be consoling themselves respectively by the thought that the other side have lost the victory. The Italians are naturally wistful as to the possibility of a more cordial relationship between the Vatican and the Italian Government. The temporal sovereignty of the Pope appears to be irretrievably lost, and it would appear to ignorant outsiders like ourselves that the man who wished well at the same time for the nation and for the Church would hasten to abolish as far as possible the causes of friction between the spiritual and temporal governors of the country. But nothing is more obvious than the narrow limits within which even an infallible Head of the Church is compelled by his State agents and by the traditions of his office to move. The fancy rests awhile in the pleasant dream of what a wise, good, and noble-minded Christian chief might do, being entrusted with so vast an influence. Then we come back to the fact that no constitutional King is more hedged about by precedents, no despot more dependent upon his tools, than the occupant of "St. Peter's" throne. Within his limits, however, a Pope may do much to prevent the worst evils of the papal system, and, though unconsciously, to encourage those who are working for something better.

AN interesting and suggestive jubilee is to be celebrated in the autumn. It is that of the formation of the National Sunday League, which was largely due to the efforts of a working jeweller, Mr. R. M. Morrell, its secretary for thirty years. The names of Dickens and Huxley were soon enrolled amongst its supporters; and, naturally, prominent Unitarians were not slow to further its object. In half a century a great change has come over the public mind, and while "the week-end habit" of the higher classes has developed so far as to alarm the ecclesiastical mind, it is but a commonplace to say now that museums and art galleries should be opened on Sunday to the toilers in our towns and cities. We are still very far, however, from making as good a use of the week's great Rest-day as we should. Its pleasures are too often toilsome, if not debasing, and its opportunities for higher culture are too often neglected. The next half-century will earn well of history if it witnesses, as we hope it will, a most strenuous endeavour to add knowledge and good taste to liberty, and wisdom to use well the brief Sunday hours.

The forthcoming Centenary celebration of the British and Foreign Bible Society is arousing sympathetic interest among Christians and Bible students of every kind and degree. In a resolution passed by the Wesleyan Conference on the subject, grateful testimony was borne to "the spirit of Christian liberality and large-heartedness by which the administration of the Bible Society has ever been characterised." This admiration is to be further expressed in the form of a collection; similar appreciation will no doubt take a similar form of expression in many of our own churches.

We have received several letters on the "Tariffs" question, taking one side or the other in the very critical debate which is before the country. Our friends must excuse us from extending the discussion in our columns, at any rate at present. There will be no lack of opportunity elsewhere for the ventilation of economic opinions, expert and inexpert; our own special interest centres, we freely confess, not in the expectation of immediate financial loss or gain to this or that section of the community, but in the probabilities of developing good or evil feelings in the national and international field. It is lamentable to us to notice the deterioration of public sentiment in recent years in respect to these aspects of our national life, and we welcome such writers as Mr. W. L. Courtney, who in an article contributed to the Contemporary, puts our own view into admirable language.

Mr. Courtney, believing that Protection is but "unenlightened self-interest," makes a protest against the narrowing of ideals which we refer to. He says:—

I acknowledge, too, the ease with which national pride may be turned into national exclusiveness. In dealing with this aspect of the case, I will, therefore, always put in the first place a condemnation of the root idea of national self-sufficiency. Mr. Chamberlain, in his speech to the Colonial Prime Ministers last year, gloried in the idea, which he admitted could not at present be realised, of a self-contained, self-subsisting Empire. I protest that this ideal is false. Call it Anglo-Saxon, if you will, it is not human. Happily there is no real antagonism between the interests of the British Empire and of the world. Our prosperity is linked with and supported by the prosperity of the nations. The development of inter-dependence between countries is not only a help to the maintenance of peace between them, it is an assurance that the well-being of the inhabitants of each is being continuously augmented, for the growth of commerce proves that the channels of easiest supply are running full to meet the wants of all. In the development of this international division of labour lies the best hope of improving the material conditions of life among the nations.

We commend these wise words to those who have somewhat forgotten, or perhaps despised, the high ambitions of their fathers for the good not only of England, but of mankind at large.

Mr. Michael Sadler, late director of special inquiries for the Board of Education, has been appointed to the Professorship of the History of Education at Owens College, Manchester, to the great satisfaction of many people in the district who are specially interested in education. He received a very hearty welcome at Ancoats Hall, the home of the University Settlement, last week, when he gave an address on "Some Undercurrents of Educational Influence." He spoke of the intimate connection between education and "the vast and menacing problems of modern city life." These problems, he said, are not a series of separate questions, but, as advanced social reformers now recognise, are one problem in various phases; and the relationship of town to country, of these to the nation, of the nation to the whole of society, and of all to mysteries beyond the world, must be viewed in connection with each other. Each reformer, while he specialises and devotes attention to one part of the problem, which he makes his own, must remember the relation of his part to the whole. In education, we need to do the same, bear in mind the connection of physical, mental, and moral development, the acquisition of knowledge, the growth of character, healthy development of body, the service of society, and the unseen realities that lie behind the individual life. Our own special part of the social or educational problem needs revision when we compare it with other parts. The teacher or reformer should "see the parts as parts, but with a feeling of the whole."

To three points Mr. Sadler drew special attention. In studying questions of education, we need to keep in mind, first, that external things have a very great influence, the cheerfulness and unpretending beauty of the school-room, the healthy home, pure air, beauty of form and colour, by which children are greatly influenced, and other aids which unconsciously educate them; secondly, that human influences of affection and cheerful goodwill are even more important; and, thirdly, that the deepest things of all come from an inward source, from some region which lies behind external things, to which the individual spirit has access, and from which comes, through the individual spirit, new light and power of vision and of understanding.

We referred last week to Methodist reunion. It has been pointed out as a difficulty in the way of the organic union of the three Methodist bodies which now are contemplating a closer co-operation that while the Bible Christians and the Methodist New Connexion are bound to send an equal number of ministers and of the laity to Conference, the Methodist Free Churches are entirely free in their choice of representatives to Conference, and are thus able to send a majority of ministers or a majority of laymen. "The quarterly meetings with us are perfectly free to elect all ministers or all laymen," a member of the Free Churches explains. It is probable—we have not statistics at hand—that in practice this theoretic difference does not lead to any important consequences. From a calculation which has been drawn up, the relative increase during the past year of the various bodies of Methodists is as follows:—Wesleyans, not quite 1 per cent.; Primitive Methodists, 1½ per cent.; United Methodist Free Churches, 1¾ per cent.; Methodist New Connexion, 1¾ per cent.; Bible Christians, 2½ per cent.

Thanks to our friends in Nottingham for an example of very practical helpfulness, and for the very generous words of the following note in the August number of the High Pavement and Peas Hill Chronicle:—

From the report of the meetings of the Congregational Council, kindly furnished by the Secretarial Warden, it will be seen that an effort is being made to increase the local circulation of the Inquirer. Interest in our Liberal religious movement must necessarily flag among those who do not take pains to acquaint themselves with what is going on in our spiritual circle. It is the fashion to complain of the dulness of religious newspapers;—as if it were their duty to crackle with the sparks and shocks of smart journalism. It is unreasonable to expect a denominational newspaper, that cannot in the nature of things become a "property" or have a large circulation, to show week by week a coruscation of brilliant articles. Moreover, a serious organ of Liberal religious thought is not the place for dazzling epigrams and sparkling paradoxes. Its work is faithfully to mirror the events and incidents of special interest to our churches, to guide and instruct our thought, and keep us alive to the larger faith of the age. No diligent reader of the Inquirer can honestly say that it fails to do this. We have some acquaintance with religious papers, and have no hesitation in saying that we do not know any penny weekly paper of the kind that maintains so high a standard of strenuous thought and literary excellence as that of the Inquirer. Buy and read!

What the Council has decided is to take a dozen copies of The Inquirer weekly for six months for free distribution to non-subscribers, in the hope of creating a wider interest in our paper.

Cycling members of the Amsterdam party, and other readers of "Rotator Senex's" articles "In Praise of Holland," will be interested in the following extract from a letter received from Professor Eerdmans:—

I see in The Inquirer some remarks on cycling in Holland. Perhaps there will be no time, but we could arrange a cycling trip if people would like it. There is a very good road for cyclists from Amsterdam to Edam and Volendam. We intend to go there on Friday by train, but a part of the people could cycle if they liked. We might also arrange a trip from Arnhem to Dieren, the most beautiful part of Holland. This would take a whole day, by train from Amsterdam to Arnhem and back. . . . The tour recommended by "Rotator Senex," by seashore from Scheveningen to Iimuiden is not very good, as it depends wholly upon the tide whether the shore will give a good cycling path or not. If it is a flood it is impossible to cycle there for the sand.

LITERATURE.

MR. BRYCE'S BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES*

Few pleasanter books have been published recently than this. Our first thought on laying it down is that Mr. Bryce must have a genius for friendship, and has also been singularly fortunate in his friends. The second is one of gratitude for the privilege of being allowed to share his intimacies with him. He has given us twenty studies in all, and he tells us that the subjects of all of them, with the exception of Lord Beaconsfield, were personally, and most of them intimately, known to him. Most of them fall naturally into groups. Dean Stanley, Archbishop Tait, Bishop Fraser, and Cardinal Manning represent the Church; Sir George Jessel and Lord Cairns the Law; Gladstone, Disraeli, Parnell, Robert Lowe, Sir Stafford Northcote the House of Commons. Another group is that of notable historians, J. R. Green, Freeman, Lord Acton; while the world of teachers and scholars is represented by T. H. Green, William Robertson Smith, Henry Sidgwick, Edward Ernest Boyen, and E. L. Godkin. Anthony Trollope occupies a niche by himself, and clearly should have had a fellow novelist to keep him company. It is not an exhaustive list, but it is a very interesting one. Science is notably absent; Mr. Bryce's friends have had for the most part some point of affinity with his special studies and pursuits.

The volume opens with an appreciation of Disraeli from the point of view of a detached critic, and closes with one of Gladstone (much the largest in the book), happily blended. Possibly, for the majority of readers, these two essays will be the most interesting. There is something so enigmatical about both the character and the career of Disraeli, and the authentic information which has been allowed to reach the world since his death is so scanty, that a judicial account, such as Mr. Bryce gives us, is very welcome, even if at the end we have to confess that we are still perplexed. One characteristic anecdote which we do not remember to have seen before is certainly very illuminating. One day, early in his political life, he turned to Mr. Bright as they were leaving the House of Commons and said, "After all, what is it that brings you over here? Fame! This is the true arena. I might have occupied a literary throne; but I have renounced it for this career." The irony of this self-conscious pose in presence of John Bright is delicious. Mr. Bryce's final verdict is worth giving in full:—

"There was nothing in his career to set the example of a lofty soul or a noble purpose. He did not raise, he may even have lowered, the tone of English public life. Yet history will not leave him without a word of admiration. When all possible explanations of his success have been given, what a wonderful career! An adventurer, foreign in race, in ideas, in temper, without money or family connections, climbs, by patient and unaided efforts, to lead a great party, master a powerful aristocracy, sway a vast empire, and make himself one of the four or five greatest personal forces in the world. His head is not turned by his elevation. He never becomes a demagogue; he never stoops to beguile the multitude by appealing to sordid instincts. He retains through life a certain amplitude of view, a due sense of the dignity of his position, a due regard for the traditions of the ancient assembly which he leads, and when at last the destinies of England fell into his hands, he feels the grandeur of the charge, and seeks to secure what he believes to be his imperial place in the world."

We are tempted to linger over the study of Mr. Gladstone. It strikes us as singularly fair and judicial, and will probably retain its value as an independent estimate by the side of Mr. Morley's biography. Readers may, however, be trusted to consider it for themselves, and it is probably only in some singularly benighted regions of political prejudice that its tribute to the essential greatness of his character will be called in question.

It is in some of his minor sketches that Mr. Bryce is most delightful, and among these we should assign the first place to those of J. R. Green, Henry Sidgwick, and Edward Boyen. Green has the volume of his Letters to speak for him. Mr. Bryce amply confirms the impression which they make of his fascinating personality and his genius for conversation, but he adds something of real value to the popular estimate of the man in his analysis of his historical gifts and the high position which he claims for him as an historian.

"Many readers will be disposed to place him near Macaulay, for though he was less weighty he was more subtle, and not less fascinating. To fewer perhaps will it occur to compare him with Gibbon, yet I am emboldened by the opinion of one of our greatest contemporary historians to venture on the comparison. There are, indeed, wide differences between the two. Green is as completely a man of the nineteenth century as Gibbon was of the eighteenth. Green's style has not the majestic march of Gibbon; it is quick and eager almost to restlessness. Nor is his judgment so uniformly grave and sound. But one may find in his genius what was characteristic of Gibbon's also, the combination of a mass of multitudinal details, with a large and luminous view of those far-reaching forces and relations which govern the fortunes of peoples and guide the cause of empire."

From the estimate of Henry Sidgwick we must not cull more than a few of the closing sentences:—

"In his indifference to wealth and fame and the other familiar objects of human desire, in the almost ascetic simplicity of his daily life, in his pursuit of none but the purest pleasures, in his habit of subjecting all impulses to the law of reason, the will braced to patience, the soul brought into harmony with the divinely appointed order, he seemed to reproduce one of those philosophers of antiquity, who formed a lofty conception of nature, and sought to live in conformity with his precepts . . . . When his friends heard of his departure, there rose to mind the words in which the closing scene of the life of Socrates is described by the greatest of his disciples, and we thought that among all those we had known there was none of whom we could more truly say that in him the spirit of philosophy had its perfect work in justice, in goodness, and in wisdom."

It will not be Mr. Bryce's fault if Edward Boyen is not known and appreciated henceforward beyond the range of old Harrovians and professed educationalists. He has given us in the person of his friend a noble vindication of the assistant master; but it must be remembered that Boyen was a man of unusual gifts and extraordinary personal force. He believed that a teacher is born not made, that the modern craze for Pädagogik is largely mistaken, and that games are the most glorious and effective instrument of moral discipline. "There lives more soul in honest play, believe me, than in half the hymn-books," he once said in his half-earnest, half whimsical way. But then he understood boy nature, he liked his boys, and he made them like their lessons. The world of school seemed to him worthy of every gift he could dedicate to it, and it absorbed all his ambition. For a man of his genius all things may be lawful and even edifying, but he may not be a very safe mentor for the average teacher.

Perhaps we may be forgiven a touch of denominational egotism if we say that it has some special interest for us to learn on the authority of Mr. Bryce that there was a time when T. H. Green, feeling himself debarred from taking orders in the Church of England, considered seriously whether he should become a Unitarian minister. We cannot help speculating upon the uplifting influence which he might have had upon our ministry, but no one with any feeling for the work which he did at Oxford can regret that the step was never taken.

W. H. D.

* Studies in Contemporary Biography. By James Bryce. Macmillan & Co. 8vo. pp. ix—487. 10s. net.

SHORT NOTICES.

Rivington Chapel Bi-Centenary 1703-1903. This illustrated souvenir of the recent bi-centenary celebration will be welcomed by many friends who have personal associations with Rivington, and by collectors of the histories of our old chapels. The sermons preached by the Rev. C. J. Street on June 10, and by the Rev. S. Thompson, minister of the chapel, morning and afternoon, on June 14, are here printed in full, with the hymn papers for each service, and a full report of the evening meeting, at which Mr. R. D. Darbishire presided and the Rev. Alexander Gordon gave a valuable historical address. The actual story of the chapel was told in Mr. Thompson's sermons, and Mr. Gordon dealt chiefly with what went before the building of the chapel. The capital fullpage illustrations of the exterior and interior of the chapel, of Lord Willoughby's pew, and the Willoughby monument, are from photographs by Messrs. Wharmley and Thompson, of Liverpool. The frontispiece is a portrait of the present minister. It would have been of still greater interest if portraits of some of the earlier ministers could also have been added, e.g., Ralph Ainsworth (1704-16), Samuel Bourn (1742-

54), Nathaniel Hibbert (1784-1819), J. S. Gilbert (1855-1880). Copies of the souvenir may be had from the Rev. S. Thompson, Rivington, near Bolton, or from Mr. Andrews Crompton, Rivington Hall. (Price, by post, 1s. 3d.)

Dr. John Hunter's impressive address, A Plea for a Worshipful Church, given at the recent meeting of our National Conference at Liverpool, and since published in these columns and in the Proceedings of the Conference is now issued as a little book, with a frontispiece representing the worship in a great cathedral, with "storied windows richly dight." The text of the address is considerably fuller than that given at Liverpool, and two notes are added, one expressing satisfaction that the black gown is coming back into use in the Free Churches of England, in place of the secular dress, which in reading-desk and pulpit "detracts from the dignity of worship"; the other, as follows:—

One sermon, when it is what it ought to be, may be all that anyone should be required to preach or hear in one day; but the sermon does not exhaust the Sunday opportunity. The second service (which is more or less a problem in all churches) might be simply one of prayer and praise, or be used for a kind of discourse which does not make such a demand upon his feelings as the sermon into which a preacher pours, or ought to pour, his whole mind and heart.

Among the additions to the address itself there are also passages dealing with the sermon and the preacher's duty. One of these we will take another opportunity of quoting; another deprecates the prevalent impatience at long services and sermons:—

Every wise minister will avoid prolixity in the services of thought and worship, but he will not allow himself, on the other hand, to be forced by modern restlessness and hate of continuous attention into a brevity which sacrifices impressive worship and the careful treatment of great subjects to the art of flattering people who have abundance of time for social functions, but little time to think and pray.

In another passage Dr. Hunter lays stress on the value of a service which united both free and liturgical prayer, and, in contending for this ideal, cites Baron Bunsen as on his side. As to liturgical forms, beautiful and helpful as they are, they must not be stereotyped. "I am unwilling to believe that liturgies saturated with mediævalism are the only ones which our religion can produce." (J. M. Dent & Co., 1s. net.)

In a series of little "Books of Stimulus," well printed in large type and tastefully bound, we have received two helpful addresses, The Life with God, an Address to Business Men, by the late Phillips Brooks, and Huxley and Phillips Brooks, an Address to Theological Students at the Oberlin Seminary, and elsewhere, by Professor W. Newton Clarke, D.D. Dr. Brooks's address was given in March, 1891, in Boston, and is an earnest and straightforward religious appeal; the other reprinted from the Bibliotheca Sacra, is largely occupied with biographical sketches of Huxley and Brooks, based on the Lives then (1901) recently published, contrasting the attitude of the two men towards religion, Huxley "interpreting existence in terms of the cosmic order," Brooks "by the methods of the personal life," finding spiritual facts the most real, love, trust, righteousness, aspiration, purity, such as could only exist in man where eternal goodness is the source of all. (H. R. Allenson, 1s. net, each.)

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

"The Liberal Movement in the Church of England," is the title of a lengthy article in this month's Contemporary Review. The author, the Rev. John Verschoyle, enters into a detailed defence of Dean Fremantle in regard to the recent "Virgin Birth" discussion. In the course of the article we are furnished with a statement by the Dean, supplied at Mr. Verschoyle's "pressing request," showing explicitly what he meant by saying in a letter to the Bishop of Ripon that he had attempted to explain "how we might understand without any violation of biological law the words of the Apostles' Creed, and the words of St. Luke's Gospel" in reference to the Virgin Birth. We must refer the reader to the pages of the Review for the Dean's ipsissima verba—an important matter, as events have proved. It must, however, suffice here to say that he appears to us to range the stupendous event referred to strictly along the line of "parthenogenesis," as observed in certain organisms. With regard to the vexed question of fidelity to the standards subscribed by the clergy, Mr. Verschoyle's article, as might be expected, takes the view that "new meanings" must as inevitably attach to the creeds, as new critical opinions have arisen with regard to the Scriptures. He says:—

As a matter of fact, it may be safely said that no well-educated clergyman or well-informed layman recites it (i.e., the Apostles' Creed) in the natural sense it bore fifty years ago. Take, for example, the words, "Maker of Heaven and Earth." The great majority of educated clergymen who recited these words fifty years ago gave a certain definite sense to them, believing that the "making" was a making out of nothing and was the work of six days of normal duration. Do any of them believe that now? Has no new meaning been infused into the words by the progress of physical science and the general acceptance of the doctrine of evolution?

Mr. Verschoyle asks similar questions with regard to other articles of the Creed, and then says:—

The old literal meaning, no doubt, survives in large numbers of simple people, a fact which illustrates the inevitable necessity for——

For what? Surely, for those who know better to leave off paltering with words in a double sense. Surely, a "necessity" for diligent and incessant endeavours to enlighten these "simple people" as to the truth. No; all that there is "inevitable necessity for," in this writer's opinion, is "freedom," i.e., laxity in the use of words, a laxity which enables the learned and the simple to stand side by side and recite the same Creed in fundamentally opposed senses. He pleads hard, and not without dexterity. He says:—

The truth is that old formulæ must either become completely obsolete and be laid aside, or, if reverence for the men who framed them and the men who used them in the past, and affection for the words themselves with their associations, induce us to retain them, they must, owing to the progress of knowledge, inevitably change their meaning. . . . We all speak in everyday life of sunrise and sunset, using old language, in its natural sense obsolete, but infusing it with new and scientific meaning, obviously not its natural meaning.

Yes; but we do not stand up in a solemn act of worship and say, "I believe the sun rises upwards, and sinks down again." We do not exclude from public duties, like those of the teacher in elementary schools, persons (if there be any) who refuse to use unscientific phraseology. We know that our Broad Church friends would be among the first to relieve the conscientious Unitarian from the penalties attaching to veracity in theological speech; but so long as they consider it excusable, and even creditable, to use solemnly declared formulæ in "non-natural" senses they are hindering the very reformation which we are sure they long to see. But we must refer readers to the article itself. In the same Review a criticism of Leo XIII. is given, not of the most flattering nature. The other articles call for no further comment than to say that Mr. Leonard Courtney's on "Mr. Chamberlain's Balloon" strikes us as one of the most trenchant of the many exposés of that statesman's latest development that we have seen.

In the Nineteenth Century the fiscal debate looms large, and, whether by accident or intention, the articles concerned with it are chiefly in favour of the new departure. Of these the most remarkable, to use a mild term, is Mr. M. Maltman Barrie's, who deals with "Free Trade and Protection from the Workman's Point of View." He observes that the leaders of the workers' unions are declared opponents of "Protection," but he thinks the workers themselves will show themselves wiser than their leaders. Did they not support Mr, Chamberlain's war policy in spite of the opposition of their spokesmen? No doubt; but whether as wiser than their leaders or as more foolish and more easily beguiled by specious offers of "national glory" may at least be debated. An article by Edith Sellers on "A Papal Conclave" unearths some seventeenth century scandal that might, for all we care, be buried in dust a foot thick. After all, the enemies of the papal system need not go so far back, or into so murky an atmosphere. Is not the real character of these negotiations revealed in the Life and Letters, by a Catholic, of Cardinal Manning? Mr. C. F. Lehmann brings to mind, in a striking article, our debt to Babylonia. A graceful portrait of Dr. Jowett is hinted rather than sketched in some fragmentary "Recollections" of the "Master," by Cornelia Sorabji.

The most singular thing in the Monthly Review is an irregular unrhymed poem, hitherto unpublished, by William Blake—at least so it is judged to be. The "Free Traders" speak out strongly in the persons of Mr. Henry Hobhouse and Mr. Hugh Bell; and Lord Rosebery prefixes to a chapter from Tomline's "Pitt" a criticism of that biographer's work, not much to its credit.

To Correspondents. — Letters, etc., received from:—C. A. M. B.; R. T. H.; F. J. F. J.; R. J. J.; W. S.; J. M. L. T.; H. T.; S. G. T.; F. L. W.; W. W.; F. W. E.

ARCADIA—WITH DIFFERENCES.

By Mary Ralph.

Our hamlet is without doubt the most unpicturesque group of cottages in England. We are new, for one thing; we are all of red brick and blue slates; and our houses, put up for us by rival "builders and undertakers," are as much alike as if the rivals were twins. They are all of the German toy-box order of architecture—the only order our builders ever knew. Such as they are our roads are straight, and we all stand four-square to them, without a trace of architectural coyness or bashfulness about us. All around us, in the distance, visible from every point on every road, stand beechwoods, the lineal descendants of primeval forest. But we are on a wide clearing, with few trees, and no hedges of any respectable age to soften our colouring or break our outlines.

We are not the result of anybody's fad or ideal, nor of any movement, except, may be, of great world movements, of which we are as unconscious as that the earth moves in its orbit. A neighbouring landowner was willing to sell certain fields "in plots of from a quarter of an acre to ten acres," and we were eager to buy, and able to do it, on the terms he gave us. Not one of us has ever dreamed of aspiring to a domain of the larger limit. The work of a man's hands, even when helped by the labour of a woman's, doesn't so readily produce a great landowner as that! Ten acres! One only of us has got so much as three, and though he has a horse his cow is still to seek. A few "managing" families have secured an acre; but the majority of us are content to add sod to sod until we have half or quarter that amount.

When the ground was bought we were ready to begin the long struggle towards a house of our own. We toiled and slaved over each bit of garden, after working hours, for years, perhaps, before we could put up anything except a shanty for tools. We sold our garden produce, contributing to the maintenance of the local carrier by sending it to the nearest town in his van; we worked for one another, and for the gentry round; we kept hens and pigs, and made them pay; we drank hop beer and parsnip wine, made by "the missis," instead of the publicans' beverages; we toiled, and slaved, and scraped, adding shilling to shilling and pound to pound, until at last there came a day never to be forgotten, when the ruddy builder stood on our ground with his hands in his pockets, directing the taking out of the foundations of our house. He had no plan in his pocket with his hands. You don't want a plan for scraping a road or hemming a handkerchief. A trench is dug six good inches deep, marking out a square; and up go the walls to fit the door, and window-frames, already made by machinery, and carefully notched and marked so that our builder can make no mistake.

What a pleasure it was to look forward to the house all those years! How we delighted to price timber and bricks and slates whenever we had the chance! We knew to a nicety how much our house should cost with our own labour thrown in, and every one of us can tell of some wonderful bargain which we lighted upon to cheer our enterprise. There was that derelict range, picked up for seven shillings in an ironmonger's yard, which does excellent work in one of our kitchens; that lot of carpet felt, given by a family removing from a big house, which lines the iron roof of one of our stables—and similar instances of good luck. At last the house stood roofed in, with blinds and curtains all complete; and as we turned homewards from work and caught the light in the lower left-hand window we had to shake the tools in the frail upon our shoulders to be certain that it wasn't all a dream.

Our houses are all alike, did I say? What a mistake! You, tearing along on a bicycle, caring only to avoid our puddles or make a record, might think so; but we know better. We see differences and distinctions. Several of us have porches, some with the door flush with the outer corners of the porch, others modestly retiring to the level of the house wall. Our red brick is varied by white or grey ones, arranged in bands or double compasses, or criss-crosses. One loyal owner had his fancy bricks arranged in diamonds to commemorate our late Queen's second Jubilee. A few of us boast verandahs. There are bay windows and flat windows, and one house has a wonderful round panel in the door. All the hamlet smiled when one ambitious neighbour had a letter-box put in, and we said to one another, "It gets more like London every day." And what can you call it but a distinction if you have in your midst a garden with two flagstaffs? They are a source of pride and interest to every one in our primitive, inland region, and when the minister spoke of them as "two tall posts" we resented the slip in our mild way, out of regard for The Handy Man who owns the house, and is such an invaluable neighbour.

"'Posts,' indeed! Did he never notice the flags flying from them?" we said. "Not at Coronation time? Nor, only half way up, when the old Queen lay dead? 'Posts!' 'e might a'most as well have said pea-sticks!"

As for our interior diversities, they seem to begin and end with the want or the possession of a handrail to the stairs, which always goes straight up between the front kitchen and the "front room"—a subtle term for an enclosure never sat in, and sacred to funerals, prayer meetings, and the safe keeping of the family's Sunday hats. We boast but few handrails. Where they appear there is always some story connected with them of a lucky chance or of touching reminisences, as in the case of the widow at the end of the road, who tells you with mournful tenderness that her dear departed husband's first wife was an invalid and he had the rail put up for her.

Our calls, which are of angelic brevity and fewness, are paid and received in the garden or at the front gate. Our social intercourse otherwise is limited to the amenities of the carrier's van when we go to town; to the whispered interchange of news at a Dorcas meeting, or before the week-night service; or as we "pass one another out" or on our way to and from church or chapel

Yes; we are new and ugly, and jerry-built. It is hard to believe that the men and women who built the picturesque beam cottages in neighbouring ancient villages, and the old farmhouses scattered over all our rolling woodland district, were our ancestors. As Lowell's farmer stalked over his fields, asking "Where's Peace?" I find myself going about my daily work, asking, Where's Beauty? Where is the artistic sense, the feeling of fitness which wedded the ancient building so harmoniously to its surroundings, the love of good workmanship and the ability to execute it, which formed, we must suppose, a part of English rural character in days gone by? These things have gone from us, gone with the old times, perhaps no more to see a resurrection than will they.

But even as we stand we have our compensations. The sunlight floods our rooms in a way uncoveted by our forefathers, nestling in deep-wooded hollows; and impossible to them by reason of the hideous window tax. Our gardens give a variety and a plenty to our food such as older generations only pictured in the dreams of starvation fever. The space within each little house is sufficient for decency, for womanly self-respect, for lives of human love and devotion. There is room in each for the soul to find itself and to find God.

Then the sense of ownership is slowly changing our ways and our characters. The man who danders over a field all day at the rate of immemorial custom, works like a colonist in his own garden of an evening. The woman who used to think that waste was the dignity of a big kitchen is now so thrifty that she throws her floor-sweepings to her hens. We grumble occasionally still at the parson or the parish if either of them think too well of our prosperity; and perhaps our last token of complete regeneration will be independence of their help. But we plod along from day to day, even in extreme old age and feebleness, cheered when things are at the darkest by the thought, "Of course, there's always the bit of ground and the house." We mean our own house. We die at home, and our children bury us, and renew the wreaths upon our graves.

There is no plutocratic and benevolent employer to arrange our amusements and instruction. There is no landlord to dictate our votes, and no great lady to devise a pretty uniform for our children. So far from that, it is a distinct concession if such girls as go to confirmation all wear caps of one pattern. We like to observe our own minds in sumptuary as well as in all other matters. We are only free; and free largely by our own efforts.

Lastly, we have become honest. An ancient proverb said of our neighbourhood, "If you beat a bush it's odds but you start a thief"; but we are so honest now that timid lowland strangers are amazed.

Our fruit lies open to every neighbour's child, but hangs untouched till we gather it ourselves. Coal is never under lock and key by day or night—indeed, we don't always put ourselves under lock and key at night; it is just as it happens. The woodman's pile of seductive logs, ready to be retailed at three a penny, and his heap of chips for kindling, stand un fenced close by the road, all the year round; and he would not risk a chip for half an hour. There is a "week-end" cottage in our midst, which, of course, is uninhabited for days together, when its owner is in town. We all know where its key lies hid. The charwoman knows, and does the odd jobs in the cottage at her leisure. The carrier knows, and takes the goods he is instructed to bring to town, replacing the key in its hiding place. But nobody else "meddles or makes" with key or cottage or garden. Why should we? Nobody has anything which we haven't got a little better ourselves, or which we cannot buy if we want it: We know and respect the effort which secured them their portion; they know and respect ours.

* * * *

So, sometimes, thinking of what environment has done for these neighbours of mine, I ask myself, in the words of Joseph Wood, "Who can tell what man will be when all the conditions are gracious, when the long ages with their varied disciplines have done their work of refinement, when the ape and the tiger are worked out of our blood . . . ?" And I find myself longing to see what might be made of English men and women if we could lure them back to the country, give them again their love of England, teach them her history and her noble traditions as living realities. If only we could add to our freedom a wider intelligence, to our religion a more penetrating morality, and to our independence and industry a horror of shams and makeshifts, and a power to see and to love the best!

There is the power of an endless hope in the words, "It doth not yet appear what we shall be."

RELIGION AND FREEDOM OF THOUGHT.*

BY THE REV. JAMES HOCART.

Circumstances have strongly impressed upon me the importance of the reconciliation of religion and freedom of thought. My ministry has now extended over nearly thirty-nine years. Except for the four first years, which I spent at Lausanne as my father's assistant, I have constantly laboured in Roman Catholic countries, and for the greater part of the time entirely among people who were Catholics by birth. Thus situated, I have perpetually experienced that the doctrine of a religious authority, either ecclesiastical or biblical, constitutes a most serious obstacle to the progress of religion. With regard to believing Catholics, I have found it impossible to convince them of their errors and superstitions because of the refuge which, when pressed by any argument or difficulty, they sought under the shelter of the supreme authority of the Church: "The Church has spoken, and as her faithful children, we submit humbly to her teaching." On the other hand, when as a Methodist preacher, during the first period of my ministry, I endeavoured to re-awaken faith in the souls of Catholics who had renounced all religion, I was nonplussed at the outset by this declaration: "We are determined to think freely, and you want to bind us to the authority of the Bible; we refuse to be shackled by any pre-established dogmas whatever." The force and frequency of this objection led me to study for myself the question of authority, and the result was such as to break down the last support of certain doctrines which offended my reason and conscience, and to lay upon me as a duty, a painful duty, the separation from Methodism and orthodoxy in general.

But even after my acceptance of the principles of an utterly free Christianity, I did not get rid of the practical difficulties connected with this subject of authority, but was, and am still, hampered in my work by the wide-spread belief that the whole of Protestantism eschews free thought and imposes doctrines grounded on the formal authority of scriptural texts. In Belgium and in France, the grand name of free-thinker is the monopoly of people outside of religion—positivists, materialists, atheists. A short time ago, an eminent Paris professor, M. Gabriel Séailles, in a discourse in which he spoke of Jesus in the most glowing terms, yet maintained that all positive religions are intolerant, not by accident, but by essence. When a man, he said, is convinced that he is in possession of absolute, supernaturally revealed truth, the temptation is strong to impose it upon the rebellious minds who refuse this heavenly gift.

The perniciousness to Christianity of this too common opinion, that the authoritative enforcement of dogma is inseparable from religion, will easily be understood by those who have observed how deeply the modern non-ecclesiastical mind is imbued with Descartes' principle, that the only criterion of truth is its own intrinsic evidence. The opposition of the modern mind to a creed founded on any sort of authority seems to me so unconquerable, that I should despair of the future of religion if I were convinced that there is an indissoluble connection between Christianity and the doctrine of the authority of a Church or book.

But I take the contrary view, and I consider that it is a most important element of the world-mission of Unitarianism to destroy this injurious prepossession by offering practical and living proofs that it is possible to hold certain religious and Christian doctrines and principles—and I cannot imagine, and would not care to belong to, an association or Church without doctrines and principles: I need something to believe and teach ardently, passionately—and yet to hold these doctrines and principles, not because they are written, but simply on their own rational and moral evidence, just as any other kind of truth. That is what you are doing; and, therefore, those Continental Liberal Protestants, who like myself will never sell at any price any atom of their dearly purchased freedom of thought, and who, on the other hand, notwithstanding the errors, superstitions, hypocrisies, and persecutions which have tarnished the fair name of religion, cannot eradicate from their inmost souls the belief in a universal, physical, and moral order, and in a living, infinite, and beneficial principle of that order, therefore, I say, they offer their respectful and heartfelt homage to this and other kindred associations, as devoted and efficient workers in the cause of the reconciliation of religion and free-thought everywhere, but particularly in Roman Catholic lands.

Some years ago, called to the bed-side of a dear friend who was dangerously ill, I employed the sad time of watching in the preparation of a lecture on this same subject, the alliance between religion and liberty. One evening, overcome by fatigue, I fell into a light sleep, and as I slumbered a sort of vision passed before my mind.

I thought I saw two women, both tall and beautiful, one haughtier in her mien and statelier in her carriage, the other of more ardent visage and more impetuous gesture. At first, their features were convulsed with passion, and they exchanged wrathful looks and threatening words. And I understood, as one understands such things in dreams, that the names of these two women were Religion and Liberty.

"Often hast thou oppressed and crushed me," said Liberty. "See on my wrists and ankles the marks of the iron bonds with which thou hast enslaved me. At last the hour has come which restores me to myself; the last link of my last chain is broken. There it is; lo, thou hast what is thine. Henceforth I know thee not, thou harsh and narrow-minded despot."

And Religion answered back with scorn: "Go thy ways, and err and stray at thy will and whim. I despise thee. Without me, without the supreme law which I proclaim, thou canst never become aught else but Licence."

Then I thought I saw a young man drawing near. His long auburn hair fell upon his shoulders; his face was pale and worn, despite his youth; his countenance was mild, but a strange fire burnt within his eyes. When he stretched forth his hand, I saw on it a scar. There shone no halo around his brow, but when I saw him I knew him at once, and my heart beat wildly as with the joy of meeting a never seen but much and long loved brother-man.

"Peace, be still," he said, in accents of incomparable tenderness and power. "You are sisters, daughters of the one Father God. Thou, Religion, thou teachest the divine law, but it is a law of liberty; it seeks to draw and not to drive; to be loved and not submitted to perforce. Thou, Liberty, wouldst thou be without a noble purpose and without the inspiring rule of purity, justice, and mercy? O Religion, unbend, and O Liberty, forgive. Be ye reconciled, I beseech it of you, by all the sufferings I endured on Calvary to ransom the faith of the future from the yoke and burden of the past."

They looked at one another and hesitated. And it seemed to me that, full of anguish, I cried out in a faltering voice: "Be reconciled, be reconciled, for the sake of mankind, which needs you both, and is waiting, hoping, longing to see you one."

At last they extended the hand of

* An address at the Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Whit-week.

friendship, and smiled sweetly on one another; and I saw them, closely linked in loving embrace, and growing taller, more beautiful, more majestic than ever, vanish slowly in the distance till at last they disappeared, lost in the unapproachable light in which dwelleth the unspeakable God.

And I awoke, and behold it was only a dream. But it is a dream which this and other sister associations and all free Christian and Liberal Protestant Churches are turning day by day into an actual and glorious reality.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

COLWYN BAY SERVICES.

SIR,—May I presume on your valuable space to explain that we have begun summer services at Colwyn Bay, but that this year we have been beset by an unusual number of difficulties; first, in the way of our getting the use of a hall; second, in regard to effectively advertising the services; and third, and most important at the moment, in making provision for the musical part of the services. We cannot get a volunteer pianist among the Colwyn residents. Will some friends, or friend, among our Unitarian visitors now at that place, or at Rhos, come to our assistance? Last year we found helpers who gave us excellent assistance in that way, and I feel sure there must be some who could help us again. The services are at 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M. in the Public Hall, Conway-road. A post-card from anyone willing to help will give pleasure to

W. R. SHANKS,
Secretary, Missionary Conference.
7, Hope-street, Higher Broughton,
Manchester, August 4, 1903.

'THE FELLOWSHIP OF THE PROPHETS."

SIR,—As I have received various inquiries for information concerning the so-called "Conference Year Book," will you permit me to say that I know nothing whatever of such a publication. I have never heard of any William Stubbs, publisher in Cirencester, nor of any "Chronicle office" in the town. If the book has appeared I have never seen it, and know nobody who has, though several tell me they have sent in the 6d. required. —Yours truly,

HENRY AUSTIN.
Cleeve Hill, Cirencester, Aug. 4.

[IN Mr. Wicksteed's letter last week reference was made by mistake to Mr. Weatherall. It should have been Mr. Whitaker.—Ed. INQUIRER.]

IN a valiant suffering for others, not in a slothful making others suffer for us, did nobleness ever lie. Every noble crown is, and on earth will ever be, a crown of thorns.
Carlyle.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE LOFOTEN FISHERMEN.

I WONDER if I can give you any idea of the grandeur and interest of this wonderful land in which I am now travelling. If you look at the map of Norway, you will see, about three-quarters of the way up, stretching out from the North of the Vest Fjord, a group of islands, broad at the north, where they join the mainland, and tapering away to the south, where they stand further out to sea. These are the Lofoten Islands, and they are about 180 miles long, and about 60 miles wide at the broadest part. They are of the most wonderful and curious shapes you can imagine. The more northerly ones lie close together, with some of the mountains coming almost sheer down to the water, leaving quite narrow openings in between, so that as the steamer glides along, and twists in and out, and round the headlands, now to one side, now to the other, it seems a wonder how the sailors can possibly find their way through such a perfect maze. But, bewildering as the way seems to a stranger, the channel is well shown to those who understand it, by marks on the rocks, and by lights, which, of course, at this season of constant daylight are not needed; but in the winter it would be impossible to navigate these waters safely without them, and though they are not so much to look at as the lighthouses that surround England, the lights up in these northern latitudes are better suited to this country. They are oil lamps, and they hold enough oil to burn for eight days without refilling, so every week, except during the summer months, each lamp is visited, trimmed and re-filled, and left to burn night and day for another week, doing quietly just the work it has to do in the world, though no one is there to see it; but, small and insignificant as its light seems, guiding and helping many a fisherman and sailor out on the dark winter sea. For at certain seasons of the year, the fishing round about these islands is a very important business, and from January to April every year, occupies about 30,000 men. In the long, dark winter, while there is still no sun to be seen, even in the middle of the day, the fishermen collect in the Vest Fjord from the whole of the west coast of Norway, for that is the season when the fish are most numerous here, and sometimes one boat will catch in a season as many as 6,000 cod. The fish are carried ashore, cleaned, and spread out to dry, tied together in pairs by the tails, and hung out on wooden frames, and when they are ready, they are packed together in big bundles, and sent nearly all over the world.

But where do you suppose the fishermen live while they are attending to the land part of their work—the cleaning and the drying of the fish? Well, all round the little harbours are collections of small wooden huts, consisting of only two rooms; the outer room is used for stores of wood, &c., and the inner room is where they live. Each hut accommodates four or six men; their sleeping berths are arranged, as they generally are on board ship, one over another; the room has a window at each side, a table and benches, and in the middle a stove, where they do their cooking. Each household chooses its own captain, and they live very peaceably together. But there is a very sad side to the life also, for in the winter season in which they do their work, great storms arise among the islands, the men in their boats are in great danger, and every year there are many lives lost; in a great storm about ten years ago, 140 lives were lost in one night. The fishing boats are not large, and are easily capsized, and when this happens, all that the men can do is to stick their knives into the upturned bottom of the boat, and hold on till they can hold on no longer, or until they are seen and rescued by the men on another boat. This capsizing of the boats happens so frequently, that the keels of some of them are fitted with handles for the men to cling to, in case of accident. Some of the fishing villages have a larger and safer boat, called a rescue boat, which is always kept ready for the sea, and whenever a storm arises, the rescue boat goes out, and sails up and down, rescuing any of the men whose boats may have foundered or capsized. Until lately, there was no such boat belonging to this village of Svolvær, but a few years ago, an Englishwoman named Miss Harvey, who has travelled a great deal, and who very often comes here for the summer, gave a sum of money, equal to half the cost of providing a rescue boat. The rest of the money necessary was soon collected, and the boat was built in the south of Norway, and sent north to begin her work of mercy. That work began sooner than was expected, for on her way to the Lofoten Islands, she met with an English ship which had been wrecked, and the rescue boat saved every life on board. I can imagine the thankfulness that Miss Harvey must have felt, when she heard of this happy start in life of the boat which had been in great part her gift to the poor fishermen of the Lofoten Islands; and the good work did not end there, for every year since then the rescue boat has saved many lives.

The fishermen are a hardy race, and they are brought up almost from their very babyhood to feel at home on the water; it is wonderful to see how cleverly even the very small children manage the boats, in which they are allowed to go out quite by themselves.

Perhaps some other time I can tell you more about these wonderful islands, with their giant peaks and their snowfields, and the beautiful flowers and ferns and mosses covering the rocks close down to the water's edge. All that is so wonderful and beautiful here, makes one think of the Giver of all good.

Thou art, O God, the Life and Light
Of all this wondrous world we see;
Its smile by day, its glow by night
Are but reflections caught from Thee;
Where'er we turn, Thy glories shine,
And all things fair and bright are Thine.

O. M. RAWLINS.

THERE are nettles everywhere,
But smooth green grasses are more common still;
The blue of heaven is larger than its cloud.
Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom, or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, AUGUST 8, 1903.

THE SCHOOLS AND THE PEOPLE.

THE Education policy of the present Government is now practically embodied in the statutes. It is a policy which, so far as may be judged from parliamentary proceedings, was but imperfectly thought out by its promoters. And yet Unionists cannot be said to have come to the problem without experience. Their first attempt at education reform, in 1896, was an egregious failure; and they were wise enough to learn something from it. Their next step was the very simple one of providing more funds for the privately managed sectarian schools. This well-intended remedy for evils that were but too obvious having done but little after all to put right the manifold defects of our educational system, Mr. BALFOUR'S Government addressed itself anew to the subject. Our readers know with what result. They know that, no longer content with increasing the imperial subsidy to the sectarian schools, they decided to put them on the rates. At the same time, with a sweeping indiscrimination, they changed the old School Board system for one in which popular education is made a branch of the local government effected through the County Councils.

We have not hesitated to speak our mind upon much that has happened in this line of legislation. We have protested, and we still protest, against surrendering into the hands of private managers one of the most responsible duties of the community at large. We have denounced the flagrant breach of principle involved in depriving the public of that control that should accompany the expenditure of public funds. We have renewed the remonstrance, familiar to our fathers, against the imposition, by fresh legislation, of religious tests upon employees of the State. And we have deplored, as all who are at all familiar with our city life must deplore, the extinction of those great School Boards whose work in the elevation of the masses of the people has been one of the finest and most productive in the history of our country.

We cannot be expected, therefore, to accept the new enactments, now completed, in a grateful spirit. Setting aside our resentment at the spirit of levity—it cannot be pure maliciousness—which entered upon so great a task with so little preparation, and postponing, as we must, the Parliamentary effort to redress as many as possible of the evils perpetuated in these Acts, it is clearly our duty as citizens to see what good can be secured under the system that has been so bunglingly set up. The friends of education, whatever their party preferences or particular verdicts on the recent legislation, must certainly unite to work the Acts for all that they are worth. It would be poor spite to stand aside churlishly and let the children pay in an impoverished or ill-directed education for the mistakes of legislators. Within the four corners of Acts of Parliament, a good deal of scope can usually be found by determined and sagacious minds. We trust that our own people will be now, as ever, to the fore in accepting such administrative duties as they can, and in furthering the advantages while they mitigate the disadvantages of the situation.

In order to defeat the reactionary forces, the existence of which is no less a certainty than a scandal, we must do all in our power in the forthcoming municipal and council elections to press the claims of the schools upon the candidates; to open the eyes of the average business man to the enormous importance of cultivating the best intelligence of the rising generation; and to diffuse far and wide a sense of those great principles of civil and religious liberty, whose battle we thought was almost wholly won. Some of our friends, we know, will also feel it their duty, as men faithful to conscience, openly to resist the violation of constitutional principle which is involved in applying public money to the interests of private sects. Others, shrinking from "passive resistance" as a somewhat dangerous weapon, the use of which can only be justified in an extremity which at present they do not feel, will pay their rates after declaring their mind on the subject. The decision in such cases must obviously lie with the individual; and we, at least, are assured that Unitarians, who have never shrunk from the responsibilities incurred alike in action and inaction, will, each for himself, take their own line. The one thing to be urged is that not a single man or woman of us, whatever our view on this particular point, will neglect the effort to grapple, as a practical citizen, with the stupendous problem of administration. Let us put forward our best men, and give them our best support. A generation ago we took no unworthy share in modelling the system which has been abolished with so ill-advised a haste. We stand at the point of a new departure. Let us count for something here also.

And, above all, the present hour is one in which the most determined effort of which we are capable should be made to raise our own modest contribution towards the religious education of the people up to a more creditable level. We often speak disparagingly, and not a whit too much so, of what passes for religious instruction in many of the schools—hazy history, fragmentary geography, muddled mythology, and parrot repetitions. These are poor stuff indeed on which to feed the young mind; yet it is these that make up the bulk of so-called "Bible teaching" in the public elementary schools. The best part still lies, and ever must lie, in the hands of the true and loving teacher, for lack of whom, and not for lack of strictly trained theological experts, the results in the life of the rising generation are so poor. What have we specially to offer by way of help toward better things?

We have our churches with their atmosphere—pace our Anglican friends—of intelligent frankness in matters intellectual, steadfast dutifulness and insistence on character, and a lowly, unpresuming, reverent mind. We are happy to know that many a teacher in the public schools feels this atmosphere to be more congenial and helpful than much presented elsewhere. It should be our aim to attract and to strengthen the teachers, to impart the general tone of our own best and wisest teaching to them, to encourage them to maintain an honest attitude before their sectarian inquisitors, and above all to exhibit in the results of their influence on the scholars the potency of an enlightened faith.

We have also our Sunday schools; some of them very poorly equipped indeed, and some about as slovenly carried on as they well could be. What shallow stuff it is that some of us talk when earnest Churchmen say: "Where will the children learn any religion if not in the day-school?" The glib reply is: "In the home and in the Sunday-school," when we know very well that the conditions of many homes are not favourable to direct religious instruction; and as to the "Sunday-school," how few really, in most of our churches, take a working interest in them? Let us clear our minds of cant, and our lives of hypocrisy. Our dear friend, Dr. BROOKE HERFORD, entitled his last book "The Small End of Great Problems," and in it he very wisely reminds his readers of the practical lines on which to attack things that would daunt us in the bulk. Here are the "small ends" of this greatest of all national problems—how to bring up a race of good and clever citizens. Let us earnestly take hold of our immediate duties.

HAARLEM, LEYDEN, ALKMAAR.

I.

"HAARLEM, Leyden, Alkmaar—names hallowed by deeds of heroism such as have not often illustrated human annals—still breathe as trumpet-tongued and perpetual a defiance to despotism as Marathon, Thermopylæ, or Salamis."

So writes Motley in the "Rise of the Dutch Republic." On the eve of the meeting at Amsterdam, let us refresh our minds with the story of their heroic struggle. It is not as a mere bit of interesting history that one peruses the pages eloquent with that story, for ours are times in which old banners and policies, once held honourable amongst us, have become somewhat dusty and neglected.

It was in December of 1572, the year that witnessed the horrible slaughter of the Huguenots on St. Bartholomew's day, that Haarlem was beset by Alva's Spaniards. Alva was now in the full flight of his insanely cruel career. Insane I call him, and insane his master Philip II.; for the honour of humankind, let it not be believed that a sovereign could in his right mind sentence a whole nation to death, or that a soldier could in cool sanity set to work to carry out the sentence, at least so far as to render his name a horror and a loathing. The minds of these men were drugged by the pernicious teachings of the mediæval Church. Priests and learned doctors assured them that of all evils heresy was the worst. The disciples of the Crucified One were made to understand that in only one accent could he be fitly called "Lord"; the children of the Father in heaven learned to be as like Him as possible in making a hell for sinners on earth. The horrible cruelties inflicted on body and mind by the Inquisition were the direct offspring of gross ignorance wrought into religious fervour and untempered by calm reason. Before the voices of wisdom, humanity, and reasonable citizenship could be heard, how vast a price had to be paid to the foul idols set up in the name of Christianity!

Haarlem sits behind its dunes half-way from north to south in the shore-sweep of the unbroken peninsula known of old as the province of Holland. Ten miles to the east lies Amsterdam, on an inlet of the Zuyder Zee. A great broad lake, long since drained and converted into pasture-lands, lay in those days between the two cities, and stretched southward for eight or ten miles. The great spire of St. Bavon held aloft a "colossal crown," seen from far, and prophetic (suggests Motley) of the martyrdom impending on the city. Haarlem then was a thriving place, with many tokens of the wealth and culture of its inhabitants. Unhappily for them, they declined to forswear Protestant principles.

These principles had been fast spreading, especially in the northern and western Netherlands. Philip had tried in vain by threats and by violence to check them. He lied to the people, he threatened, he cajoled; he treacherously imprisoned and slew their nobles. One man was not deceived by him, and at least for many years escaped his malignity. This was William of Nassau, Prince of Orange—"the Silent"—so-called because of his discreet imperturbability when Henry II. of France, mistaking his man, confided to him the State secret of an intended extermination of the Protestants. Since that day, in 1559, William had pursued a patriotic path, by which he emerged more and more from a puzzling labyrinth into the clear daylight as the world's first great champion of civil and religious liberty.

William, Prince of Orange, had been appointed at an early age one of numerous lords of the Netherland provinces, all of which were, in the fourteenth century, on the failure of the line of Counts of Flanders, brought under the Dukes of Burgundy. In the fifteenth century the Dukedom was held by the celebrated Emperor Charles V., who abdicated in 1555, leaving the Spanish crown and the overlordship of the Netherlands to his son Philip II. In the struggle for civil and religious freedom which went on till the close of this century the lead of the provinces was taken by Holland, and its Stadtholders were substantially recognised by the Dutch Republic (formally declared 1581) as governors of the State. Our own William III. was great-grandson of William "the Silent."

In the decade prior to that St. Bartholomew's day, the unhappy Netherlands had been baptized in horrors. Alva's mission as executioner-in-chief of a whole people, began in 1567. Confronted by his martial skill and his disciplined Spanish troops, the struggle of the burghers became all but hopeless. Indeed, it had been for some time wholly desperate, when the landsmen were unexpectedly assisted by their sailor brethren—a piratical set, concerning whose delinquencies we might speak much if we were not countrymen of Elizabeth's sea-dogs. When all seemed lost, countless homes having been desolated, and the whole spirit of the people cowed, the "Wild Beggars of the Sea," as much by luck as strategy, seized Brill (on the Voorne, opposite "The Hook"), and then one town and another was won and lost and fought for again in a war such as the world had never seen.

At first, after the capture of Brill, it seemed as if the revolting States would grow up at once into an independent Protestant power, with William at their head. But the Spanish grip on their throat was strong, and it was merciless. Mons, in the south, was taken after a long investment, and the troops, infuriated by delay, pillaged the city. Not satisfied, however, and craving the just payment of their hire, they were appeased by permission to "sack" the city of Mechlin. The heart aches, the mind reels, in the attempt to realise the terrors of that term. The pen refuses to sketch them. Zutphen to the east (where our Philip Sidney fell in 1586) was also "sacked," and then Naarden (nearer Amsterdam) was "sacked." Could Haarlem dare to face a similar doom? The city faced it—and endured it.

But not till after a long agony of resistance. Beset by the terrible army of Spain, the citizens defended their beautiful city as well as they could. Winter befriended them, and their men fought on skates on the frozen Haarlem Mere. Their women formed a fighting battalion, three hundred strong. Their children carried stones for the earthworks. Furious cannonades, on a scale hitherto unknown, shattered their defences and dwellings, but left their courage unshaken. Advancing to assault through the breaches, the Spaniards were met, not only with sword and musket, but with "heavy stones, boiling oil, live coals"; pitch-hoops set on fire were slung upon their necks. Foiled thus on the surface, the besiegers mined below. They were met by countermines. Hideous encounters took place in the dark. Explosions shattered friend and foe.

The men of Haarlem certainly deserved well, but, alas, all relieving parties were but too surely cut off. William, from the southern shore of the Mere, was instant to furnish supplies and reinforcements. His efforts were fruitless. By degrees famine and disease came to the aid of the foe. The slow weeks passed, and now the gaunt defenders of Haarlem longed in vain for fresh assaults rather than that they and their dear ones should die of starvation. The frozen lake thawed, and the days lengthened, and still the city held out, while from north and south the Dutch put forth fresh efforts to rescue their brethren. Prodigies of valour were performed.

One John Haring, of Horn, had planted himself entirely alone upon the dyke [a narrow causeway to the north-east of the city] where it was so narrow, between the Y on the one side and the Diemer Lake on the other, that two men could hardly stand abreast. Here, armed with sword and shield, he had actually opposed and held in check one thousand of the enemy, during a period long enough to enable his own men, if they had been willing, to rally, and effectively to repel the attack. It was too late, the battle was too far lost to be restored, but still the brave soldier held the post, till, by his devotion, he had enabled all those of his compatriots who still remained in the entrenchments to make good their retreat. He then plunged into the sea, and, untouched by spear or bullet effected his escape.

Brave John Haring! On the other hand, historians tell of singular frenzies of cruelty on the one side as on the other. "It was a war," confessed Alva himself, "such as never before was seen or heard of in any land on earth." "Never," he said, was a place defended with such skill and bravery as Haarlem."

The last act but one in this memorable struggle was a great battle between a total of 250 ships on Haarlem lake. The Spaniards, though possessing fewer vessels, proved the victors, and swept their enemies from its waters. This fatal defeat, witnessed by the besieged from tower and roof, occurred on May 28—the siege began, we must remember, early in December.

On July 8, a final effort, equally in vain, was made by William to relieve the city, and four days later, upon solemn assurances of ample forgiveness, the hapless inhabitants surrendered. The "solemn assurances" of religious Spain proved, as usual, as idle as "dicers' oaths." More than two thousand persons were butchered in cold blood. Philip II., who had been lying dangerously ill at Segovia, near Madrid, drank the wine of recovery at the "good news" of the fall of Haarlem. Meanwhile, the Spaniards at the seat of war, celebrated their victory by burning William's effigy at Utrecht.

But William still lived, and in him lived the spirit of a better time, not only for his country, but for the world. He stood for the constitutional rights of the people.

He maintained, when as yet the idea of religious toleration had hardly dawned elsewhere, that no "inquisition should be made into any man's belief or conscience," and that no man "by cause thereof should suffer trouble, injury, or hindrance." It is three centuries and a quarter since those great words were incorporated in the Act of Union between Holland and Zeeland under his rule; but, even in Protestant England, we are far from attaining that ideal yet.

W. G. Tarrant.

(To be concluded.)

IN PRAISE OF HOLLAND.

IV.

TO TEXEL ISLAND.

In and about Amsterdam there is plenty to interest the sight-seeing tourist for a week or more. Pictures, churches, the Palace, parks and gardens, the busy wharves, the narrow Kalverstraat (Calf-street), the Jewish quarter; all take time to visit, and are worth spending time over. I have stayed in Amsterdam in the cold misty days of February and have enjoyed the theatres and music at nights; in the summer when the Vondel Park and the Zoological Gardens are in their glory, and the Tolhuis just the other side of the ferry across the Y is gay with bright illumination and music; and in winter when magnificent skating is to be had on canal and skating rink. Then Ijmuiden with its wonderful locks; Zaandam, of Peter the Great note; Broek, the model village; and Marken Island whose inhabitants are ever decked out in their Sunday best,—all these are sure to claim some share of the visitor's time.

Instead, however, of saying anything in further praise of places whose good report is in everybody's mouth, I will tell of an expedition which my friend W. and I made some years ago, when Holland was a stranger land to me than it is now.

Hoorn.

It was a Wednesday morning that we set off from the quay on the Y in the steamer for Hoorn on the Zuiderzee. It was a pleasant journey through the great locks at Schellingwoude, which keep the waters of the Y out of the Zuiderzee, and so help to create the port of Amsterdam. The Zuiderzee was very gentle to us—and it can be rough—and the passage was very enjoyable. The isle of Marken we passed close to, but did not touch; so low is the whole island that there seemed to be no land, but merely church and house roofs rising out of the water. It was early afternoon when we steamed into Hoorn harbour, and landed quite close to the picturesque gateway. A walk through the town brought us to the hotel "Doelen," where we put up for the night. The market-place, generally the point of attraction in most Dutch towns, was quiet. Though market-day, the cheese market was over, and the town had almost resumed its dead-alive stillness. Yet in the gas-light and in the light of the shops we discovered that the place was not quite dead; there was enough life left in the inhabitants for shopping and chatting and strolling about.

Alkmaar.

We found that the next day, Thursday, was Alkmaar market-day, and that a coach started from the door of the hotel early enough to reach Alkmaar in time to see the cheese fair, for which Alkmaar is famous, at its height. I have a vivid impression of that pleasurable ride. We passengers, who consisted of ourselves, two American ladies, mother and daughter, who were full to overflowing of what they saw, and a young schoolmaster, who in good English and with much humour acted as friend and guide, were all seated outside the coach, either on roof or front seat. The time flew as our 'bus jogged along on the top of tree-shaded dykes, by farmhouse after farmhouse, whose steep, black shining roofs looked at a distance like pyramids, and through villages whose inhabitants gave us an inquisitive welcome. The passage of the 'bus would probably be their sole daily excitement.

Alkmaar streets were full of country carts of various sizes, shapes, and colours, and country people as various in figure and costume as their carts. The market-place was like the yard of a cannon manufactory. Piled up in heaps all over the ground were large golden yellow glittering balls of cheese either weighed and sold, or waiting to be carried on white, red, blue, or green biers slung over the shoulders of two men decked out in white, and braces coloured to correspond with the bier, into the Weigh-house at the edge of the market overlooking a canal, there to be weighed officially for sale purposes. The neighbouring canal was full of barges either loading or unloading the yellow balls, and groups of buyers and sellers were eagerly gesticulating as a prelude to the final strike of the fist, which concludes the bargain. All the town was life and business. The Weigh-house is one of Holland's architectural gems, and had to be photographed on all sides—a climb to the top of its tower gave us a striking view of the town and country, and initiated us into the mystery of the playing of Dutch carillons.

The next morning we were off by steamer up the Noord Holland Canal bound for the Helder, the Dutch Naval Station, but more interesting to us as having in its neighbourhood sea-dykes second only to those at Westkapelle. After busy little Alkmaar the journey to the Helder seemed very quiet, but the constantly changing passengers, and the stoppages at the little piers kept us wide awake and fully interested.

The Helder.

I don't think I duly appreciated the Helder, its very evident naval complexion was not, in holiday time, to my mind, and we preferred returning to Alkmaar for the Sunday, and made plans accordingly. Still we were not prepared to give up a flying visit to the Island of Texel, one of a belt of huge sand dunes which stretch across the opening of the Zuiderzee and continue along the north of Holland and indeed as far as opposite the coast of Denmark. To accomplish this outing in time we took the early morning boat before breakfast, and found ourselves on board with few fellow-passengers but a vast amount of goods. Bright, clear weather gave a long view of the isle and coast and sea and sail without uneasiness.

Texel.

Texel has one little port called Oudeschild, and there we landed and were transferred into a very shaky cart which rattled us along to De Burg, the capital of the island, about two miles off, in the centre of the island.

The landlord of the little inn set before us a lunch which we very much needed, and then set to work to tempt us not to return to the mainland that afternoon, but to spend the Sunday in the island, promising us fine weather and plenty of interest to pass the time pleasantly. We did not require long persuading; we had fallen upon very delightful quarters, and a sight of the sweetly clean sunlit bedrooms settled the matter, and news was sent by the afternoon boat to the Helder that we were not returning until Monday. It was a very happy time we spent, strolling and photographing in every nook and corner in the little town, walking, bathing, and botanising along the dunes, attending the church and listening to the long prayers the wearisome sermon and the slow almost tuneless singing of the hymns. We found plenty to see, and in the evening the landlord and the new Burgomaster, who was putting up at the inn till his house was ready for him, made excellent company till bedtime. We asked for some green cheese, which our guide-book told us was the peculiar product of the island. It was a long time coming forward, and there was an evident shyness in producing it. On the Monday it appeared and was approved, notwithstanding that unpleasant rumours as to the cause of the green colour were confirmed. Monday night found us duly back at Alkmaar, after a delightful experience.

There are one or two parts of this country of which for their beauty the Dutch are proud and with good cause, and one is the district called Gooi, which lies between Amsterdam and Utrecht, and is close by, though not in sight of, the Zuiderzee. It is easily accessible from Amsterdam by train, tram, or, preferably, by the Castle of Muiden and the ancient town of Naarden, on cycle, to Baarn. You will see here, amidst trees and flowers, a quantity of villas of all shapes and sizes in miniature parks and gardens, all elaborately and quaintly decorated in a fashion peculiar to the country. By this route, and on to Amersfoort, the Royal Château of Soestdijk, and Utrecht, is a good way of passing from the city of Amsterdam into pleasant Dutch town and country.

Rotator Senex.

Servetus Memorial.—We have received the following addition to the list already published:—Mr. G. W. Chitty, 2s. 6d.

God gave you many faculties, every one of which should be developed in exact balance and harmony by proper culture. At the head of these—dearest, sweetest, divinest, sole umpire and regulator of all—is the religious and spiritual faculty, reverence, or conscience, the anti-selfish principle, that which recognises obligation or duty: I ought or ought not. As you wisely cultivate this faculty in love to God and man, so will your life be complete, happy, useful.—J. B. Harrison.

IS THERE A GULF?

A criticism frequently passed on our denominational periodicals is that they are too ministerial, not sufficiently adapted to the needs and interests of the laity. Whether or not this is the case, the fact that such a criticism is possible suggests a question worth serious consideration, viz., how is it that there is a class of subjects, or a manner of treating them, adapted to the minister but not to the layman? Is there really this gulf between the minister and the layman? Are they interested in different subjects, do they demand different treatment for such subjects as are of common interest? If such a distinction exists, it is well that we should understand its nature, and make up our mind whether it is something we should try to preserve or abolish.

It is by no means easy to understand and clearly state the nature of any such distinction. One thing it certainly is not. It is not true that ministers are interested in religion and laymen fail to be interested in religion. A universal feeling about sermons proves that the more religious a sermon is, the more the laymen who hear it are interested in it. When they do not care for sermons, when they feel that they have not received what they came for, it is because the sermon is what they call an essay, because it conveys information, because it asks them to think, never because it makes an appeal to their religious feelings.

Perhaps we may get some light on our subject by regarding the teaching given to our students for the ministry at Manchester College, Oxford. The nature of this teaching can be readily gathered from the examination questions published in the annual report. It is worth comparing it with the training given in other professions. A medical student attends lectures, works in the dissecting room, walks the hospitals, and as soon as he starts as a young doctor he is able to put in practice just what he has been learning to do. The case is very similar with the young barrister or solicitor. The lawyer learns his profession, and as soon as he starts he puts into practice what he has learned. So with the day school teacher who passes two years at a training college. When he comes out of college, and secures a place in a school, he begins at once to do what he has been carefully trained to do, to teach what he has been taught to teach, and to make use of methods which he has been taught to employ. In these cases success in the profession will depend on putting into practice the training received in the days of college preparation.

Now contrast this state of things with the case of a student leaving M.C.O. and settling with one of our average congregations. The thing which would be certain to empty his chapel would be for him to act in the same way as the young doctor, lawyer, or day-school teacher. How many of our young ministers have tried with the greatest caution to teach their congregations a little of the learning in which they have been themselves instructed at college, and have had to give up the attempt, sorrowfully driven to admit that these are things in which laymen are not interested, and for the most part cannot be interested, and from which they get no good, sorrowfully discovering that after they are plunged into the thick of their life-work they have to begin at the beginning and learn how to do it.

Of course, this does not apply to the instruction given by the Tate lecturer, which occupies a comparatively small portion of the student's time and energy, but to the bulk of the work required of them. Nor is it any condemnation of the theological and philosophical studies taught at M.C.O. These are valuable studies, and most interesting to those who have leisure to pursue them. But they do not interest or benefit the laymen who compose the great majority of our average congregations. And these congregations are crying out for ministers who have been trained to do their work, for preachers who have been trained to preach as day-school teachers are trained to teach, and pastors who will look after their flock as a doctor looks after his patients. Our students do not leave college trained in accordance with this standard.

The gulf is of comparatively recent origin. Not so very long ago our laymen were interested in the knowledge which their ministers acquired at college. They liked a discussion of theological and philosophical problems. They knew their Bibles and closely followed an argument founded on texts. After listening for an hour to a discourse which conveyed a good deal of information and demanded real thought before coming to the practical conclusion, they went away well satisfied. It is not so now. Hence the gulf has opened, and before a minister can do good work he must somehow get across that gulf which separates him from his laymen. What brings the student success at college will not secure him success as a minister. No successful student ever became a successful minister without something very like a right-about face and some steady progress in another direction.

The change is partly due to our new knowledge about the Bible. The Bible has largely become a book for experts. It has ceased to be the Divine Word accessible to all who can read, and laymen for the most part leave it alone. Not that they have really lost interest in it. The popularity of Professor Carpenter's lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century" proves this. But, then, this book does not represent the work done at the college.

The removal of the college to Oxford has done something to widen the gulf by separating the students from close contact with our larger congregations and fellowship with leading ministers. No doubt the lengthy vacations give them time for undertaking ministerial work, but while they are thus engaged, they are removed from all college criticism and training.

No doubt it is always easier to point out difficulties than to find remedies. But two suggestions may be made. One is to ask old students of the college what portion of their college work they have found practically helpful in after life, and how they have been able to supplement the deficiencies which experience soon showed them in their own equipment. The second suggestion is to inquire how other denominations manage to train the ministers who, whatever other disadvantages they may labour under, are certainly in closer touch with their congregations than our own students are trained to be. Our men are like artists who have been taught the theory of composition but not how to draw, who have devoted much time to the study of history and literature so as to be supplied with subjects for pictures, but have had very little instruction or practice in painting. It ought not to be impossible to introduce changes which will bridge the gulf.

H. Shaen Solly.

THE HOMES OF WORDSWORTH.

II.

Penrith was familiar to Wordsworth in early boyhood as well as Cockermouth; he stayed there with his mother's parents, and there his mother died. There also he met Mary Hutchinson, during a college vacation. But there is not much indication in his writings that the place influenced him at all deeply.

Hawkeshead, however, whither he was sent to school with his elder brother Richard, in his ninth year, lived in his memory and holds a remarkable place in the records of "The Prelude." His mother had already died and his father lived but a few years longer, till William was in his fourteenth year. Then Hawkeshead was a home to him. The boys boarded with the village dames, and Wordsworth cherished an affectionate memory of Anne Tyson, with whom he lived during those happy school days. Her house was reached through an arch opposite the "Red Lion" inn, and stands on the right, a humble dwelling two stories high, one of whose two front bedrooms the incipient poet must have occupied, and in which must have been

> That lowly bed whence I had heard the wind
> Roar, and the rain beat hard; where I so oft
> Had lain awake on summer nights to watch
> The moon in splendour couched among the leaves
> Of a tall ash, that near our cottage stood.

He recalled the "lowly cottages" in which he and his schoolfellows dwelt in the retrospect of "The Prelude."

> Can I forget you, being as you were
> So beautiful among the pleasant fields
> In which ye stood? or can I here forget
> The plain and seemly countenance with which > Ye dealt out your plain comforts?

Hawkeshead is one of the most picturesque of lake-district towns or villages. It is an old market town, quaint with its irregular narrow winding streets, small archways and pavement of slates covering its little stream; its open place in the middle of the town, its church on the hill, and its grammar school close by. The houses are small but cheerful and irregular; there are no signs of squalour and dirt to offend eye or nose.

> The snow-white church upon the hill
> Sits like a thronèd lady sending out
> A gracious look all over her domain, says Wordsworth; but the church is one of the few outside things that have changed; the plaster has been stripped off, and the colour of the stone is seen.

The school remains as it was; the main schoolroom is on the ground floor, and on the upper floor a smaller room was used for more advanced pupils, and another contained a library.

The school, which was founded by Bishop Sandys in 1585, was one of the best in the North of England; at it the brothers of the poet were also educated. The companionship of nature—lakes, mountains, streams, and sky—during these eight years impressed his mind with images and developed his emotions often unconsciously. Later on, when, after a powerful divine influence, he had accepted his calling and reviewed his earlier years, the scenery of his boyish games and sports and excursions assumed first importance among the influences that had shaped a poet's mind. The early books of "The Prelude" recall and interpret these early sights and events, and are among the most significant of the poet's works. Esthwaite lake close by and Windermere and Coniston and the hills around them were closely familiar to him, and the highest and grandest mountains reared their heads in the distance. He had come near to them, but was not actually dwelling among them as in later days.

A university education was provided for Wordsworth by his uncles; he went to Cambridge in 1787. His rooms at St. John's College were in the first court in the south-west corner. The flat country of Cambridgeshire did not feed and develop the poet of nature as did his beloved lakes and mountains, but he was pleased to find that nature in her less grand and glorious aspects was yet able to hold his affection. The most powerful impressions of this period were made in the vacations. During the first of these he deepened his sympathies with the life of Hawkeshead, and felt that he was a "dedicated spirit," the seer and interpreter of nature. This experience came to him in the sunrise among his boyish haunts. During the second vacation he was with his sister at Penrith, and met her friend, Mary Hutchinson, his future wife. The third vacation was devoted to a walking tour, "unprecedented" in those days, with his friend Jones, in Switzerland. Like most original minds, he did not fit very well with a prescribed college course, and this was considered to show "a hardy slight of college studies and their set rewards." He took his B.A. degree, however, in 1791.

He lived for a short time in London on a small allowance, but was not at home there. His writings about London are seldom poetic, excepting when they refer to London as part of the country, or London's country suggestions. In 1791 and 1792 he was in France, ready to take his part in the events of the French Revolution, till forced to desist by the stoppage of his funds.

Dorothy Wordsworth, was, like her brother, a keen and tender lover of nature, and she and her brother, united by personal affection and common desire for a simple country life, found opportunity to follow the course they wished, when Raisley Calvert (the poet's second admirer, his sister was the first), left him a legacy of £900. On the income and part of the principal of this, with £100 received for the "Lyrical Ballads," brother and sister lived for nearly eight years at Racedown in Dorsetshire. The solitary farm house is some seven or eight miles distant from each of the country towns Crewkerne, Chard, and Axminster, and a little further from Bridport, remote, therefore, from any thickly-populated district, and distant from any small town or large village. Dorset has rich undulating country, grand sea coast and moderate hills. The highest of its hills—perhaps, most worthy to be called a mountain—is Pillsden Pen, close to which was the first home of Wordsworth's own choosing. Economy was, no doubt, one cause of his choice, but it is remarkable that his early manhood was spent voluntarily in one of the most secluded districts and in the most mountainous part of it, far from the ordinary objects of ambition and the possibility of "making a competency." There are pleasant woods and steep banks, but Pillsden Pen can actually be reached in a carriage by those who prefer jolting to a stiff climb on foot. At Racedown, "The Borderers," was written, and some smaller poems, the best and most original being the passage afterwards incorporated in the first book of the "Excursion," referring to the ruined cottage and its past inmates.

In 1797, the Wordsworths moved to Alfoxden, near Netherstowey, among the Quantock Hills, near the highest and most mountainous part of Somersetshire. Here they were in the near neighbourhood of Coleridge, whose friendship they enjoyed. Wordsworth's income was improved by taking a pupil. Brother and sister together visited Lynton, Tintern Abbey, and other places, and spent four months at Goslav in Germany, several of the finest early poems and the opening passage of "The Prelude" resulting from these expeditions.

Priestley Prime.

A HARD FROST.

"My bloomless lilac bush and roseless tree,
O cruel Frost," I sighed when summer came,
"Nothing, alas! display but leaves for me,
Like that luxuriant fig of ancient fame.

"I come not seeking fruit, O Frost, but flowers,
And find too much the fruit of your hard work;
In vain I look, in these sweet sunny hours,
If anywhere a single bud may lurk.

"And then the blooms of other years spring up
Within my heart and make a summer there;
And deep again I drink from that gold cup,
And marvel, Frost, how lavishly you spare."

E. L. H. Thomas.

Keep the upward windows open. Do not dare to think that a child of God can worthily work out his career or worthily serve God's other children unless he does both in the love and fear of God their Father. Be sure that ambition and charity will both grow mean unless they are both inspired and exalted by religion. Energy, love, and faith, those make the perfect man.—Phillips Brooks.

THE DOWAY BENEDICTINES.

The expulsion of the Doway Benedictines from France, their arrival in England and their establishment at Woolhampton in the Roman Catholic diocese of Portsmouth has given rise to considerable misapprehension. They have in reality nothing to do with the famous college which was founded by Cardinal Allen, and which played so great a part in the history of Anglo-Romanism. It is not true to say that the Benedictine community was expelled from Doway during the horrors of the French Revolution and returned thither in 1818. The community which was expelled from Doway settled peacefully in England, and has remained there ever since. The monks now at Woolhampton went to Doway in 1818 for the first time, long after the penal laws against Romanists had been repealed. The following statement of facts will make this clear.

(1) The University of Doway was founded by Philip II., to whose dominions Flanders, including Doway, belonged. He obtained the bull of institution from Paul IV. in 1559. The University had its four Faculties of Theology, Philosophy (or Arts), Law, and Medicine, but it was as a school of theology that the University became famous, and it was in a special degree subject to clerical control. Towards the end of the seventeenth century Doway became part of France, and in this way its theological teaching was seriously modified by the Gallican spirit. Among its famous theologians we may mention Estius, the commentator on St. Paul, who lived during the Spanish period, and Tournely, the author of a well-known treatise on grace, who was a subject of the French King.

(2) The English College at Doway for the education of secular priests was founded in 1568 by Cardinal Allen, who was born at Rossall in Lancashire, and who had been Fellow of Oriel and Canon of York in Queen Mary's time. Allen chose the site for his new college partly because it was in the territory of the Spanish King, who was regarded by many as the great protector of English Romanists, partly because the climate was far more suitable than that of Spain to English constitutions. The college continued in its place (save for a short time, when it was removed to Rheims) till 1793. To it English Roman Catholics owe their translation of the Vulgate generally known as the Doway Bible, because the Old Testament completing the whole work was published there in 1609, the English version of the New Testament having been issued in 1582 during the temporary transference of the seminary to Rheims. This English College at Doway sent a long array of missionary priests into England during the times of persecution. Of these was Cuthbert Mayne, the protomartyr of the Seminary priests. He was followed by many others who paid with their blood the penalty of allegiance to the Roman See. Quieter days came, and the Doway priests were, as a rule, inoffensive men, staunch Romanists, but deeply imbued with Gallican principles, and with a taste for church history, rather than for the scholastic theology. Alban Butler, the learned author of the Saints' Lives, and Dr. Lingard, who died in 1853, may be mentioned as perhaps the most distinguished alumni of the ancient Seminary.

The Doway influence, with its traditional moderation and quiet old-fashioned ways, lasted on till it was driven out by the new spirit of Ultramontane enthusiasm which came from Wiseman and the Oxford converts.

(3) St. Gregory's English Benedictine Monastery was founded at Doway, in 1605. The monks of this house took a fourth vow to serve on the English mission if called upon to do so by their superiors. Some of them, like their brethren of the Secular College, sealed their testimony with their blood. After 1793 the community found a home in Acton-Burnell and then at Downside, in Somerset, where they still maintain a Roman Catholic school of higher education.

(4) The Anglo-Benedictine Monastery of St. Edmund arose at Paris in 1615. It was a famous place in its time. There our own James II. made spiritual retreats, and many devoted adherents of the Royal House were buried in the monastic precincts. It is pleasant also to remember that the monks were friends of Dr. Johnson. "I was very kindly treated," he writes, "by the English Benedictines, and have a cell appropriated to me in their convent." Of course the brethren of this house also had to flee from the reign of terror. In 1823 the Pope finally sanctioned the transference of St. Edmund's Monastery to Doway, and that has been their home till the other day. But, though they fill an honourable place in English history, their connection with Doway is comparatively recent. They were employed in training boys for the secular priesthood in the English mission, and this they will continue to do at Woolhampton. Pugin built them a fine chapel in 1840, but of that they have now been robbed by the French Republicans.

William Addis.

OBITUARY.

MRS. L. N. WILLIAMS, ABERDARE.

One of the staunchest and most faithful adherents of the Unitarian faith in Aberdare has passed away in the person of Mrs. Williams, wife of Councillor L. N. Williams, the energetic secretary of Highland Place Church. She died early on Saturday morning last, after a long and painful illness. She was of a happy and cheerful disposition, and had borne her suffering with perfect courage and Christian fortitude. Mrs. Williams was not what may be termed a public woman, but she had a charitable and sympathetic heart that prompted sympathetic action. She did good by stealth and blushed to find it fame. Highland Place will be the poorer for her loss. A more generous, a more amiable lady it would be indeed difficult to meet. She leaves a husband and five children (all grown up), to whom universal sympathy is given.

At the close of the morning service at Highland Place on Sunday, references were made to her death by Colonel T. Phillips, who moved that the pastor should convey to the family a resolution of sympathy and condolence. The Rev. J. J. George seconded, and Mr. J. W. McEwen and Mr. R. Bedlington, M.E., supported the resolution, which was passed in silence.

Another resolution of condolence was passed in the Sunday-school in the afternoon, on the motion of the Rev. H. Fisher Short, seconded by Mr. John Evans, and supported by Messrs. F. W. Hall and W. R. Evans.

The funeral, which was private, took place on Wednesday.

MRS. WOODHOUSE, GORTON.

On Friday morning, July 31, this lady passed away in her 76th year, after a long period of broken health. She was for many years, and up to her death, a member of the Gorton congregation identified with Brookfield Church, both in the days of the old chapel and during the subsequent period since the existing beautiful edifice was erected. Under the ministry of the late Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., she had the satisfaction of seeing her husband in the capacity of superintendent of the Sunday-school, and her children active helpers both in school and church. One of her daughters—Mrs. H. Bodell Smith—became a minister's wife, and her bereaved husband has long been a trustee of Brookfield Church, as well as a member of the church committee. By quiet and frequent acts of kindness and private philanthropy amongst the poor of Gorton she had endeared herself to many aged and afflicted people, and was ever ready with sympathetic help in cases of real need. Those who knew her could not fail to be impressed by her strong individuality, high moral character, abundant common sense, and passionate fondness of home and family. An exemplary citizen and a good wife, she was also an almost ideal mother. Her husband, son, three daughters, her sons and daughter-in-law and grandchildren will sorely miss her loving and gracious influence, now that they are bereft of her presence. The interment of the bodily remains took place on Monday last, Aug. 3, in the burial ground attached to Brookfield Church, the Rev. George Evans, M.A., officiating, and delivering a beautiful and touching address concerning the exemplary life and character of the deceased, and the sweet memories of her goodness which will continue to live in many hearts. In addition to the sorrowing relatives, a large concourse of friends and neighbours assembled in the church and beside the grave. The beautiful wreaths sent included one from the church committee. As a life-long resident in Gorton, Mrs. Woodhouse had won the respect and attachment of all who came to know her, and her death awakened widespread regret and deep sympathy for the bereaved family. Another link with the old chapel is now broken, and with that past history of the congregation which is still so dear to those old members who yet remain. Most fitly did the minister say in his remarks, of Mrs. Woodhouse, that "she hath done what she could," and "her children call her blessed."

An arm of aid to the weak,
A friendly hand to the friendless,
Kind words so short to speak,
But whose echo is endless—
The world is wide, these things are small,
They may be nothing—but they are all!

R. M. Milnes.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Accrington.—We learn from the Accrington Observer that a meeting of the Free Church Council was held on Thursday, July 23, in the Wesleyan School, Union-street. The Rev. J. R. Rendell presided, and there was a good attendance. A resolution was passed approving of the action of the Accrington Education Committee, in protesting against the action of the managers of Christ Church School in rejecting Miss Croft as a candidate for the post of pupil-teacher on the ground of her being a Unitarian, and the secretary (Rev. J. G. Sutherland) was instructed to forward a letter to that effect to the Education Committee. It was stated that Miss Croft was asked what was the religion of her father, and on her replying that he was a Unitarian, she was told she could not be accepted, and had better apply elsewhere. Alderman Rawson said he had been informed that Miss Croft had stated that if she had told a lie about her religion, she believed she could have had the appointment. Miss Croft was trained at Willow-street school, connected with the Baptist Chapel, under Mr. Langham, had attended the pupil-teachers' centre, was thoroughly qualified and recommended by the Education Committee. She has since been appointed teacher at Antley Wesleyan School.

Gateshead.—The Rev. J. Lonsdale Dowson, Bridgwater, U.S.A., has accepted an invitation to the pastorate of Unity Church, and will enter upon his ministry October 1.

Glossop.—On Saturday last the church choir, together with the teachers and elder scholars, had a most enjoyable picnic at Disley, in Cheshire, Mr. Isaac Jackson very generously defraying the expenses of the outing. On Sunday afternoon, the Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox unveiled a portrait of Mr. Wright Booth, which has been presented to the schoool by the teachers and scholars in recognition of long and faithful services rendered. Mr. Booth was one of the founders of the school in 1872, and since that time has been the sole superintendent, an office which he has filled with great ability, with unsparing devotion, and without any break.

London: Ascot Excursion.—By the renewed kindness of Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence a large party of Sunday-school teachers, numbering over 200, visited King's Ride, Ascot, on Bank Holiday. The Rev. J. Toye (of Limehouse) superintended the arrangements, which worked with perfect smoothness. The ministers of several churches accompanied the teachers from their schools. At the close of a beautiful day, thoroughly enjoyed, a hearty vote of thanks was given to the host and hostess, on the motion of Mrs. Ginever, seconded by Principal Gordon, and supported by the Rev. J. Toye. Sir Edwin, in reply, said he thought that was the twenty-second or twenty-third annual party of the kind, and he hoped those present might join in many more.

London: Rhyl Street (Resignation.)—Acting on high medical advice, Rev. W. Wilson has reluctantly been obliged to decide to give up the work at Rhyl-street Domestic Mission, which he undertook three years ago, and which he hoped to continue for a long time. He hopes, however, that the same medical opinion will not be averse to his staying in the ministry and undertaking, after a holiday, work in the country, or on the coast, where the strain will be less and the fresh air greater than at Rhyl-street.

Nottingham (High Pavement.).—Miss H. Guilford has been unanimously elected to the chair of the Council for the ensuing year. Miss Guilford has been for many years a devoted superintendent in the Girls' Sunday-school, and that she is honoured and trusted in a wider circle is proved by the fact that she has also been appointed a member of the Educational Committee of the City Council. A brass tablet has been placed on the walls of the girls' school as a memorial of the late Mrs. Henry Turner, who worked for fifty years in the school, and gave the means by which the school has recently been thoroughly renovated. Messrs. Morris & Co. are now actively engaged on the Clayden Memorial window to be placed in the chapel. The Chronicle notes that £150 still remains to be raised, and requests that subscriptions may be paid to Mr. E. W. Enfield, The Grove, Burton Joyce, Notts.

Poole.—In the presence of a large congregation, including representatives of most of our churches in the South, as well as various friends from orthodox churches in the town, the Rev. J. Burton, M.A., was on Wednesday, 29th ult., formally inducted to the ministry of Hill-street Church, Poole, the pulpit of which has been vacant since the sudden death of the late Rev. E. S. Anthony, M.A., B.D., a little more than a year ago. The devotional service was conducted by Rev. C. E. Pike, of Newport, I.W., and the charge to the minister was given by the Rev. Alfred Hood (of Parkstone), and that to the congregation by the Rev. C. C. Coe, F.R.G.S., of Bournemouth. Tea was provided in the Temperance Hall, and subsequently a public meeting was held in the church. The Deputy Mayor (Councillor Charles Carter) presided, and amongst those present were Revs. C. C. Coe, A. Hood, E. C. Pike, J. Burton; Messrs. Cogan Conway, (Ringwood, President of the Southern Unitarian Association), Wm. Carter, H. Blessley (Portsmouth), W. T. Bushrod (Southampton), and E. J. Wilkins; Mrs. Wm. Carter, Rev. F. Hirst (Skinner-street Congregational), &c. Among the numerous excellent speeches of the evening, Mr. Burton's address was specially appreciated, and the Rev. F. Hirst's remarks were heard with great attention. He said that in coming there to wish Mr. Burton a hearty welcome to Poole and God-speed in his work, there was no sacrifice of conviction or principle on his part. He could not quite understand their position. He believed what they did, but very much more, and what would surprise some of them, perhaps, was that he could say "Amen" to the confession of faith uttered by their pastor. There was considerable work which they could do together, there being more points on which they agreed than on which they differed. On behalf of the Free Churches of Poole, he gave Mr. Burton a hearty welcome, and observed that they were with him in all that touched the civil and religious freedom of the churches in the land. An interesting feature of the evening's proceedings was carried out by the chairman, who, on behalf of the congregation worshipping in the church, presented Mr. Bushrod with about forty volumes of standard works as a small token of their esteem, and as an expression of their gratitude for the services he had so kindly and ably rendered the church during the past twelve months.

Raloo.—The annual Sunday-school fête was successfully held on July 31, about fifty scholars being present.

Rochdale.—The church was reopened on Sunday after very considerable improvements. Some months ago Mr. Robert Taylor Heape expressed his desire to defray the cost of re-decorating the church and equipping it with an electric light installation. His offer was gratefully accepted, and its scope was afterwards considerably extended, for he generously undertook to refurnish the pews and aisles as well. All the work has been done with the good taste and excellent craftsmanship which characterise Mr. Heape's many other benefactions. The scheme of decoration was specially made as simple as possible in order not to take away from the richness of the magnificent windows and the rare carved work which are the glory of this church. Perhaps the greatest improvement of all is the electric light installation. We should add that while the church was closed for redecoration book-racks were put in all the pews at the cost of Mr. Martin Jackson. Sunday, when the re-opening took place, was the exact anniversary of the opening in 1818 of Clover-street church, and was practically the anniversary of its amalgamation with the Blackwater-street Church. It also marked the beginning of the eighteenth year of the Rev. T. P. Spedding's ministry in Rochdale. The services were largely attended, the church being crowded to the doors at night. The preacher, morning and evening was the Rev. T. P. Spedding.—Rochdale Observer.

South Wales Unitarian Association.—In the report in last week's Inquirer (page 518, paragraph 3) for "Oxford" read "Cefn-coed."

MICROSCOPES, second-hand, excellent condition, from one-third original cost. Slides, great variety, best makers, from 3s. per doz. Write for particulars, The New Age Press, 8, John-street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

Sweet as a Rose, where "Sanitas" goes.

"SANITAS."
BEST OF ALL
DISINFECTANTS,
AND THE ONLY ONE FIT FOR DOMESTIC USE.

"SANITAS."
FRAGRANT, NON-POISONOUS,
CLEAN AND NATURAL.

"SANITAS."
1/- Pint Bottles and 1/- Tins, Powder.
3d. Bars Soap.
Of all Chemists and Stores.

"HOW TO DISINFECT" BOOK FREE.
"Sanitas" Co., Ltd., Bethnal Green, London, E.

Contractors to H.M. Government.

NEW RICHES FROM OLD MINES.

Who would value raw grains if all the arts of milling and preparing them were lost?

Similarly, nuts (which are foods of enormous value) have been unappreciated because the art of preparing them has been neglected.

Hugh Mapleton, Colonial House, Ardwick, Manchester, is now making from nuts, rich, nourishing, digestible foods. Write to-day for descriptive price lists.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, August 9.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton. Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 p.m.,

Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 p.m., Rev. Eustace Thompson.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 7 p.m., Rev. A. Thompson.

Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 a.m and 7 p.m., Rev. Walter Lloyd.

Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 a.m., Dr. J. H. Crooker, and 7 p.m., Mrs. Crooker.

Deptford, Church-street, 11.15, a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. A. J. Marchant.

Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 a.m., Rev. Gordon Cooper, B.A.

Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. H. Woods Perris.

Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 a.m. and 7 p.m.

Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 a.m. and 7 p.m., Rev. Philemon Moore, B.A.

Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 a.m. and 7 p.m.

Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street.—Church closed during August.

Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 a.m., and 7 p.m., Rev. G. Critchley, B.A.

Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 a.m. and 7 p.m., Rev. J. E. Stronge.

Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 a.m. and 7 p.m. Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope.

Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 a.m., Rev. H. S. Perris, M.A., 7 p.m. in Regent's-park.

Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 p.m., Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S.

Peckham, Avondale-rad, 11 a.m., and 6.30 p.m., Mr. A. G. Stoessoiger.

Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. L. Jenkins Jones.

Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 a.m. and 7 p.m., Rev. S. Farrington.

Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 a.m. and 7 p.m., Mr. P. R. Pratt.

Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 a.m., Rev. W. Wooding, B.A. Evening service suspended until Sept. 13th.

Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m. Mr. T. Elliot.

Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, East-hill, 11 a.m. and 7 p.m., Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A.

Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 a.m. and 7 p.m., Rev. Dr. Mummery.

PROVINCIAL.

Bath, Trim-street Chapel, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m; Rev. J. M'Dowell.

Bedford, Library (side room), 11.15 a.m., Rev. Rowland Hill.

Blackpool, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. D. Davis.

Blackpool, Unitarian Church, Masonic Hall, South Shore, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m.

Bootle, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. J. Morley Mills.

Bournemouth, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 a.m. and 7 p.m., Rev. C. C. Coe.

Brighton, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 a.m. and 7 p.m., Rev. T. G. Headley.

Buxton, Hartington-road Church, 11 a.m. and 7 p.m., Rev. George Street.

Canterbury, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 a.m., Mr. J. Remington Wilson.

Dover, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. S. Burrows.

Guildford, Ward-street Church, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. E. Rattenbury Hodges.

Hastings, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. A. Farquharson.

Horsham, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Mr. Wm. Carter.

Leeds, Mill Hill, 10.45 a.m. and 6.30 p.m.

Liscard, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. J. J. Wright, F.R.S.L.

Liverpool, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. W. J. Jupp.

Liverpool, Hope-street Church, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A.

Liverpool, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

Newport, Isle of Wight, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. C. E. Pike.

Oxford, Manchester College, 11.30 a.m., Rev. E. I. Fripp, B.A.

Portsmouth, High-street Chapel, 11 a.m. and 6.45 p.m., Mr. G. Cosens Prior.

Portsmouth, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 p.m., Mr. Thomas Bond.

Scarborough, Westborough, 10.45 a.m. and 7 p.m., Rev. Ottwell Binns.

Sevenoaks, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 a.m. and 6.45 p.m., Rev. F. Teasdale Reed.

Sidmouth, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. W. Agar.

Southport, Portland-street Church, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. Thomas Robinson.

Stratford-on-Avon, Free Christian Church, Tyler-street, 7 p.m.

Torquay, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. A. E. O'Connor.

Tunbridge Wells, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m.

Windermere, Albert Hall, Cross-street, 11 a.m., Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A.

IRELAND.

Dublin, Stephen's Green West, 12 noon, Rev. G. Hamilton Vance, B.D.

Warrenpoint, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 noon. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

Aberystwith, New Market Hall, 11 a.m.,

Colwyn Bay, North Wales, Public Hall, 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A.

Cape Town, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45 p.m., Rev. R. Balmforth.

Sydney, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F. Temple, 11 a.m. and 7 p.m., Rev. G. Walters.

SOUTH-PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.—Aug. 9, at 11.15 a.m.

Board and Residence.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged.—Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

BOURNEMOUTH. — ARNEWOOD. En Pension. Grand position in West Cliff-road; sea views; South aspect; close to Winter Gardens, Promenade, and Pier.—Apply, MANAGERESS.

BOURNEMOUTH.— Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH, DEVONSHIRE.

A HOLIDAY RESORT FOR YOUNG LADIES OR SCHOOL-GIRLS, WITH OR WITHOUT CHAPERON.

Charming little Devonshire town. Perfect Sanitation. Sea and Moorland. Bracing air. Walks, excursions, picnics, splendid bathing. Main line G.W.R.

Terms and other particulars from THE PROPRIETOR.

FELIXSTOWE.—Comfortable HOME for Permanent BOARDERS, Adults or Scholars; also APARTMENTS on reasonable terms.—Apply, Mrs. ROBINSON, Kimberley, Ranelagh-road, Felixstowe.

Schools, etc.

CHANNING HOUSE, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N.
HIGH SCHOOL for GIRLS
and UNITARIAN BOARDING SCHOOL.
("Recognised" by the Board of Education.)

COMMITTEE OF MANAGEMENT.

F. J. NETTLEFOLD, ESQ. — W. A. SHARPE, ESQ.
Mrs. BLAKE ODGERS. — Mrs. W. A. SHARPE.
F. PRESTON, ESQ. — HAROLD WADE, ESQ.
Mrs. WILLIAM WOODING.

Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A. Honours Lond., Head Mistress.

BOARDERS' FEES:

Fifty Guineas a year, and Seat in Chapel One Guinea. Music, Six Guineas extra: or £17 17s. a term: with Music, £19 19s.

Ministers' Daughters £10 13s. 6d. a term, or with Music, £12 5s.

Outside Sanatorium, Laundry at Home, Electric Light. Good Playground and Garden. Tennis, Hockey (in field hired near School). Opportunities afforded for Sight-seeing, Concerts, &c.

The Terms include Board, Lodging, necessary Laundry, all class lessons up to London Matriculation, Drawing, Class-singing, Physical Drill, Divinity.

Extras.—Music, Shorthand, Type-writing, Dancing, Gymnastics, Cooking.

Day Scholars, 3 to 5 Guineas a term; Music, 1½ Guineas extra. Kindergarten, 2 to 2½ Guineas a term.

Next Term begins Sept. 16th.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN, NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON
(Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

Just Published. Crown 8vo. 2s. net.

THE PAST, THE PRESENT, AND THE FUTURE.

By MARTIN R. SMITH,

Author of "What I Have Taught My Children."

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

"The basis of my contention, easily stated and perfectly comprehensible, is that birth into the present life is NOT the genesis of the Spirit, but merely one of the myriad experiences and opportunities of its upward career."

LONGMANS, GREEN, AND CO., 39, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

JOHN PAGE HOPPS' MONTHLY.

THE COMING DAY.

ENLARGED. PRICE THREEPENCE.

Contents for AUGUST.

Emerson as Poet.
Personal Prayers.
The Unitarian Gospel.
The Sovereignty of Ethics.
"Said the Child."
The Passive Resisters.
What England Needs.
Notes by the Way. Notes on Books, &c.

London, Edinburgh, and Oxford:
WILLIAMS and NORGATE, and all Booksellers.

46 pp. 8vo, price One Shilling.

THE FREEHOLD FARM, THE GARNER'D SEED-CORN OF ALL INTUITIONED THOUGHT.

INTUITIONISM:

The Release of the Mind.

By F. LINFORD WILSON.

Published by H. SEERIGHT, and obtainable of W. REEVES, 83, Charing Cross-road, W.C.

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS

By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

DAILY MEDITATIONS

(Fourth Edition Revised.)

NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.

Cloth, red edges, 6d.; roan gilt, 1s.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

TO CHOIRMASTERS.—100 Hymn-Tunes and 10 Chants, by H. W. HAWKES, Waterloo, Liverpool. 6d. nett. Postage, 1½d. per copy.

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17 Mincing-lane, E.C.
Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.
F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.
Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.
STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

Situations, etc.

SUPERIOR PERSON, age 25, seeks situation as Housekeeper or Plain Cook. Thoroughly trained, good references.—M. C., c/o Miss HALE, Hopefield, Honeybourne, Evesham.

WANTED, trustworthy General Servant. Must be under 40, and an abstainer. £18. No washing. Small family. Early dinners.—Mrs. WHITEHEAD, Oakdene, Wallington, Surrey.

WANTED, a domesticated and active Lady of some experience to assist the principal in the general management of a country house. A comfortable home and laundry offered in exchange for services.—Mrs. NORTON, Capel Lodge, near Folkestone.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOINSON, Pier-street.

FREDK. LONG & SON,
AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,
4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2½% repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES

Purchased and sold for customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses.—For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

MARRIAGES.

CREATON—OSLER.—On the 30th July, at the Parish Church, Hampstead, by the Rev. Donald Humphrey Creaton, M.A., brother of the bridegroom, assisted by the Rev. C. W. F. Jones, M.A., the Rev. William Henry Creaton, M.A., Minor Canon of Wells, to Emily Christian, eldest daughter of Thomas Osler, of Auckland, New Zealand, and grand-daughter of T. Smith Osler, of 31, Rosslyn-hill, Hampstead.

LLOYD—SMITH.—On Tuesday, Aug. 4th, at the Unitarian Chapel, Belper, by the Rev. E. I. FRIPP, B.A., Mansfield, Lewis Lloyd to Clara Kertain, daughter of Rev. J. Kertain Smith, Belper.

WILLIAMS—WATERALL.—On Aug. 5th, at the Free Christian Church, Croydon, by Herbert Rix, B.A., James Williams, of Sanderstead, Surrey, to Fanny Alice Waterall, of Grove Cottage, Addiscombe-grove, Croydon.

THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKERS AND WORKERS.

MEETINGS AT AMSTERDAM, September 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 1903.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., Oxford.
Prof. Dr. G. Boros, Kolozsvar.
Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, London.
Rev. Dr. S. A. Eliot, Boston, U.S.A.
Prof. Dr. B. D. Eerdmans, Leiden.
Prof. Dr. E. Montet, Geneva.
Prof. Dr. J. Reville, Paris.
Rev. C. W. Wendte, Boston, U.S.A.

NETHERLANDS COMMITTEE.

Prof. Dr. H. Oort, Voorzitter, Leiden.

P. H. Hugenholtz Jr., Amsterdam.
Dr. I. van den Bergh, Zwolle.
Prof. Dr. T. Cannegieter, Utrecht.
A. H. Claasen, Uitgeest.
Prof. Dr. S. Cramer, Amsterdam.
W. J. van Douwen, Almelo.
Prof. Dr. B. D. Eerdmans, Secretaris, Leiden.
Dr. H. J. Elhorst, Haarlem.
F. C. Fleischer, Makkum.
Prof. Dr. M. A. Gooszen, Leiden.
Prof. Dr. H. Y. Groenewegen, Leiden.
Prof. Dr. H. U. Meijboom, Groningen.

Readers of Papers.

America .....Rev. S. A. Eliot, D.D. "Liberal Religion in America."
Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D. "American Ideals in Education."
Mr. Edwin D. Mead. "Holland and the Peace Movement."
Rev. C. W. Wendte. "The Centenary of R. W. Emerson."
Belgium .....Rev. J. Hocart (Brussels). "The Difficulties of Liberal Religion in Belgium."
England .....Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A. "God as the Soul of all Souls."
Prof. J. E. Carpenter, M.A. "The Place of Christianity among the Religions of the World."
Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A. "The Revived Interest in Mediæval Religion."
France.....Prof. J. Reville, D.D. "Religion and the Modern Conception of the Order of Nature."
Rev. E. Roberty (Paris). "Christian Mysticism and the Liberal Protestantism of France."
Germany .....Dr. A. Kalthoff (Bremen). "The Influence of Conditions of Life upon Religion."
Prof. O. Pfleiderer, D.D. (Berlin). "The New Testament Jesus in the Light of Religious History."
Dr. C. Schieler (Danzig). "Fears and Hopes in respect to Religious Questions in Germany."
Hungary.....Rev. N. Jozan (Budapest). "The Unitarian Movement in Transylvania."
India.....Mr. V. R. Shinde, B.A. (Poona). "Liberal Religion in India."
Japan .....Mr. Z. Toyosaki (Tokio). "The Progress of Unitarian Thought in Japan."
Netherlands...Prof. Dr. A. Bruining. "The Aggressive Character of the Liberal Religious Faith."
Prof. Dr. T. Cannegieter. "Personality and Religion."
Prof. Dr. S. Cramer. "Do Liberal Religious Believers want to be Organised as a Church?"
Prof. M. A. Gooszen. "The Evangelical Awakening in Holland about 1834."
Sweden .....Prof. O. E. Lindberg (Goteburg). "Liberal Religious Faith in Sweden."
Switzerland ...Dr. Schoenholzer (Zurich). "Liberal Religious Life in German Switzerland."

PRELIMINARY PROGRAMME.

Tuesday, September 1st, at 10 a.m., the Dutch Liberal Ministers will meet in the Gebouw v.d. Werkenden Stand, Kloveniersburgwal. The papers and discussions at this Meeting will be in the Dutch language. Members of the International Council are cordially invited to attend.

Tuesday evening, at 7 p.m., the Meetings of the International Council will begin with a Religious Service in the Old Walloon Church, when the Rev. J. van Loenen Martinet will be the preacher. The Sermon will be delivered in Dutch, but an English translation will be placed in the hands of visitors from England. At 8.30 p.m. there will be a Welcome to the Foreign Delegates and a Reception by the Local Committee.

Wednesday, September 2nd, at 10 a.m., the First Session of the International Council will be held in De Vrije Gemeente (Free Congregation), Weteringschans, near the Leidsche Plein, when Professor H. Oort D.D., of Leiden, will deliver the Presidential Address, followed by Papers by Representatives from various countries. There will be an interval at 12.30 for Lunch. From 2 p.m. to 4.30 p.m. the International Council will hold its Second Session. At 7.30 p.m, there will be an Excursion or Entertainment.

Thursday morning, September 3rd, at 10 a.m., the Third Session of the International Council will be held in the Hall of the Free Congregation. At 1 p.m. there will be an Excursion by special train to Haarlem: Organ Recital in in the St. Bavo Cathedral, and Old Dutch Religious Songs by the Quartet of Mr. G. Zalsman. Tea at 4.30 p.m., Dinner at 6.30 p.m., Performance of Krien's Orchestra at 8 p.m. Special train back to Amsterdam at 10.30 p.m. The Excursion Ticket for the day will cost 5s., meals, &c., included.

Friday, September 4th, at 10 a.m., the Fourth Session of the International Council will be held. In the Afternoon, Excursions are planned for Edam and Volendam, near the Island of Marken; and, for those interested in University life, to Leiden. Cyclists will find good roads.

The days and hours when the various Papers will be read will be announced on the final Programme of Proceedings, a copy of which will be forwarded to all who have obtained Membership Tickets (price 4s. 2d.). With the exception of the Religious Service on Tuesday evening at the Old Walloon Church, all the Meetings of the International Council will be held at the Hall of the Free Congregation, Weteringschans, near Leidsche Plein.

Delegates and Visitors from England.

TICKETS.—Return Ticket, London to Amsterdam (Day Service, 2nd Class by Rail, 1st Class by Steamer) £1 5s. 6d. The Tickets are available to return any day up to September 15th.

TIME OF DEPARTURE.—A party from England will leave London on Monday morning, August 31st. Holborn Viaduct, 9.25 a.m.; Queenborough, 10.50 a.m.; arrive Flushing 6.30 p.m.; depart 7.13 p.m.; Roosendaal, 8.30 p.m.; Amsterdam: W. P. Station, 11.6 p.m.; Central Station, 11.19 p.m.

TIME OF RETURN.—The majority of the party will leave Amsterdam on Saturday, September 5th, at 6.30 a.m. (C. S.), 6.45 a.m. (W. P.), Flushing, 10.30 a.m.; Queenborough, 6 p.m.; Herne Hill, 7.5 p.m.; Victoria, 7.15 p.m.; Holborn, 7.18 p.m.

MEMBERSHIP CARDS (4s. 2d.) and Railway and Steamboat Return Tickets via Queenborough and Flushing (25s. 6d.), may be had on application to Mr. Ion Pritchard, Essex Hall. Visitors travelling on their account via Harwich and the Hook of Holland require Membership Tickets, and it is desirable that they should register their hotel or other address at Amsterdam with Mr. Pritchard for the information of the Netherlands Committee. The Hotels named in the circular issued from Essex Hall are now full, but accommodation is still obtainable at other hotels.

Printed by Unwin Brothers, Ltd., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. Kennedy, at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand London, W.C. Sole Agent, John Heywood, 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), John Heywood, Deansgate.—Saturday, August 8, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3190. NEW SERIES, No. 294.] LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 15, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 537
ARTICLES—
Where was Jesus Born? 540
Haarlem, Leyden, Alkmaar—II. 545
In Praise of Holland—V. 546
At Assisi 547
A Cottage Prayer Meeting 548
LITERATURE—
Education in Germany 539
Short Notices 540
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 543
LEADER—
Frederick William Robertson 544
CORRESPONDENCE—
The Lofoten Fishermen 538
The New Year-Book 538
MEETINGS—
Oxford Summer Session 549
POETRY—
Let's Pretend 542
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 550
ADVERTISEMENTS 551

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

DR. S. A. ELIOT, president of the American Unitarian Association, and son of President Eliot, of Harvard, is to preach at the Old Meeting, Birmingham, to-morrow (Aug. 16) and at Manchester College, Oxford, Aug. 30. As a mark of courtesy which all will appreciate, Mr. W. A. Sharpe, president B. and F.U.A., has invited past presidents, the officers and committee of the Association to meet Dr. Eliot at dinner while in London. Dr, Crooker will preach at Old Meeting on the 30th inst., and the next day, with Dr. Eliot, will join the party for Amsterdam.

PROFESSOR A. BRUINING, who will read one of the papers at the Amsterdam meetings, called at Essex Hall this week. He is preaching at the Dutch Church at Austin Friars, on Sunday, for Dr. Baart de la Faille. He said that a better translation of the title of his paper would be "The Aggressive Character of Liberal Theology." He will contend that it is necessary for theology, if it is to live, to assert itself, and not yield either to scepticism or indifference.

THERE appears to be a healthy rivalry respecting the invitation to be given to the International Council of Unitarians and others to visit Switzerland two years hence. Our friend, Dr. Montet, writes :—

Je lis dans l'INQUIRER qu'l est question de Zurich pour le prochain Meeting. Je vous avertis que je suis chargé par les Protestants libéraux de Genève de proposer Genève (deja mis en avant à Londres en 1901).

It may be taken as certain that the most grateful and respectful attention will be given to both invitations; happy are the guests who have such hospitable hosts.

THE Parliamentary Session closes upon a very anomalous state of affairs. Its chief legislative fruit, the Irish Land Act, however costly, may fairly be expected to prove of great value if honourably applied. The London Education Act suggests a much less hopeful outlook, and every week sees the area of "passive resistance" extending. Lord Spencer this week assured a deputation of Nonconformists that, subject to unforeseen developments, the Liberals, if victorious at the next election, would at once endeavour to repeal the obnoxious features of the laws recently passed. But everyone knows that the real interest of the hour is the fiscal question, about which the Government is itself hopelessly divided. The "muzzling" of the House of Commons on this subject stands out in vivid contrast to the outspoken freedom of the Upper House. Nothing has been quite so reassuring to the public mind in these reactionary times as the protests of men like Lord Goschen against the contemplated "gamble with the people's food."

AMONG the distinguished students to be seen at this time of year at the British Museum few have attained greater celebrity of late than Prof. Friedrich Delitzsch, whose lectures on "Babel und Bibel" caused so great a stir in Germany and the whole reading world. He will visit London next week, specially to gather materials for a new lecture to be delivered in the winter before the Berlin Oriental Society. Time was when critical studies "made in Germany" were strongly suspected, if not tabooed. To-day a welcome is freely given to them, and, happily, the policy of the open door cannot be reversed in the intellectual world.

IN connection with the life and influence of F. W. Robertson, to which special attention is directed in our leading article, it is interesting to-day to recall the statement in Mr. Stopford Brooke's biography of the famous preacher, that he had been made "one of God's instruments to preserve the unity of the Christian Church in this country." Robertson's explanations of cardinal doctrines had, we are told, "solved the difficulties of many," and the pregnant intimation is given that "one," at least, had been kept out of Unitarianism by his teachings. That, however, was written in 1865, and much water has flowed in the theological stream since then.

IT is also interesting to remember that Miss Frances Power Cobbe, who reviewed the "Life and Letters" for the Theological Review, in a characteristically lucid and candid essay, fixed on one or two memorable features in the rather unsatisfying picture of Robertson's personality, presented in that work. As a theist pure and simple, and as one then fresh from the labour of editing Theodore Parker's works, the reviewer naturally drew attention to Robertson's peculiar Christology; but as a woman also, she felt bound to protest against his very inadequate conception of the place of woman in the world, and as a lover of animals she marvelled at his marked taste for the "sport" of killing them. Whatever may be a reader's judgment on these matters, we think he must concede that Miss Cobbe makes a good point when, at the close of her review, she draws attention to the extremely sad, not to say morbid, feelings that prevailed over Robertson as the end of his life drew near, and the indomitable trust and assured peace of Theodore Parker, though he, too, was being called away in the midst of his days.

WE are glad to observe that the London Progressive Education Council is determined to make the most of the present position in the mood commended in our columns last week. The Council has prepared the following questions for candidates at the Borough Councils election in November :—

(1) Are you in favour of the provision and maintenance throughout the borough of conveniently-situated, well-built, well-equipped schools under complete public management and control?

(2) Will you adopt all necessary means for selecting and retaining thoroughly efficient teachers?

(3) Will you encourage the supply and maintenance of higher grade schools suited to the educational needs of boys and girls in the borough.

(4) Are you prepared to resist all attempts to introduce denominational teaching in the board schools?

(5) In selecting managers, whether for board or denominational schools, will you endeavour to appoint men and women of knowledge, experience, and character, who will regard the care and training of the scholars as their first and chief concern, quite apart from the religious opinions held by the managers themselves?

(6) In selecting teachers for appointment, are you prepared to select only men and women of character and ability, without inquiry into their opinions on ecclesiastical or theological questions?

LADY STRACHEY chairman of the committee of the Women's Local Government Society, writes to us :—

It may not be realised that London is about to be deprived, by the passing of the London Education Bill, and as an incidental effect of placing education in the hands of the County and Borough Councils, of the services of nine women directly elected for the administration of elementary education, who have laboured with marked success. At the moment when this new disability is being imposed, may I draw the attention of your readers to the fact that the following bodies have during the last few months adopted resolutions in favour of the eligibility of women to serve on the new education authorities, viz.: — The London School Board, The National Education Association, The Metropolitan Board Teachers' Association, the Board Mistress' Union, the National Union of Women Workers, the London Liberal Federation, the London Reform Union, the Women's Liberal Federation, the Women's National Liberal Association, the Women's Co-operative Guild, the Women's Industrial Council, the National British Women's Temperance Association. It is therefore clear that there is a considerable amount of public opinion which is opposed to depriving those bodies that are to administer education of the services of women.

The London County Council, at its last sitting before the recess, agreed without a division, to petition Parliament in favour of a Bill to enable women to be elected as County Councillors. And in the House of Commons a Bill has been introduced by Mr. Channing in favour of making women eligible to County and Borough Councils and Metropolitan Borough Councils. I would urge all who feel the importance of the question to strive for an alteration in the law.

Arrangements for People's Services in connection with the programme of new and extended work issued by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are satisfactorily proceeding. We hear that at least three large theatres have been taken for series of services; and so long as the disposition exists, as it does, on the part of many people to enjoy the unwonted sensation of being at religious meetings in places little associated with such exercises, we have no doubt that large audiences will be secured. The Greenwich Theatre series of four will be opened on Sunday evening, Oct. 11, by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, who will conduct three consecutive services, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie taking the fourth. At the Grand Theatre, Islington, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant will begin with a service, Nov. 8, and will be followed by the Revs. J. P. Hopps and J. C. Street. In Manchester, the Theatre of Varieties, Oxford-road, is to have a series of four, commencing Nov. 1, the ministers being Mr. Hopps and Mr. Street, who will also take part in similar services at Devonport and elsewhere. It is sometimes asked, "Do such services do any good?" The answer surely depends on what is "good." If to stimulate the moral sense, to quicken aspiration, to kindle faith, and generally to lift the mind to a higher level, if only briefly, be good, then this work is good; and we wish the missioners all true success.

The Nottingham High Pavement and Peas Hill Chronicle for August announces the course of lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience," to be given by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, on six successive Mondays in the autumn, beginning November 2, and devotes a leading article to the lecturer, and the special interest and value of the new course of lectures. A detailed syllabus of the lectures will be issued in October, but the following are the six subjects: (1) "Jesus of Nazareth, Prophet and Messiah"; (2) "The Apocalyptic Christ"; (3) "The Christ of Paul: the Man from Heaven"; (4) "The Cosmic Christ"; (5) "The Christ of the Creeds"; (6) "The Christ of Modern Experience." This course of lectures is to be given not only at Nottingham, but on Tuesdays and Wednesdays during the same weeks at Lewisham and Richmond.

Those who attend the meetings of the B. & F. Unitarian Association and the Sunday Association are accustomed to annual lectures about the books. They are reminded what excellent books have recently been published at our central house; they are admonished that it is their duty to buy, to read, to commend, and on occasion to lend these books; they are given to understand that by attending to this simple and easy duty they will aid to dispel a great deal of very tantalising ignorance among our own people, who, half the time, do not know what literary treasures have been provided for them. These sayings are just and true, and yet we imagine that no complaint made by our zealous and faithful officials equalled that which was heard the other day in the Wesleyan Conference. The Rev. Charles H. Kelly, the manager of the Wesleyan Book-room, said in the course of a debate on the publishing department:—

> They had touched the weak point when they said our Methodist people did not support the magazines as they once did, for sixty years ago the circulation of the Magazine when it was one shilling and sixpence was much greater than now.

The writer of the present note is not old enough to confirm that statement from his own recollections, but well he remembers the Magazine a great many years ago in its two forms—the thicker one costing a shilling and the thinner one sixpence. And some of his earliest readings were in that Christian Miscellany, which, for want of sufficient support, died two or three years ago. In those days the good faithful Methodists of our acquaintance bought the Wesleyan publications, read them, and, except the Bible, read very little else. At our Mutual Improvement class it was an exceptional thing if a book was circulated that did not bear the comforting, doubt-suppressing words "66, Paternoster-row" (the former address of the Wesleyan Book-room). And now it seems the good Methodists run all over the earth for their instruction and edification; they let one good old helper die for lack of nourishment, and purchase less copies of his bigger brother than they did sixty years ago.

The new manners have not been without some advantages. The thoughts of the Wesleyans have broadened since the old days. And they tend to broaden still. Be it so, and yet we have much sympathy with those who want the denominational magazine to live and prosper, who are alarmed at any rumour of the stopping of yet another Wesleyan periodical, who think that the Wesleyan press should have definite and characteristic teaching different from the Leisure Hour or the Sunday Strand. However this may be, for causes not perfectly apparent, the Rev. W. L. Watkinson has resigned the Magazine editorship, and Dr. W. T. Davison succeeds him, to whom we wish God-speed in his new work.

Among our letters this week is one which we print, exactly as received, on the subject of the new "year book," and, as will be seen, another publication which is to be supplied gratis to subscribers to the former. We are privately informed also that the Chronicle, the office of which has leapt into fame, is a "monthly"; but we have neither seen it nor any other specimen of all this literary output. We remember, however, that a "council of ministers" was alleged to have engaged in the preparation of the "year book." Will any one of them kindly come forward, and shed a little light on this business?

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. Letters cannot be inserted without the writer's name; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

THE LOFOTEN FISHERMEN.

Sir,—I find that in speaking of the Lofoten fishing boats as being "easily capsized," I have unintentionally given a wrong impression. The boats are splendidly built, but they are only half decked, and in such storms as those which arise at times in the Vest Fjord, boats of such a build cannot but be in great danger, though in an ordinary sea they are perfectly safe and well adapted to their work.—Yours truly,

O. M. Rawlins.

THE NEW "YEAR BOOK."

Sir,—I was surprised at the tone and character of Mr. Austin's letter. There has been a Chronicle office in this town since January last, and any of the public can purchase a copy of the Chronicle. Evidently there are many people in this place not yet known to Mr. Austin.

The corrected edition of the year book will be ready on Tuesday or Wednesday next, and those who have waited so long may be sure of receiving a copy with corrected postal addresses and additional items as were reported here up to the end of July.

Copies of "Voice Production and Palatal Exercise," by Dr. Gowers, F.R.S., will be supplied gratis to subscribers on application to—Yours truly,

William Stubbs.

"Chronicle" Office, Cirencester, August 10, 1903.

For safe with right and truth he is,
As God lives he must live alway;
There is no end for souls like his,
No night for children of the day!

. . . . . .

The broad fair fields of God he saw
Beyond the bigot's narrow bound;
The truths he moulded into law
In Christ's beatitudes he found.

J. G. Whittier.

LITERATURE.

EDUCATION IN GERMANY.*

THE Special Report upon German Education has at least two appropriate characteristics—largeness of plan and laboriousness of execution. If it had been the work of one instead of nine writers, it would have come nearer to the German type, but probably there are few even of Teuton blood who could deal single-handed with the whole field of education in a country like their own, which for educational purposes still consists of several countries. Nor is the complexity of the subject caused chiefly by difference of system in different States; its principal cause is the many-sidedness of the educational problem for every highly-civilised community, and especially for a community which has long made popular education a special care.

Mr. M. E. Sadler, in addition to being generally responsible for the whole volume, contributes two papers on "The Unrest in Secondary Education in Germany and Elsewhere," and "Recent Developments in Higher Commercial Education in Germany." Some of the eleven other papers deal with subjects which are as familiar as they are important, such as Higher Schools for Girls, the Training of Teachers and Continuation Schools; but with others more suggestive of novelty, such as "School Gardens in Germany" and "On the Measurement of Mental Fatigue in Germany," these being the titles of two of the longest essays.

There is not one contribution but has its value, but from so great a variety the reviewer must select. Naturally, he first turns to Mr. Sadler's paper on "The Unrest in Secondary Education," &c., for that comes first in order and runs to almost two hundred pages. I shall describe frankly the impression which this voluminous dissertation made upon me during a careful perusal. It contains many interesting and suggestive passages on the standing themes of educational discussion, such as the relation between intellectual and moral training, the comparative merits of dead and living languages, the use and abuse of athletics. Sometimes Mr. Sadler introduces historical references and quotations from literature which give richness and charm to his exposition. Moreover, no one can read his pages without being made to think also, and to share the seriousness with which the author himself regards educational questions. And yet the result at the end of so much reading is somewhat disappointing. In the first place, there is a good deal of repetition, where crispness and compactness would be more effective. For example, the contrast between the German secondary teacher and the English is drawn with needless iteration. Thus on pp. 10, 72, 83, 112 one finds practically, and sometimes almost literally, the same things said about the intellectual efficiency of the former and the "pastoral" efficiency of the latter. The essay would, I think, have been more telling if reduced by about one-third. Perhaps the author had not time to write more briefly. But in the second place, Mr. Sadler too often tantalises his reader with vagueness and inconclusiveness. In these instances he gives you the impression (no doubt with good reason) that he had in his mind something very definite and important that he would like to say; but he does not say it clearly, or he balances it with a contradictory line of remark, thus depriving it of force. It would usually be unfair to make such a criticism without some attempt at illustration. But details are not necessary, for Mr. Sadler makes a general confession. At the very outset of the essay there are two significant statements. The first is this:—

> Thus there are bewildering cross-currents in educational opinion. Disputes about forms of educational administration are, after all, but of secondary importance. The real questions at issue are what ought schools to aim at producing, and for what kind of social order in future ought they to prepare the rising generation. . . . There is a very general feeling that we need much better education, and a great deal more of it. But there is very far from being general agreement as to what such "better education" ought to consist of. On this point, indeed, divisions of opinion seem to grow deeper year by year.

I should not have thought the case was so serious. But if it is, if the "real questions at issue" are so unsettled, one would suppose that the principal effort of a long essay would be to weigh the alternatives. But on p. 2 we have the following:—

> My aim has been to set out, as fairly as I could, a statement of the difficulties which are raised at the present time by the problem of secondary education in Germany, France, and America, as well as elsewhere. Though I have not shrunk from indicating some of my own conclusions, I have tried so to put both sides of the question that every reader may form his own judgment from the facts before him, although that judgment may well differ from my own.

It is not surprising, then, that Mr. Sadler often gives one the impression that he could play a more decisive part than he does play. If his caution is in any measure due to the sense of official responsibility, it is to be hoped that at some future time he will feel justified in declaring his own opinions with less reserve, for they are sure to be valuable.

As examples, however, of the way in which he does sometimes let himself go, the following may be quoted:—

> Already, so to speak, the wolf is at the door. We have to face the fact that it will take us, under the best conditions, between twenty and thirty years, at a moderate computation, to remodel our secondary and higher education, and to put ourselves (so far as instruction is concerned) on a level with the Germans. (P. 12.)
>
> But if the intellectual side of our English public school life is to be strengthened, the reform will involve great changes in the present disposition of many schoolmasters' time. They will have less time for games, because they will have to give more time to study and to the actual preparation of lessons. In order that the change may not injure the present excellent relations between masters and boys (relations which are quite beyond comparison the pleasantest which exist in any secondary school system in the world), there will be need for an increase in the number of masters, for a considerable reduction in the size of many of the "forms," for much more (and often for a different kind of) instruction in modern languages, in modern literature, in history, and in geography, and for a much more systematic attention to methods of teaching. Clumsy, antiquated methods of instruction are far too common in our secondary schools. (Pp. 10, 11.)

There is one distinction between English and German secondary education which deserves a much more thorough treatment than Mr. Sadler, or any writer in this volume, has given to it—namely, that while in England the secondary school is usually a boarding school, in Germany it is a day school. The fact and some of its consequences are alluded to, but the fact and its consequences are not treated in their relation as cause and effect, and there is no attempt to examine this relation to the bottom and in all its aspects. Yet the subject was worthy of a separate essay, and a proper treatment of it would have shown the true bearings and proportions of some features of both English and German school life which are, in my judgment, ill-understood in this volume, or dealt with in too haphazard a style.

Mr. Sadler, for example, constantly and rightly praises the English secondary teacher for that kind of friendly care of boys which he calls "pastoral," but it is too lightly assumed that the difference between the English and German systems in this matter may be taken by itself, and scored as a point in England's favour. It is, of course, true that in Germany the nexus between the secondary teacher and his pupils is more exclusively intellectual than in England. But this fact must not be isolated. One must consider the other facts which are related to it in the same system. Mr. Sadler himself asserts in another connection a principle which is all-important in this connection. He says: "The most indispensable part of national education is home training." He even gives (in yet another connection) the most appropriate possible illustration on this point.

> The strength of German education lies in its great tradition of disinterested devotion to knowledge; in the self-sacrificing labours of the teachers; in the cultivated interests which distinguish so large a proportion of German homes; in the strong personal interest which parents take in the intellectual progress of their sons; in the "plain living and high thinking" which have fostered through so great a part of the German nation a reverence for learning, and a readiness to make personal sacrifice for ideal aims; in that "inner freedom of soul, that profound harmony of all the faculties" which Amiel said he had so often noticed among the best Germans; and in "the infinite capacity for taking pains" which (whether innate or the result of a long tradition of educational discipline) is characteristic of so many German minds. (P. 55.)

Surely, the direct and constant operation of such home influences was an element worthy of full consideration in any comparison between English and German systems of secondary education. But in this volume there is no attempt to measure it against the much-praised work of the English teacher in loco parentis.

A few concluding words may be devoted to the paper by Mr. Parez on the Measurement of Mental Fatigue. The investigations which have been made in Germany on this subject are not only characteristic in point of thoroughness, they are of great interest and practical value. Clearly a means of definitely measuring the mental strain and consequent weariness entailed by a given amount of a given kind of study under given conditions, is an object of the highest importance in education. Many problems would be illuminated by it, the most obvious being the arrangement of the curriculum. Hitherto teachers have regarded exact experiments or calculations on such a matter as beyond the range of possibility. But in Germany two instruments have been invented by which the relative amounts of fatigue caused in a given child by an hour's lesson in different subjects can be expressed in figures and compared. One, the Ergograph, registers the muscular weakening which is entailed by all kinds of intellectual effort. The other, the Æsthesiometer, registers the decreases in the sensitiveness of the skin, which takes place from the same cause. It is well known that on any given part of the body two pin-points, when within a certain distance, are felt as one. But it is also found that under conditions of fatigue the distance between the points may be increased without change of sensation. This is the fact which the inventor of the æsthesiometer has turned to his service for the measurement of the effect of various kinds of mental effort. The results are of the highest interest and value for the student of education.

---

* Special Reports on Educational Subjects. Vol. IX., "Education in Germany." (Eyre and Spottiswoode. Pp. 612. 2s. 7d.)

It would be strange if a volume of such bulk offered no scope for criticism. The wonder is that it offers so little. Mr. Sadler and his co-workers are to be congratulated on the results of their labours, and it is to be hoped that England will be stimulated thereby.

H. Rawlings.

SHORT NOTICES.

Traditional Aspects of Hell. By James Mew.—This volume contains a series of expositions of the leading ideas of hell and future torment in the religions of the ancient and modern world. It is a valuable study in comparative eschatology, and though it is packed with curious and instructive learning, it is written in a popular and interesting style. It is supplied with a large number of gruesome illustrations, and should have an index. The material here collected gives abundant proof that the Christians have been as diligent as the barbarians in inventing tortures beyond the grave, but it is a happy fact that for the majority of Christians now these tortures rank as superstitions, and their history as antiquarianism. (Swan Sonnenschein, 1903. 6s.)

——

Musical Responses for the Seven Services.—The "Seven Services for Public Worship," which were issued two or three years ago at Essex Hall, are now rendered more available by the publication of these "Responses" in an admirably clear, though cheap, form. The compiler is Mr. J. M. Bentley, choirmaster of Bank Street Chapel, Bolton, and his work may be heartily commended as alike simple, serious, and musically sound. The harmonies have been carefully prepared, and the melodies include all the phrases most approved in cathedral church-music. Single copies may be had for threepence; a dozen for half-a-crown. (Philip Green, 3, Essex-street, Strand.)

WHERE WAS JESUS BORN?

About two years ago I rode out from Nazareth one spring morning to the little village of Beit Lahm—the Bethlehem of Zebulun mentioned in the Book of Joshua. My interest in the place lay in the suggestion which I had met with in more than one writer that this was the true birthplace of Jesus.

The ride was through beautiful country, a pastoral region, where great herds of black cattle were being driven in single file along the narrow tracks between fields of rich arable land, and shepherd-boys were followed by flocks of goats and sheep. After a ride of ten miles we found the little village of Bethlehem bosomed in soft masses of oak, which stretched far away on every side, beautiful in their fresh spring green. At the brook outside the village girls were drawing water and women were washing clothes. Their dresses were of white cotton, with tight sleeves, and confined at the waist by a sash, the skirt coming a little below the knee and showing the baggy Turkish trousers of darker print.

The village is a miserable little place now, just a group of mud hovels; but the view from it, whichever way one turns, is extremely beautiful. To the south-west rises the long range of Carmel, with the Place of Sacrifice standing up prominent above the general level of the ridge. To the left of this are the blue hills of Samaria, on the nearer side of which stretches the plain of Esdraelon, dark red and bright green in the springtime, and nearer still a belt of undulating ground thickly clothed with oak woods. On the east and north are seen the hills of Galilee, range behind range, in purple waves.

The ruins of a synagogue lie eastward of the village, and elsewhere are many prostrate marble pillars, unexplained crypts, and subterranean passages, giving the impression that this must at one time have been a place of some importance.

The whole surroundings and situation were such as one felt befitting. More almost than at any other place in Palestine I found here that simplicity and repose and quiet beauty which one could gratefully think of as belonging to the earliest home of Jesus. But such fitness cannot, of course, be taken into account in the purely historical question whether Jesus was actually born here.

Tradition says that Jesus was born at another Bethlehem, but we are learning to cross-question tradition—even so venerable and sacred a one as this. We cannot take the Gospel narratives for granted, more especially as there seems to be some discrepancy between them on this very point.

The Gospel Evidence.

The Gospel of Mark which, taking the Gospels in their present form, is probably the earliest of the four, tells us nothing whatever about the birth of Jesus. He first appears upon the scene at the Baptism of John, and what we read is simply that he "came from Nazareth of Galilee." As to Bethlehem of Judah, it is never so much as mentioned in Mark's Gospel. How, then, did Luke, who stands next in order of time, come to believe that Bethlehem was the Birthplace? He did not derive the idea from Matthew, for the narrative parts of Matthew's Gospel are later than Luke, and there is nothing in Matthew's Logia to lead to such a belief. We can only infer that already, in A.D. 85, or thereabouts, there were some sources of which we do not know—some of those many narratives to which Luke himself alludes—which stated that Jesus was born at Bethlehem.

Now, Luke essays to tell us how it came about that Jesus was born there. He has a story of Quirinius, governor of Syria, enrolling the people by decree of Augustus Cæsar, and explains that because this was done by tribes and families, Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem, the City of David, Joseph being of that house and family, and so it chanced that Mary was delivered of the child while they were in that town. Did this story, then, form part of the original record or records which Luke consulted, or was it merely an historical setting which he himself supplied?

Objections.

"The history is entirely wrong," answer a number of eminent critics, "and there is every appearance therefore of the story being a belated and unfortunate attempt of Luke's to harmonise the fact that Jesus was always known as 'the Nazarene' with the tradition, which the Evangelist found elsewhere, that he was born at Bethlehem." The erroneousness of the history is said to be shown by the following considerations:—

(1) It was legally impossible that any enrolment of the whole empire should be taken in Judæa and Galilee in the reign of Herod.

(2) Quirinius (or Cyrenius) was never governor of Syria before Herod's death.

(3) Even if the census in Judæa, taken under Quirinius in 6—7 A.D., is the one which Luke has in mind, and even if it be granted that this may have been part of a census of all imperial provinces, yet could it not in any case have applied to Galileans.

(4) It neither would nor could have been taken at the ancestral home of the subject, but at the actually existing home.

(5) Mary would not have had to go, even if Joseph went.

Replies.

To these objections answers more or less hypothetical are given as follows:—It is true that Herod was an ally, and not a subject, and that, legally speaking, an imperial decree that an enrolment should be made would not apply in the reign of Herod to Judæa and Galilee, yet it may have been politic for him to comply with a request for such a census, and we know as a matter of fact that it was particularly to his interest at the time in question to conciliate the imperial power.

It is true, again, that the well-known enrolment under Quirinius did not take place until 6–7 A.D., and that Josephus speaks of this as being a new and unheard-of thing among the Jews; nevertheless, Luke says, so emphatically, "This was the first enrolment made when Quirinius was governor of Syria," that he probably does refer to some previous enrolment of which we do not know.

Once more, it is true that Quirinius was, strictly speaking, only once governor of Syria, but there are reasons for thinking that he commanded the armies, and directed the foreign policy of Syria in B.C. 6, when Varus was governor of the internal affairs, and this may be the ἡγεμονία of which Luke speaks, using it merely as a point to date from, not as implying that the census was carried out by Quirinius. So that if Jesus was born, not as is generally supposed in B.C. 4, but in B.C. 6, this would justify the historical statement with which Luke's Gospel opens.*

As to the objection that even if the census made in Judæa in A.D. 6–7 is meant, it could not have applied to Galileans; and the further objection, that if it had applied to Galileans it would have been taken at the actual, not the ancestral homes; an attempt is made to meet both these difficulties by the supposition that Herod, in endeavouring to satisfy the imperial decree without offending the Jews, may have carried out the enrolment by tribes, thus obscuring the civil and imperial meaning under a national and religious veil. While the argument that Mary would not have had to go to Bethlehem even if Joseph went, is opposed by the answer that Mary, notwithstanding her condition at the time, may have preferred to go rather than stay at home without Joseph's protection.

So far, the answers are of a very conjectural character, and although a conjecture here or there might be permitted, a whole series of conjectures makes but a weak chain on which to hang an historical statement. So that the presumption, it must be confessed, is rather strong that Luke had in mind, but miscalculated the date of, the great enrolment under Quirinius in A.D. 6–7, of which we know from another passage (Acts v. 37) that he was aware. And when he speaks of it as the "first enrolment" he says, in fact, no other than Josephus himself has said (Ant. xviii. 1, sec. 1) when writing about this same well-known census. The presumption, moreover, is strengthened by the fact that in other parts of his writings Luke has fallen into chronological errors.†

Ramsay's Theory.

There is, however, another line of argument which must be taken into account before we leave this part of our subject. It is surmised that the enrolment of which Luke speaks was not an imperial census at all, but a local enrolment and numbering of the population, one of many held in various parts of the Empire. It is true that Luke speaks of it as "a decree from Cæsar Augustus that all the world should be enrolled"; but it is noticeable that he uses the present tense (ἀπογράφεσθαι) which would seem to indicate that what Augustus ordered was a systematic series of enrolments; if he had intended a single enrolment he would have used the aorist. Now, comparatively recent discoveries have shown that periodical enrolments by households were actually made in Egypt under the Roman Empire, the period being one of fourteen years, and if it can be shown that such enrolments were also extended to other parts of the Empire, and that one of the dates for enrolment fell at the time of Jesus' birth, Luke's statement is justified.

But there are indications that such enrolments were made in other parts of the Empire, and there is positive evidence that in Syria, in particular, the first, the second, and the fourth of a series of enrolments, beginning in B.C. 8, and repeated every fourteenth year, were observed.* So that the case for Luke (so it is argued), if it is not completely made out, is at any rate shown to have great probability.

With reference to this argument it must be remarked, that even if the rather obscure evidence be held to support the propositions which the proof requires, the year of the supposed Syrian enrolment is neither that which is generally accepted as the year of Jesus' birth nor that which Dr. Ramsay, the ardent exponent of the theory, favours. If, as is most generally believed, Jesus was born in B.C. 4, Luke, who on the former hypothesis was ten years too late, is by the present hypothesis four years too early. If, as Dr. Ramsay holds, Jesus was born in B.C. 6, there is even then a discrepancy of two years between this date and the year of the Syrian enrolment; a difficulty which the learned apologist evades by supposing that Herod's kingdom was in such a condition at the time when the enrolment was due that it had to be put off till two years later.

On the whole, while this new line of argument may possibly reduce the magnitude of Luke's error, there is still, as it seems to the present writer, not sufficient coincidence to outweigh the probability that the Evangelist was merely supplying an historical setting to the Bethlehem tradition which he had found in some of the "narratives" which he had consulted.

Rabbinic Sources.

But now, how did that Bethlehem tradition arise? The first, and most obvious suggestion is, that although Jesus was really born in Nazareth, the expectation that the Messiah would be born in Bethlehem was so general and so strongly rooted, that the facts of his birth were perverted in order to meet the expectation. Matthew is believed to be voicing the popular belief when he represents the chief priests and scribes as quoting the prophet Micah to prove that Christ must be born in Bethlehem of Judæa.

What weight shall we give to that view? Was the tradition of the synagogue so strong that even deliberate perversion of the facts in order to meet the popular demand is credible? Would the early Christians themselves find it hard to believe that Jesus was the Christ, unless they also believed that he was born in Bethlehem?

Now, even the reader ignorant of Rabbinic Hebrew may to some extent test this question for himself. Dr. Edersheim has given in an appendix to his "Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah" a list of Old Testament passages Messianically applied in ancient Rabbinic writings; and in the American Journal "Hebraica,"† there is a similar list by Dr. Pick, in which a full translation of the Rabbinic texts is printed.

Of these Rabbinic passages, which number more than 500, only four have any bearing on the present inquiry.* One of them, commenting on Isaiah xli. 25, speaks of "Messiah, who is in the North, coming to build the Sanctuary which is in the South," but has no distinct reference to Messiah's birthplace. The other three distinctly say that Messiah is to be born in Bethlehem-Judah or Bethlehem-Ephratah, but two of the three are identical, the one being merely a quotation of the other. There are thus practically only two traditional passages for us to consider, and it may perhaps interest the reader if they are given here in full.

The first is the Targum on Micah v. 2:—"But thou, Bethlehem-Ephratah, thou hast been little to be counted among the thousands of the house of Judah, yet out of thee shall come forth before me Messiah, to exercise dominion over Israel, whose name is spoken of from of old, from the days of eternity." This is, of course, the ancient traditional comment upon which the evangelist Matthew relied.

The other is a very curious story, and raises questions. As given in the Jerusalem Berachoth, it runs as follows:—"A certain Jew was engaged in ploughing. His ox bellowed. An Arab passing, and hearing the ox bellow, said, 'Son of a Jew, son of a Jew, loose thy oxen, and loose thy ploughs, for the Temple is laid waste. The ox bellowed a second time. The Arab said to him, 'Yoke thine oxen, and fit thy ploughs, for King Messiah has just been born.' The Jew said, 'What is His name?' 'Menachem (i.e., Comforter).' He asked further, 'What is the name of his father?' 'Hezekiah,' replied the other. 'Whence is he?' asked the Jew. 'From the royal palace of Bethlehem-Judah,' replied the Arab. At this the Jew sold his oxen and his ploughs, and became a seller of infants' swaddling-clothes. And he went about from town to town till he reached Bethlehem. All women bought of him, but the mother of Menachem bought nothing. When the other women said to her, 'Mother of Menachem! mother of Menachem! come and buy something for thy son,' she replied, 'I would rather strangle the enemy of Israel, for on that same day on which my son was born the Temple was destroyed.' They replied, 'We hope that as the Temple was destroyed for his sake, it will also be rebuilt for his sake.' The mother said, 'I have no money.' The Jew replied, 'What matters it? Buy bargains for him, and if you have no money to-day, after some days I will come back and receive it.' When he came back and inquired of the mother after the welfare of the child, she replied: 'After the time you saw me last, winds and tempests came and snatched him away from me.'"

One would like to know the date of this story, with its allusions to the mother in Bethlehem buying swaddling clothes, and the destruction and re-building of the Temple. For it has to be borne in mind that the Jerusalem Talmud was not completed until about the middle of the fourth century A.D.

---

* "Was Christ Born in Bethlehem?" By W. H. Ramsay. Second Edition, p. 244.

† Encycl. Bibl., "Chronology," col. 808, fn. 2

* Ramsay, p. 167.

† Vols. II.-IV., 1885-1887.

* Jerus. Berachoth, fol. 5, col. 1 (on Psalm xviii. 50); Midrash, on Lam. i. 16; Targum, on Micah v. 2; and Midrash, on Num. vii. 12, where Isaiah xli. 25 is Messianically applied.

In any case, it is plain from the foregoing that there was (at any rate in the Targum quoted) a distinct Rabbinic teaching that the Messiah would be born in Bethlehem of Judæa; but at the same time it is equally plain that there was no great body of teaching to that effect. We do not find in these 500 Rabbinic texts that the reference to Messiah's birthplace is repeated again and again, as we find, for instance, that the prediction that He will come riding upon an ass is repeated. It is clear that the latter belief was popular and widespread; it is not clear that the former was so.

No doubt the fact is to be taken into account that in these Talmudic passages the title Son of David is continually repeated, and was generally and popularly accepted; and perhaps this may have carried with it a popular inference that he would come from David's City. But there is no direct evidence to that effect. And, on the whole, the probability seems to be that, while there was no such general and popular expectation that the Messiah would be born in Bethlehem, as would form an overwhelming demand for the precise fulfilment of the prophecy, there was, nevertheless, such definite Rabbinic teaching on the point as would lead the first Christians to welcome any apparent evidence that such an expectation had been fulfilled.

Was there a "Double Tradition"?

And now, before we enter upon the next important consideration, let us review the position of the argument. The probability so far appears to be that the details of Luke's birth story may be disregarded, but that we have to reckon with a tradition which evidently did exist before his time that Jesus was born at Bethlehem of Judæa. Also that the Rabbinic teaching on the point was hardly so prominent as to make it likely that an overwhelming popular demand for fulfilment created the story, but was sufficiently definite to incline the scale toward Bethlehem if a double tradition, Bethlehem versus Nazareth, could in any other way have arisen.

It remains to show that there is some evidence that such a double tradition actually existed, and that there is a very probable explanation of the way in which it sprang up.

If we take the Gospel of Matthew, and read it by itself, banishing from our minds Luke's theory about the birthplace, we shall find that the assumption is that the parents of Jesus had their home in Bethlehem of Judæa, and that Jesus was born there in consequence of that being their usual domicile. There is no preliminary explanation to the opening statement, "When Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judæa, in the days of Herod the King," such as Luke in his Gospel supplies. Joseph and Mary did not need to be brought to Bethlehem; the story starts there. The flight into Egypt follows, and when the time comes for the Holy Family to return, their first thought is to go back to Judæa, from which they started. Why so, if their home was in Nazareth, and if the visit to Bethlehem had been a brief and casual occurrence brought about by a political duty? In that case their natural intention would be to go home to Nazareth; but this does not enter Matthew's mind. He represents them as intending in the ordinary course of things to go back to their Judæan home, and he has to use a device to get them to Nazareth, where the Nazareth tradition demands that Jesus should be—the story, namely, of the dream warning him to "withdraw into the parts of Galilee"; and so it happened that "He came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth."

Note the phraseology. He did not go home: he withdrew. He did not return to familiar haunts: he proceeded to these outlying parts of Galilee. He did not arrive at the well-known town: he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth.

If we now take the Gospel of Luke, and read the first two chapters without allowing our minds to be influenced by Matthew's Gospel, we shall find that all this is reversed. The story of Jesus opens with the visit of the angel Gabriel to Mary, the betrothal of Joseph in their home at Nazareth, and Luke's device, contrary to that of Matthew, is used to get Jesus to Bethlehem, where he has to be born, to satisfy the Bethlehem tradition. This he does by means of the enrolment story of which we have spoken above, when "Joseph went up from Galilee, out of the City of Nazareth, into Judæa, to the City of David."

Thus we see that Matthew starts with the Bethlehem tradition, and endeavours to account for the Nazareth tradition, while Luke starts with the Nazareth tradition, and endeavours to account for the Bethlehem tradition.

A Suggested Solution.

Suppose, now, that a certain Talmudic phrase referred to by Canon Cheyne in his article "Nazareth," in the "Encyclopædia Biblica," and which he reads as "Bethlehem noseriyyah" (Bethlehem near Nazareth) does indeed represent the name by which the Northern Bethlehem was known, and suppose that in the earliest form of the evangelical tradition this Bethlehem-Nazareth is the place where Jesus was said to have been born, we can easily see how the two-fold tradition would arise. Bethlehem-Nazareth was a little-known place, and some of those who handed on the tradition would say that Jesus was born at Bethlehem, while others would say that he was born at Nazareth. Bethlehem, without the suffix, would naturally be supposed to mean the well-known Bethlehem near Jerusalem. Thus, even if the Rabbinic doctrine that the Messiah was to be born at Bethlehem-Judah was not popular or widespread, the tradition might nevertheless gain footing, and those who knew of the doctrine would appeal to it both as confirming their tradition about the birthplace and as fulfilling Scripture.*

This theory appears to me to gain some confirmation from the fact that another such transference from the Northern to the Southern Bethlehem has almost certainly taken place in the case of the Judge Ibzan. "Ibzan of Bethlehem," says the Book of Judges (xii. 8), "judged Israel," or, as we read in the margin of the Authorised Version, "North-east Israel," and the same Ibzan "was buried in Bethlehem." Josephus and Jewish tradition assign this Ibzan to Bethlehem-Judah, but most scholars take the Bethlehem spoken of to be Bethlehem of Zebulon.*

The literature of this subject is immense, and nothing of course is attempted here but the barest outline of those particular arguments which, to the present writer, have seemed most worth consideration.

Should these lines meet the eye of any Rabbinic scholar, the writer of them would be most grateful for any information as to a pre-Christian popular belief that Messiah would be born in Bethlehem of Judah. What are required are facts which would enable one to estimate the probability that such a belief existed, not merely as a casual Rabbinic interpretation, but as a widespread popular faith. He would also be grateful for information as to the probable date of the passage from "Jerusalem Berachoth" quoted above.

HERBERT RIX.

* cf. Encycl. Bibl. art. "Nazareth."

* Encycl. Bibl. art. "Bethlehem." No. 2.

LET'S PRETEND.

WHEN Spinoza, Kant, Von Leibnitz, Hegel,
Berkeley, and the rest
Weary with prolix endeavour to explain
the things they guess'd,
When there is no balm in Darwin, Maine
seems tedious, Tylor slow;
When encyclopædias mock one with man's paltry claims to know;
When the prizes of persistence loom too small to stir the blood,
And man's spinning cage of sorrow too absurd for bad or good;
When the poets—"grand old masters" or the "simple heartfelt lay"—
Fail to fill the night with music, or lead silent cares away;
When in nothing ever printed is there
note that does not pall,
Lock the importunate speaking dead things in their cases on the wall;
Listen to the clamorous pleading of the ignorant lisping mite
At your knee: "Will you be grandma?"
cheerily respond all right.
Grant the basket-chair is Hastings; make a baby with some "'tring"
Coiled about a sofa-cushion; understand the train must bring
Babe and mother there by tea-time;
seconds stand for hours and days;
"Chapel" is a bureau corner loud with incoherent praise.
Fancy gilds you all the adjuncts, metamorphoses so wild;
No "akasic force" delivers as these day-dreams of a child!
Grandma soon is re-incarnate as a lion or or a whale.
"Shoot-bang-fire" with a poker slays a bull, and of its tail
Springs the snug ward of a "'firmary," where the baby (brought to mind)
In a desperate case, sweet infant, scares its mother out to find Doctor till an early star appears to question (so 'tis said)
Whether little girls and boys are safely tucked away in bed.
Stories first, of course! Wild exploits, spiced with shivers at the end,
Courage re-assured with whispers that it's "only let's be-tend."

Then good-night! and all the wonder of a world unsoiled by care
Slumbers in a cosy cot beneath a wisp of plaited hair!
Yes, a little child may lead us where these wise books from their den
Give no hint of to endungeoned souls of meditative men!
Not as children may we face the imperious "questionings of sense";
Scorn we must in all but children lives evolved of mere pretence.
Yet the seeming play of children is with serious purpose rife;
Scope is there for nascent powers, for the prelude of the strife
That through after years shall broaden into judgments, and define
Good, bad, foolish, wise, subjective, real, illusive, or divine.
Who are we but elder children, scuffling in a noisier game?
Not a thing is worth the winning that inspires a life-long aim!
Yet the aiming is the training of a spirit which shall grow
By the effort to the bending one day of a stronger bow.
So our heads must commune daily with these spirits housed in books,
Still find tongues in trees; dry sermons in blank stones and brawling brooks;
Ever garner hidden meanings, knowing such were never meant!
Follow impulse in the limits conscience sets, and die content.
Yet the heart by sad experience of the head is not dismayed,
Sympathises in the frolics of new gamesters as it played.
Vastly serious in the dimly distant dream-like nursery crib;
One beneath the man's broad waistcoat with the child's beneath its bib.
Still refreshes jaded senses in the marvels without end.
Questionless, astounding, painless, of a game of "Let's pretend!"

H. A. K. J.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Doing One's Best.

I think every boy and girl has a liking or dislike for one lesson more than another. They may dislike one because they find it difficult, or another because they do not feel any interest in it. Interest can be made to grow, and difficulties will lessen with the growth of the brain to grasp things, but until that happens we have our likes and dislikes rather strongly, our "nice Tuesdays" and "horrid Fridays." Perhaps yours are "horrid Tuesdays" and "nice Fridays." It is a good thing we don't all think alike!

Though I was very fond of school work, and liked most of my lessons, I found such difficulty with one or two that I called the days on which those subjects came "my black days"; for they meant, to me, hours of hopeless work, of feeling myself doubly stupid, because I was the eldest but one in the school, and of one long hard struggle to prevent stupidity turning into sullenness, and not trying.

But I want you to take in and remember that they never were quite so hopeless and black after the day I began to fight under the inspiriting motto, "Courage, and keep on." That was said to me once by a teacher for whom I cared very much. I wrote the words in the first page of a rough note-book, into which I had copied a number of helpful things, and which I was glad to have constantly to look at, to remind me of the right way to do my work, and the best things to aim at in life.

I did "keep on," even though I fell many times, but those lines in ink, which I could so often look at quietly, just turned the balance between losing and winning.

I positively disliked anything needing calculation. French translation I merely found uninteresting and slow work, and the books chosen very stupid (probably that fault too lay with me). Whatever I I thought them then, I turn at least to "Capi et sa Troupe" with gratitude and friendly feeling for containing two lines on page fifty which I have never forgotten. I expect they were suggested by the verse, in the Bible, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." In the French story the words are "Sois donc attentif, mon garçon; sois docile, fais de ton mieux ce que tu dois faire. Dans la vie, tout est là."

I will explain them in a minute. I had to wait to find the meaning, too, but having once found it, those words were engraven on my memory and I feel sure I shall never forget them. Perhaps, if I had read them anywhere else they might have slipped away—as many another good thing does, even though it may have impressed us at the time—but this, coming in an uninteresting lesson, and the having to refer to the notes to find the meaning of "tout est là" ("that is everything"), burnt it into my brain; and those words have been an ever-constant help.

Now, what do they mean? Well, I expect many of you can find out the literal meaning for yourselves; but putting it in words an English father, mother, or friend would speak, it is, "Be attentive, my child; be gentle, do your best in whatever you do. In life, that is everything." And indeed it is so, it has seemed to me so true whenever I have stopped to think about it.

When I have had to do something I disliked or wanted to put off till another time, if only I gave myself a good shake, metaphorically speaking, (sometimes literally, too), and then threw my whole "heart, and soul, and mind, and strength" into the duty awaiting to be done, I would find that not only was it less difficult or disagreeable, but I would often get much pleasure out of it after all, and certainly feel the better for it.

Now I am going to confess to you what happened one evening at school—I was away from home—I think it must have been on a day when French and Arithmetic came! Arithmetic was harder to me even than French, and I got no satisfaction out of it at all; as far as I could see then, it was just something to make me feel more stupid and cross and give me more disagreeable work still, in correcting all the sums that refused to come right. Now I can see that it was not only exercising my brain—which needed it all the more because it was so stupid—but that the very struggle, day after day, not to feel cross over it was strengthening me in other ways.

But on this special day, I remember, that little ugly imp "Don't Care" had got me in his firm grip! When the time for evening preparation came, he still held me, and I sat down to my work with him firmly seated on my shoulder and using my things! Though my dear helper and teacher sat opposite to me and I knew how grieved she would be, when she corrected that French exercise, to read between the lines the mood in which I had written it—as she would assuredly have done; and though I felt a little ashamed of myself, I let "Don't Care" write it. It was full of mistakes, many of which I saw, others which I could have found out!

But, fortunately, that is not the end of my story.

Next morning I thought better of it, got up earlier than usual and wrote it out carefully on the next page. A rule of the school forbade my tearing out a page, and there they remained—the bad and the good—side by side. Of course, I had to tell my teacher—I would have done any way—and I can remember how different I felt and how happy she looked when she saw the second exercise, carefully prepared on one side and a ruled line right across the carelessly scribbled original one. The exercise was not even then perfect, but I had honestly done my best.

Now, always try to do your best in all you do, work or play, and your best of to-day will prove a "better best" in the months and years to come. By degrees you will find the rough, stony places will get less difficult to cross, and you will be sure to find—if you look for them—little flowers of encouragement and help in between the stones. "Choose always the way that seems the best, however rough it be."

Another good resulting from the struggle with self is that it is something added to the character which will help to strengthen it, as a buttress built firmly against a building. "Whatsoever you win in life you must conquer by your own efforts, and then it is yours—a part of yourself."

I trust and hope that you will decide with me to have "Courage, and keep on."

L. O. H.

Look within. Within is the fountain of good, and it will ever bubble up if thou wilt ever dig. Marcus Antoninus.

Our residence in Westmoreland attaches us all to it more and more; the refreshment it affords me is wonderful; and it is especially so in the winter, when the country is quieter, and actually, as I think, more beautiful than in summer. I was often reminded, as I used to come home to Grasmere of an evening, and seemed to be quite shut in by the surrounding mountains, of the comparison of the hills standing about Jerusalem with God standing about his people. The impression which the mountains gave me was never one of bleakness or wildness, but of a sort of paternal shelter and protection to the valley.—Dr. Thomas Arnold.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom, or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, AUGUST 15, 1903.

FREDERICK WILLIAM ROBERTSON.

IT is fifty years to-day (August 15) since "ROBERTSON of Brighton" died, but of him it may truly be said, "He being dead, yet speaketh." The times have certainly changed. "Tendencies to heresy," for which he was severely criticised, are now no longer regarded as "dangerous"; they are hardly important enough to be noticed. He lived in the strenuous days when to insist upon strict adhesion to the creeds and articles was regarded as the plain duty of all good churchmen, and when it was a matter of intense interest to define what was the doctrine of the church. Midway in his brief career at Brighton (1847–1853), the famous "Gorham controversy" arose respecting the meaning of the rite of baptism. Must a clergyman believe in the regenerating efficacy of this sacrament? Yes, said the Arches Court of Canterbury. Not necessarily, said the judicial committee of the Privy Council, which is supreme. So, after a two years' fight, the victory lay with the party of indefiniteness. The Evangelicals rejoiced at liberty to remain in the church without compulsion to adopt high sacerdotalism. The sacerdotal party, by this time somewhat weary of their attempts to maintain against Rome, that Anglicans, in spite of the Reformation, were sound Catholics, lost by further desertions to the enemy, among the deserters being MANNING. The secession of J. H. NEWMAN in 1845 had sufficiently alarmed men already.

But there were others in the wide fold of the English Church besides Evangelicals and High Churchmen. There was THOMAS ARNOLD, for example, who pleaded for the most inclusive National Church; while F. D. MAURICE began interpreting its theology in terms that made conforming possible to the most speculative. JOHN STERLING had found himself finally able to conform, despite the unsettlement of his convictions by the study of German orthodoxy. Under the old banner, despite the revolutionary spirit of the age, CHARLES KINGSLEY was content to march on his valiant way as a social reformer, and to preach a gospel radiant with commonsense. Among such diverse elements lay young ROBERTSON'S path, lead where it would.

Born in 1816 of a family of soldiers, he meant to be a soldier too, though his father preferred for him a lawyer's life. After a year in an office, steps were taken to get him an officer's commission. Difficulties arose, and meanwhile, his was the delicate temperament of mind and body that so often is found peculiarly responsive to religious impressions. To the end of his short life he retained a certain martial enthusiasm, but now the ministry's call was clear. In 1837 he went to study at Oxford, steeped in an evangelical fervour which only increased in contact with the struggle going on there around NEWMAN. After ordination, a few brief clerical engagements occupied him, notably one at St. Ebbe's, Oxford. In 1847 he was appointed incumbent at Trinity Chapel, Brighton, and in six short years his life's great work was done.

Two aspects of that work arise for consideration. They concern respectively the matter and the manner of his preaching. We have said he began as an Evangelical. The grave simplicities of the evangelical mood, its deep conviction of spiritual realities, its sense of sin and passionate love for the Redeemer were evident in his early years. Had he not been a student, and had there been no such problems and tendencies in the world as developed a THEODORE PARKER ("Discourse," 1842) or a W. R. GREG ("Creed of Christendom," 1851), ROBERTSON might have been known to fame as a sort of cultured SPURGEON. But as upon STERLING, so upon him, fell the penalty of eating the fruit of knowledge. He had his troubled period, like many another who, after vivid and searching soul-experiences not to be denied, has been forced to question their intellectual bases. It cannot be doubted that ROBERTSON'S own experience lay at the back of that notable utterance which has been often quoted and which is specially worth quoting to-day :—

> It is an awful moment (he says) when the soul begins to feel that the props on which it blindly rested so long are, many of them, rotten, and begins to suspect them all; when it begins to feel the nothingness of many of the traditionary opinions which have been received with implicit confidence, and in that horrible insecurity begins also to doubt whether there be anything to believe at all. It is an awful hour, let him who has passed through it say how awful, when this life has lost its meaning, when the grave appears to be the end of all, human goodness nothing but a name, and the sky above this universe a dead expanse, black with the void from which GOD has disappeared. In that fearful loneliness of spirit, when those who should have been his friends and councillors only frown upon his misgivings, and profanely bid him stifle doubts which, for aught he knows, may arise from the Fountain of truth itself, I know but one way in which a man may come forth from his agony scathless; it is by holding fast to those things which are certain still, the grand, simple landmarks of morality. In the darkest hour through which a human soul can pass, whatever else is doubtful, this at least is certain :—If there be no God and no future state, yet, even then it is better to be generous than selfish, better to be chaste than licentious, better to be true than false, better to be brave than to be a coward. Blessed, beyond all earthly blessedness, is the man, who in the tempestuous darkness of the soul has dared to hold fast to these venerable landmarks. Thrice blessed is he who, when all is drear and cheerless within and without when his teachers terrify him, and his friends shrink from him, has obstinately clung to moral good. Thrice blessed, because his night shall pass into clear bright day. I appeal to the recollection of any man that has passed through that hour of agony, and stood upon the rock at last, the surges stilled below him, and the last cloud drifted from the sky above, with a faith and hope and trust no longer traditional, but of his own—a faith which neither earth nor hell shall shake thenceforth for ever.

Finally, though with pain, he "beat his music out," as the contemporary poet sang ("In Memoriam," 1850). The tone of that music is, perhaps, best indicated by his remark on "In Memoriam." "To my mind and heart," said ROBERTSON, "the most satisfactory things that have ever been said on the future state are contained in this poem." When a man has reached this stage he will dogmatise no more. Authority from without, sacred traditions, forms, whether of words or ceremony, are esteemed at their proper worth. Provisionally useful, permanently suggestive they may be; but the centre of things is elsewhere. From his intellectual Wanderjahre, ROBERTSON, rich in literary lore and with clear critical power, came back to preach the "Life according to CHRIST," the virtuous, vigorous, open-eyed life, assisted, no doubt, by what the Church may supply from its accumulated stores of ripe thought and rich experience, but never to be dominated by its helpers. The immanent Divinity, for the surer consciousness of which he had chiefly to thank WORDSWORTH'S poetry, was the all-sufficient truth to him. Without it churches, creeds, sacraments, Bibles, could profit nothing; with it, even the Unitarian was in the right way to salvation. "The highest revelation," he said, in words which might have been written by MARTINEAU ("Endeavours," 1843), though not by every Unitarian writer of that day, "is not made by Christ, but comes directly from the Universal Mind to our minds." It was the profound conviction of this intimacy between God and the human soul that kindled his speech with the fires of the spirit.

Of his wonderful gift of utterance some still living are able to testify; but for most of us, as for future generations, the unsatisfying task is set of linking as best we may the imperfect records of his sermons to all we can gather by way of description of his person, voice, and manner.

His "sermons" have been published again and again, but even in the midst of the reader's grateful wonder, and the reverent hush that silences mere analytic criticism, there is a sense of something wanting. It may be said that all pulpit literature suffers in the same way. The sacrifice imperatively demanded of the great preacher is that his best shall pass with him. He may be considered fortunate whose second-best penetrates to the understanding of sympathetic readers. But beside the loss of the personal presence in ROBERTSON'S case, his sermons, as printed, are not infrequently defective. Sentences are disjointed, paragraphs are brief and bare. The path of thought is at times indicated rather than adequately preserved. He was reluctant, we are told, to write down his own recollections of sermons after delivery. The reluctance may be understood. The lyric mood can hardly be expected to cage itself to order. Whether the shorthand reporter would have done him justice we cannot tell. But it is important to observe that he left upon the minds of judicious hearers a feeling not only of religious stimulus, but of mental enlightenment. He was too deeply imbued with the master-pieces of literature to forget that preaching, like poetry, has its laws. Exact in spite of exuberance, alluring and attractive notwithstand ng profoundest earnestness, his style remains for the student amongst the highest examples of the preacher's art. When such a man is in the pulpit there is no talk of failure. Multitudes flocked to hear ROBERTSON, all sorts and conditions of men. Some, no doubt, went because others did, some to have their ears tickled. But to others, to many, he was the true prophet of the Word. The soul that dared, if need be, to walk alone, was the soul that was listened to and loved.

HAARLEM, LEYDEN, ALKMAAR.

II.

HAARLEM having fallen, after a full seven months' siege, in spite of the heroic efforts of its citizens and their would-be relievers, Alva the pitiless, in the name of Philip the fanatic, called to the rest of defiant Holland to surrender at discretion. "Notwithstanding your manifold crimes," he said, "his Majesty still seeks, like a hen calling her chickens, to gather you all under the parental wing." The Spanish sense of humour appears to have been defective.

As for the Hollanders, neither the entreaty of the general, nor his fiercest threat backed up by the sight and sound of the ruin he had already wrought, moved them to the weakness of yielding. There were two chief centres of resistance, Alkmaar, about twenty miles to the north of Haarlem, and Leyden, a similar distance to the south. In each of these a lesson was preparing for the Spanish and for the world on the worth of a good cause to a feeble folk.

Alkmaar had received in the middle of July (1573) a peremptory summons to receive Alva's troops. It refused, and for a few weeks the enemy had sufficient occupation in pillage and mutiny to leave the little town alone. But by August 21, an army of sixteen thousand beleagured it. Within its walls the total force available was a garrison of eight hundred soldiers sent by William "the Silent," and some thirteen hundred burghers, all who were capable of bearing arms. "There on that bank and shoal, the extreme verge of the habitable earth, the spirit of Holland's freedom stood at bay." Frenzied by such hardy, not to say foolhardy, opposition, Alva declared to Philip that if he took Alkmaar not a single creature should remain alive; he would "put the knife to every throat." It was with regret he expressed himself thus.

Desperate measures were evidently called for to repel so strong an enemy animated by so fierce a spirit. William's resources, at home and abroad, had already been taxed to the utmost in the endeavour, unhappily fruitless, to relieve Haarlem. Where could a friendly force be found in whose alliance the adverse balance of battle could be redressed? An inspiration came to the citizens. Might not those floods that had often devastated the land in times of tempest, and against which at all times they had to maintain barriers with ceaseless vigilance, prove in this dire emergency a friend and not a foe? They had but to cut the dykes here and there, and to open the sluice gates of the Zyp, and the tides would flow in, mile after mile, and render the position of the besiegers untenable. Such a measure, however, involved great destruction of crops and other property, and to gain the consent of the scattered farmers an envoy must go round.

Peter Van der Mey, a carpenter of the city, volunteered, and set forth with letters to leading men in the provinces. For safety's sake the papers were carefully concealed in a hollow walking-staff. He went not a moment too soon. Don Frederic, Alva's son, who was in command, ordered an assault on September 18. It was made after a prolonged cannonade, and in apparently overwhelming force. But, as at Haarlem, so at Alkmaar, every available missile was used with deadly effect by the defenders, the women and children being equally engaged with the men. After three advances, all in vain, darkness covered the retreat of the discomfited Spanish, who left, it is said, a thousand dead, while the citizens lost less than forty. Daunted by this valiant repulse, Don Frederic's troops refused to attack next day.

And now the land around the camp was becoming "plashy," for already the waters were being let in upon the fields. Preparations were ripe for the final stroke that would admit the full forces of the tides. Peter, the carpenter, had not trudged about in vain; and now he came back, staff in hand, stealing through the lines of the besiegers as best he could. Fortunately unfortunate, he was nearly captured, and the staff, with its precious contents of despatches detailing the plot to flood the country, fell into the enemy's hands. Having quite sufficient evidence that the scheme thus revealed was in practical working, Don Frederic hastily gathered up his forces, and on October 8 he fled, not before the Hollanders, but before the North Sea!

Here was something like a set-off to the loss of Haarlem, and three days later a Spanish fleet was signally beaten at Enkhuizen in the Zuyder Zee. Encouraged by these tidings from the north, the men of Leyden, in the south, summoned in their turn to surrender, sturdily refused. November opened on the city with a great force investing it. It was not at first an active siege. The fact was that Alva himself, the cruel, the abominable, was now withdrawn from the Governorship of the Netherlands; and, though the struggle was still long continued, it never was quite the same after this period. Among the crowded events of the period one only need detain us here, but it claims special attention from its bearing on the fortunes of the famous city of Leyden.

Among the brothers of William of Orange, worthy of the kinship, was Count Louis, a valiant captain, who once and again had played a man's part in the great campaign against the oppressors of his country. In this winter (1573–74) he was engaged in collecting such German mercenary forces as he could, chiefly by funds raised among Huguenot sympathisers, and with such success that by March 21 the Spanish troops had to be called away from the investment of Leyden to meet him in the field. This respite, however, was but temporary. Louis' bright hopes of proving the saviour of his country were tragically disappointed. His army was totally defeated (April 14) at Mook (west of Cleves), and he and his brother Henry died on the fatal field. A formidable mutiny among the Spanish, the majority of whom marched off to seize and plunder Antwerp, prolonged for a time the respite of Leyden; but, before the end of May, Valdez was before the city with a vast force, and the real terror of the siege began.

What a siege it was! The Leydeners had, unhappily, allowed their breathing-space to slip by unused, in spite of William's advice: and now they paid the penalty. The lines of investment were drawn close about the city, and from sixty-two redoubts the cannonading went on. From their "Burg," in the centre of the city, a tower of Roman origin probably, the watchmen looked out day after day and week after week for the relief that was so terribly slow in coming. "Hold out for three months," wrote William. They grimly set themselves to apportion the rations, and soon the pinch was sorely felt. "Only turn Catholics and you will be pardoned," said Valdez, who had resolved to reduce the city by starvation rather than attempt an assault. Letters also came to the city from the "Glippers"—deserters—who besought their countrymen to have pity on their own wives and children, and to accept the "pardon" offered. The men of Leyden, even if they had been less sincerely Protestant than they were, might well be excused for doubting the offers of their enemy.

While the citizens thus held out, the Spanish took vigorous measures to prevent relief. The coast lay in their hands.

William's own position, south of the city, was seriously threatened. At length the desperate expedient that had delivered Alkmaar was resolved upon. Lieven bedorven dan verloren land—better a drowned land than a lost land. On August 3 the dykes were broken, and the Rotterdam water gates were opened, nigh a score miles away from Leyden, it is true, but only on lines so large was the problem, if at all, to be solved. Two hundred shallow vessels with provisions and armed men were assembled at the nearest point (south) to make the journey over the submerged land when the waters prevailed sufficiently. But when would that be?

The Leydeners reported on August 21 that only four days' food was left, and that mere maltcake. "Hold on," replied William, "the dykes are cut." The "Gilppers," however, assured the Spanish that the effort to reach the city by boats was absolutely impossible. Taunts by the besiegers daily embittered the pangs of famine and disease. The twenty-seventh of the month was reached, and renewed assurances of coming help were sent; but William, the great head and heart of the struggle, was now lying perilously sick at Rotterdam. A report that the city had fallen almost crushed the life out of him. A report, better founded, that it had not, cheered him into recovery.

September had now begun, and the "Wild Beggars of the Sea" spread sail and tugged oar across the drowned pastureland to reach the city fifteen miles away. For some ten miles the course was fairly easy; but then the huge dykes that had protected the city in times of peace proved heartrending obstacles. This way, that way, all devices were tried; the banks were pierced, the boats shouldered through gaps and over shallows, and hope, nearly quenched, lived on from spark to spark as from their "Burg" the besieged saw the sails of their countrymen drawing so slowly nearer. It was the 18th of the month when a great north-west equinoctial sprang up, and the tides swelled beneath the keels, enabling them to make one more advance to the last great land barriers before the town. Then the wind dropped again, changed to the east, and a week, ten, twelve days crept by, while within a mile of the starving citizens the relievers gained but a yard or two at a time.

At last, at last, on October 1 the great nor-wester blew again, on the second a sou-wester hurried up to the work, and the welcome tides came along in a flood. The Spanish forces raised siege in the dark night, and, on the morning of the third, Leyden welcomed her deliverers within the ruined ramparts. The chroniclers tell that when the inhabitants, gathered around their burgomaster, tried to sing a hymn of thanksgiving, they broke down for weakness and joy. The generations have been trying to get that hymn finished.

Twelve months after the relief of Leyden, the provinces of Holland and Zeeland formally renounced allegiance to Spain. Under William's sagacious leadership, in the face of many difficulties, and troubled by internal dissensions, the young republic went slowly but surely forward. William himself was banned by Philip, and an immense bribe was offered for his assassination. In 1584 (July 10) he was shot at Delft. The crime that cut short his life doubtless minimised the ultimate development of his country, great as that was; but his cause remained uninjured, and its battle has been fought in many lands. In 1588 the great Armada was defeated. In 1598 Philip II. died amid evident signs that his ideals like his empire were passing away. We know how, in the next century, freedom's struggle in this country had to be fought against the Stuarts, and how it was to the great-grandson of William the Silent that Englishmen turned for a leader in the hour when the defence of their liberties united sensible men of all parties against James II., as against a Philip born out of due time. But to trace all the results of the Dutchmen's famous struggle against political and ecclesiastical tyranny demands the study of modern history at large, and little Holland's mark lies broad on the map of the world.

W. G. Tarrant.

IN PRAISE OF HOLLAND.

V.—CYCLING TOURS.

Let me conclude these sketchy papers, which I daresay have given more pleasure to the writer than to the reader, by telling something of the possibilities of cycle touring in the Netherlands. The flatness of the land would lead the cyclist to expect that the great factor which has to be taken into account in planning a cycling outing—the presence of hills—has been removed. But if there are no hills, there is wind to be struggled against, and where possible circumvented. A strong wind in front is a hill that has no top, and the wind blows over the Netherlands quite unrestrained, and the force is felt all the more that many of the roads are elevated on unprotected dykes.

So on starting, instead of looking at your map for the gradients, look out of the window and see in what direction the wind is blowing.

Amsterdam is the centre of a very delightful cycling neighbourhood, and I have before me a little book of the Netherlands Cycling Club, giving descriptions of 109 rides from Amsterdam and back, the longest of which is sixty miles.

In Friesland.

Here is a route which the wind did much to break up. A start was made from Amsterdam early in the forenoon. We crossed the ferry over the Y to Tolhuis, and, passing three small villages on the way, bravely struggled against the wind—which, by the way, at one point, unsaddled one of us—alongside the Noord Holland Canal for ten miles to the market town of Purmerend. Here a halt was made for dinner, and a stroll through the town, accompanied by a bodyguard of extra-curious boys and girls, who, with Dutch persistence hailed us as countrymen of "Chamberlain."

At Purmerend we took the train for Enkhuisen, an ancient city on the Zuider Zee, which has seen better and busier days. A steamer ferries you across the Zee to Stavoren, and, as it was getting dark, we took train from there to Sneek, where we stayed the night. Sneek had a market and a clean old town to show us, but did not detain us long. The wind had not dropped in the night, and it was hard work to cycle seven miles along pleasant pastureland to Bolsward. Bolsward Church has some good wood-carving worth seeing and photographing; also a tower, which gives a grand view of the lie of the land. The ride to Leeuwarden, Friesland's capital, was compensation for the morning's hard work; the wind was almost behind us, and blew us along in a fashion to make some of us shout with delight. At Leeuwarden we spent the evening and night to our quiet satisfaction, and were off in the morning so as to reach Heerenveen, 34 miles off, before dark if possible. This part of Friesland is beautifully wooded, much of the road consists of avenues of fine trees which sheltered from us the wind and sun, and such charming little villages were passed; and after dark we wheeled in fearsome procession with two lights to four of us up to the modest but very comfortable inn at Heerenveen. The great part of the next day was spent in summer heat, in and among the shady lanes of the orange wood. Here the cycling ended, and the train took charge of us en route for home.

Utrecht—Arnhem—Nijmegen.

As an Easter outing, two of us started from Utrecht on an expedition awheel for three or four days. Arnhem was our first goal. We left Utrecht by the lovely Maliebaan, and by a nicely wooded road reached Zeist, one of the headquarters of the Moravian Brotherhood. We now struck for the Rhine (here called the Lek), which we reached at the quaint little town of Wijk-bij-Durstede. It was no easy work to wake up the innkeeper to the actual necessity of providing us with a midday meal. A breezy run on the top of the dykes brought us to Amerongen a little way off the river, but we reached its banks again at Rhenen with its stately church tower. Wageningen came next, and then the road through wood and over Dutch hills or hillocks led us through pouring rain to Arnhem where the Hotel de Zon gave welcome and hospitality after a forty mile ride. Arnhem and its charming surroundings kept us a couple of days. We then crossed the Rhine by the bridge of boats, and tried to cycle to Nijmegen. My more juvenile companion managed it, and came back along the road and found me worsted in my struggle with the wind, which had not only unsaddled me, but obliged me from time to time to resort to walking. We reached Nijmegen at last, but hurried through to a favourite spot of mine—Berg-en-Dal (Hill and Dale)—about three miles out of the town, a hotel actually built on the crest of a hill, and there we had a midday meal with a view of the winding Waal and Rhine at out feet, a not unworthy rival of Richmond Hill. A hill too steep to cycle down—and in flat Holland too—led to the boundary between Holland and Germany, and a sheltered road alongside pleasant, comfortable-looking villas, took us back to Nijmegen. The wind caused a change of plan, and we took train to Vlissingen for a couple of days' happy cycling on Walcheren Island.

Through Limburg.

In the south-east corner of the Netherlands lies a little province called Limburg, in shape like a leg of mutton with a swollen knuckle, wedged in between its twin sister, Limburg, of the kingdom of the Belgians, and the kingdom of Prussia, and it draws its language and coinage impartially from each of the three kingdoms; one of its strong ties to its ten half-sisters of the kingdom of the Netherlands is its postage stamp.

Three of us set out one autumn to explore this garden of the Netherlands on cycle. Hertogenbosch (Duke's Wood), a long name shortened into 'S Bosch, was our starting point. We got there by train at breakfast time one morning, and spent the whole of the day in making the acquaintance of the town which was just on the eve of its annual Kermess—an annual holiday kept up like the "Wakes" of Lancashire and Cheshire—and of its surroundings, including a visit to the castle of Heeswijk, a well-preserved mediæval abode.

The next day we tried the shorter way to Nijmegen, but half an hour over cobbles which threatened to continue for ever, convinced us that the longer road could not be worse and might be better; so we retraced our tracks a bit and got to the roads, which we never regretted, and bowled along pleasantly until dinner-time found us at the little market town of Veghel, with a modern church adorned with charming frescoes of New and Old Testament stories. Our next stretch of road was not so easy to find, and we had to gather our route from the strong dialect of folk at work on the roads or fields. Towards evening we wheeled into Grave, formerly a fortified town, on the banks of the Maas. After tea we crossed the ferry, and the view of town, bank, and sky, as we were noiselessly swung over the stream in the glow of the setting sun, was very memorable. By the time we had got to the opposite bank the cycle lamps had to be lighted. The stars shone brightly through the avenues of trees as we sped along. We skirted the brightly lit town of Nijmegen and once on the Berg-en-Dal road we had a merry ride, mostly uphill to the hotel where a kindly welcome, substantial supper and cheerful bedroom awaited us after our forty mile run.

Our quarters at Berg-en-Dal were much to our mind; it was a good centre for cycling, but our object was still ahead of us.

We went by train to Venloo, and there took to the wheel, and on the second evening reached Maastricht, staying a night on the road, at Roermond. A more delightful and varying fifty miles of wood, hill, village, castle, and river it would be difficult to find, and many delightful little pictures of land and people we carried away with us.

In conclusion, you specially need, to appreciate Holland at its due value, a sympathy with all things human, and to give this free play a little knowledge of Dutch is a great help.

ROTATOR SENEX.

THE recollection of men who have signalised themselves by great thoughts or great deeds seems as if to create for a time a purer atmosphere around us; and we feel as if our aims and purposes were unconsciously elevated. Smiles.

AT ASSISI.

READERS of M. Sabatier's Life of St. Francis know Assisi as the sympathetic, the inevitable background in a marvellously living portrait. And for the visitor to the little city of pilgrimage on the sunny slope of Mount Subasio, Francis is the interpreter, the impersonation of its charm. In him, as we have learnt to know him, the characteristic qualities of Assisi speak to us in human language, and the meaning of this joyous corner of the broad Umbrian plain with its mountainous horizon becomes clear to our inner vision.

But if in Francis we have the key to this landscape, that is not to say that its Umbrian flavour can be readily suggested or its meaning translated into the English tongue; for how shall one perfectly learn the quality of Francis himself without some passing glimpse of this background, which alone can complete the picture of the man? It is true we have in him one of the purest examples of religious genius—that is to say, one of the most universal, least particularist of men; but, if the least particularist, then also the most individual, in every thought and deed most truly himself. And if himself, then surely mid-Italian, Umbrian, Assisan through and through. For a nebulous cosmopolitanism is the antithesis of genius, which always, through life, bears subtle marks of the parish, nay the very homestead to which it belongs. So, of Assisi and its saint, we can only say they are inseparable and together interpret one another.

As I write on the western terrace of the Hotel Subasio, the beautiful double church and monastery of San Francisco almost fills my picture. It is the monument of that Brother Elias whom Francis loved from the first, but who never from the first could wholly accept the ideal of the Brothers Minor. Looking proudly out across the plain from the eminence which was once the Golgotha of Assisi, it seems to embody the devotion of "il poverello" to the Imperial Church and all the perplexity and struggle that ensued upon it. Under this hill of stone, glowing into orange and gold in the wonderful tracery of its rose window, and soaring up to its campanile with the great clanging bells, securely lie the canonised bones of the orthodox saint—one does not seek here for an embodiment either of his spirit or his work. Hither it is that the faithful followers of tradition come, the hosts of foreign priests and pilgrims, on high days: noisy they seem and secular, as knowing not whom they serve.

Behind me the town climbs steeply and culminates in the towers of the mediæval castle, with its tale of old and stormy days, its legends of Totilla, of Charlemagne, of Frederick II. The town itself is full of history from Etruscan times to our own—and reminds us that Francis was only one—if the greatest—of its sons, and Clare but one among its daughters. On a feast or a fair-day it is full, besides, of life and colour. Then you may see bright groups of friendly peasant folk in all the streets and churches and piazzas. The town no longer seems too large for its inhabitants, a place of the past, half deserted and not a little melancholy.

We have lost count of the festas, so fast do they follow one another. As ecclesiastical pageants they serve admirably to please and amuse a simple folk—always an easier matter, and more immediately profitable, than to educate them. The functionaries, too, are more than sufficient; the priests and monks are one in ten of the population. Especially in Whit-week is Assisi delightfully occupied. On Whit Sunday a pot fair occupies the space in front of San Pietro, and the waters of the Tescio are blessed; it is the turn of the country-side on Monday, and besides there is a procession of magnificent hierarchical millinery; and, best of all, a beast fair in the green Piazza Nuova on Wednesday. For the happy visitor it is one almost continuous pageant of delightful colour and more delightful faces, a gay human stream flowing all the time along the narrow streets.

There is a responsiveness about these people which breaks through our Northern sheaths of insulation. When you are buying biscotti the good man will take you into his parlour, offer his liqueurs, show you his garden and present you with a posy; and in the public gardens, while you are idly listening to the nightingales, and looking out from your nook among the ilexes to where the tall campanile of Santa Chiara cuts across the rich background of the plain, some old woman with bare feet and a headkerchief will come and join you, bringing an inarticulate grandchild, and will presently tell you about herself and her family. There is often a sadness in such gossiping, the people are so poor, and we who come to enjoy their city and do reverence to their Saint bring them so little help. Even if his spirit of love and service stir in our hearts we seem able to effect nothing among these folk whom Francis loved and whose poverty he succoured. English theories of an organised and impersonal charity may perhaps serve in a country with a poor law and a C.O.S., though even there "the gift without the giver is bare"; but Italy has neither the law nor the Society. The duty of "giving to him that asketh" becomes therefore an urgent and personal one. Here are women who must bring up families on a mere handful of sous each month, earned by long days of scrambling on the steep mountain sides after firewood. They are not wanted even for the arduous, ill-paid labour of the fields. If, then, they eke out their tiny income by begging, they beg by a sort of right, and it is almost criminal to refuse them.

Of these and many other Assisan matters the hurrying tourist guesses nothing. Happy is he who is content to see less and to learn more—who will stay here till he catches the flavour and enters into the life of a place so far removed from the business of the greater cities. He will not linger too much over the frescoes in the clammy Lower Church. Even the Temple of Minerva, San Rufino, Santa Chiara, and Santa Maria degli Angeli will not hold him long; like Francis, he will seek the meaning of Assisi in the faces of the peasants and the open country side—upon some flowery bank above the ravines of the Tescio, crowded with a myriad blossoms, and scarlet-crested with poppies against the May sky; or among the birds in the woods of the Carceri, in the quiet of the trees—ilex, oak, and maple—where the mountain air is good to breathe, and the plain spreads out beneath you like a map. Or, best of all, perhaps, on the lane-side among the grey olives and the shimmering oats by the little settlement of San Damiano, where the peasants come and go in the cool evening, and where the true Franciscan spirit of liberty continued longest.

To come to Assisi as one goes to Florence or to Rome, with intellectual problems and pre-occupations, is to miss its inner meaning. Assisi stands apart from all that. It is the place for quite another pilgrimage. Here one would fain put off the shoes of historical curiosity from one's feet to seek the presence of Life itself—that inner reality whereof history, art, and philosophy do but speak. Has it not a voice of its own if we would listen, deeper, more resonant than theirs?

So, indeed, Francis believed; and it is because he heard and obeyed the voice that he lives, even among us, the life eternal, while those who dogmatised and dreamed and doubted about it trouble the world no longer.

Men of the mediæval and of the modern world have gone out of the Catholic faith into one or other of two great heresies, seeking to live solely in the life of contemplation or in the life of action. But the catholic heart of Francis knew too much of the essence of life to fall into the mediæval error: he had too large an experience of the love of God to attempt to part it from the love of man: illumination and service, labour and prayer were never separated in his life. It is after all the only mysticism worthy of the name. The true mysticism can never be a philosophy or a dream; it is the life of love, the life evangelical.

In Francis as in few others, the Art of Love came to its flower. They call him the herald of the Renaissance—and it is fitting that the rediscovery of the greatest and most universal of the fine arts should come first. He only who lives under the law of liberty is free, and able to deliver the spirits in prison, whatever be their bondage. And for Francis, as for every true mystic, love was liberty. It was the identification of the individual not merely with the law but with the purpose and heart of life. All his story is an amplification of the human conception of love. He re-stated the proposition of Jesus in the same authoritative and unmistakable language of life, which alone can claim to be the Word of God, because it alone has the fulness of Reality. What love means has ever been the problem and inquiry of the saint: it has a thousand meanings which no single individual can realise, which await for their perfect realisation the experience of humanity. Jesus and Francis are two of the divine definitions of love.

It is, I believe, because Paul Sabatier has read this meaning in the story of St. Francis, that his book has so much more than a "literary" charm and value, and possesses that vital, life-enhancing quality which characterises the true works of art. For matters merely "literary" I suspect he has a fine contempt; he is too much alive to be interested in anything formal or academic, whether it call itself art, religion, or politics. Dogmas—negative and positive alike—he detests, they hamper the growth of life.

But with living things he has the keenest sympathy, and especially with the living spirit of social progress. He has all the suspicion of theories, schemes, and organisations which belongs to one who has practical insight into the methods of spiritual development. He believes in actual personal contact as the dynamic force of social education; that is to say, of progress. In the equal, intelligent, free co-operation of groups of men and women of all ranks for mutual service and for social evangelisation he has the greatest faith.

To live daily with Francis is to be nourished upon the bread of such practical idealism. And it is well, for a superficial popularity is as great a danger to the Franciscan ideal in the twentieth century as it was in the thirteenth. One asks oneself sometimes whether the new disciples of the poverello will escape the spirit of compromise and the taint of hypocrisy which overtook his followers of old. It is a question one dare not answer: but one believes that the spiritual order of the Brothers Minor is immortal even as Francis beheld it; that in every age there has continued a scattered family of his children in whom his ideal has found flesh and blood, and in whom, even to-day, it is the Word of Life. They are the true mystics—whom no outward church can hold within its bounds, for their fellowship is in the kingdom of the Spirit, their service in the liberty and obedience of Love.

RICHARD ASKHAM.

SIR,—Travellers who pass through Assisi are painfully impressed by the number of children who beg from them in the streets and churches. The greater part of this mendicancy is not due to idleness or want of thrift. The people of Assisi are always very poor, and a bad season like the present, in which the crops upon which shey depend have been destroyed by ttorms, reduces them to actual destitution. For the destitute in Italy there is no State relief.

Hitherto we have been unable to find a remedy for this deplorable condition of things, but I can now, with deep satisfaction, inform all those who are interested in the Seraphic City, or who have a feeling of gratitude towards it, that a society for the Refezione Scolastica has been founded. Once every day during the winter each child attending the public elementary schools of Assisi will there receive a meal of nourishing soup.

Thus we hope with one effort to gain a two-fold result. The children will be fed, and the schools—of which I cannot speak too highly—will be attended by many who, up to the present time, have wandered the streets, and have been practically forced to demand charity from the public. I am convinced that it is only by education that the condition of the people can be permanently ameliorated.

I appeal to all the friends that Assisi numbers in England for aid in this excellent work, and shall be happy to transmit any gifts to the committee. The need is more or less constant, but a sum of at least five hundred pounds is required for the coming winter. If more should be received it would form the nucleus of a fund for the future.

Subscriptions may be sent to me either by cheque or post office order (made payable at Assisi), and will be acknowledged by me, accompanied by an official receipt from the treasurer of the society, Count Antonio Fiume. A copy of the accounts of the Society will be sent to any friend who expresses the wish to receive it.

PAUL SABATIER.

Hotel Subasio, Assisi, Italy,

A COTTAGE PRAYER MEETING.

THE little chapel which most of us attend stands alone in a wide district. So when we determined to "observe the week of prayer" arranged by the Evangelical Alliance, the question was, with whom to ally ourselves? Finally, we hit upon a plan for holding the meetings amongst ourselves. Our hamlet is half a mile from the chapel, and boasts, as yet, no place of worship, so called. On our outskirts there lives a gardener, who offered the use of his "front room" for one of the meetings; "'e and 'is dear wife would be mos' pleased." An aged widow living two miles off across the common offered another room; a third was volunteered by a family living near the Park. And so on, till five meetings were arranged. Night by night our minister led his flock to these outposts, and we held our meetings, gathering in from each neighbourhood as many as we could of those who "went nowhere," or who could not go far from home.

The first meeting was held at the gardener's cottage. He is large faced and florid, with a soothing manner; whether acquired as a gamekeeper, or, later, when doing horticultural jobbing for the mistresses of villa gardens, I am unable to say. His wife is small and thin fervent in piety, and shrewd, not to say cynical, in her judgment of men and things.

It was she to whom the vicar's wife remarked one day upon the excellent home she kept for her sons; what a comfort and stay it must be to the young men.

"Yes'm," replied the little woman, with gratified unction, "we 'as a family halter every night at nine o'clock, an' all the boys gets into it."

To-night, when half the hamlet will be in her front room, she is sedately exultant and hospitable. Hers is an old cottage, two, in fact, thrown together, and no one else in the neighbourhood has so large a front room as hers. Wide and low, with heavy cross-beams in the ceiling, it will accommodate thirty people. No need to take out the big table either, which, with its shawl-patterned cover, is the pride of her life. That table will hold the best lamp, the side table will take another, and with candles on the mantel-shelf and a good fire, "You can read the 'ymn books easy, Tom, in any part of the room." With its pictures and antimacassars, its family Bible, and bunches of everlasting flowers in every vase, its big sofa and many chairs, the room is a picture of comfort. Even the backless form, brought in to increase the sittings, hardly looks and is not meant to be penitential.

It was, doubtless, instinctive sympathy for the outdoor costumes of her guests, as well as a feeling of the sacredness of the conjunction, which led Mrs. Gardener to put on her Sunday bonnet for the occasion. Her husband, in his Sunday coat and broadest shirt-front, was close inside the door, ready to answer instantly the faintest knocks. Mrs. Gardener awaited us in the inner room.

"Good-night, Mis' Horton. Pleased you've come. Cold, isn't it? You come by the fire now."

"You tak' this chair, Mr. Wright; you'll fill it better than some will."

"Pleased to see you, Miss Bennett. 'Twas good of 'ee to come so far. We 'ardly looked for 'ee to-night."

We who were early made many and minute inquiries into the state of health of our respective families, and remarked on the price of eggs, the prospects of early "settin's," and the impossibility of outdoor work. We subdued our voices, and found no irreverence in these items of "The daily round, the common task."

Punctual, as usual, to a moment, the minister and his wife enter, and with a kindly word of general greeting pass through the well-filled room to the chairs reserved for them. We did not stand to sing. If we did the chances were in favour of our lifting the roof off in good earnest. We did not kneel at prayer. It was not our custom, and that night it was impossible. But we are devout after our fashion, and these meetings are genuine times of refreshing to us, so we sang heartily, and some of us groaned our responses to the petitions with a fervour which left nothing in that way to be desired. When several hymns had been sung, several prayers offered, and a few verses of the Bible read, our minister called on "our dear friend, Mrs. Shepherd," to address us.

A tall, old, pleasant woman with a ruddy face rose in the corner by the fire, and began at once, cheerfully but not volubly, and with simple dignity:—"My dear frien's, I h'ant seen none of you before since the New Year come in, and I wish you all a very 'appy and blessed New Year. I wish also to thank you all for the very kind messages you've asent me from time to time. My 'usband's brought them to me, and I thank you all for them. I was very pleased to get them and they did me good.

"Now to-night our meeting is for prayer, and we're goin' to hold more this week, and to-day I've been athinkin' about it, and about what prayer is. An' the first thing I thought was this—we can all of us get to heaven without hearing one sermon, but we can't none of us get to heaven without prayer. Not one.

"'Prayer is the Christian's vital breath.'

"And you younger ones is not to think that prayer and 'saying your prayers' is the same thing. Them words allus reminds me of a man I used to know in years gone by. His bedroom came over my pantry and there weren't no ceilin' up over. Every night I used to 'ear 'en say out loud beside his bed:—

"'Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John,
God bless the bed that I lie on,' and 'In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; Amen.'

"Well, the man had 'said 'is prayers,' of course; and very well that he should remember to do as much as that; but, my frien's, that wa'n't prayer. You must want, and you must know what you want, if you are to say anything that is worth our 'eavenly Father's while to hear.

"And even that in't enough to make prayer. Our Saviour says, 'If ye pray, believe that ye receive,' and I were thinking to-day of some people who knew very well what they wanted, and they all met, 'xactly as we're doin', to pray for that one thing; an' yet I can't think they believed they'd get it; not for a minute. You remember how it tells in the twelfth of Ac's about the 'prayer that was made earnestly of the church unto God,' the time that James was killed with the sword, and Peter was thrown into prison? The church didn' pray for James. No! He were safe gone to 'eaven, and if Peter 'ad his choice he 'ould sooner have gone too, I warrant, than being thrust into a cold dark prison, with death hangin' over 'im. But any of us 'ould rather be killed at once with a sword, or suffer anything, than die like the wretched persecutin' king—eaten up alive with worms. Disgustin', I call it!

"Well, the church prayed for Peter, that the Lord 'ould bring him safe out of prison. There wa'n't nothing else that they could do, for there wa'n't no judge nor jury them days, I've 'eard tell, that was any good to Christians. And, if you notice, they had to pray several days for 'en, and it wa'n't till the very last night before Herod wanted Peter that the angel was sent for 'im. My own idea is that they never expected to get a rale straight answer to their prayers. If them church members had prayed in full assurance of faith, I can't think they'd a'bin so ready to tell Rhoda she was mad, when she ran in, overjoyed, to say Peter was at the gate. I can't think but what, if they hever expected Peter back, they'd atold all the maidens to be thinkin' of 'im, and to let him in quick at the first sound. An' when that low knock came late in the evenin' on the wicket, Rhoda 'ould adrawed 'im into the passage first go off, and then run and said he was there. But she went right out, look, from the prayer meeting, and when the answer came, she lost her presence of mind. And even knowin' that you want somethin', and asking for it and believin' that you're goin' to get it, isn't the whole of prayer.

"We don't see many tramps hereabouts, and good reason why—we're not in a road to a work'us. But where I lived once we used to 'ave tramps come frequent; and always wantin', wantin', for-hever wantin' something. An' they used to believe they'd get it too, for my missis had a lovely face, an' she'd smile and say, 'Yes, my poor man.' They knew right enough. And when they'd got it, off they'd go, and very well if they didn't toss what she gave 'em over the fust hedge. Very often they wouldn't say as much as 'Thank you.' I never knew a tramp yet that cared to stay and 'ear a chapter out o' God's Word, or to have a word o' prayer or good talk once they'd got their meal. No, off they'd go, and like as not with a growl.

"My frien's, are we tramps? We're pilgrims 'ere below for certain; 'an some of us, I'm afeard, have the manners of tramps in our prayers. We fall 'pon our knees twice a day, and we ask God for this, that and the other. We finish up, 'Grant us these hour petitions for Jesus Christ's sake, amen,' and we're up from our knees and off out to get the breakfus, or to feed the stock, and no more about it. How many of us this day waited after our prayers for a little talk with God; to 'ear what He 'ad to say on His part as well as us on ours? Which of us has 'ad a realisin' sense of God with us during the day, and talked with Him as friend to Friend, as we got the children's dinner, or did our bit o' washin'?—i'stead of turning from Him at our bedside as if we was tramps? That's what the 'postle meant when he said, 'Pray without ceasing.' He didn't mean we were to go on for everlastin' asking for summat. God doesn't want to be told what we need. Oh dear, No! He knows all our wants a deal better than we can tell Him, but He knows we feel our wants a deal more than we do our mercies, and He says, therefore, bring your wants to me; 'Ask, and ye shall receive.'

"But then, dear frien's, if we're not to be always askin' and only askin', we must have something else to say. There's thanksgiving. Is there one soul here who could truthfully say, I always return thanks to my Heavenly Father for answers to prayer? Not one, I don't expect. We wouldn' take our week's wages, what we've worked for, nor the price of a pair of ducks we've fed and sold in the market, an' giving good value for the money, too, without asaying 'Thank ye.' But when we come to our Father in heaven, bringing nothing and expectin' everything Life and food and clothes, and every comfort 'ere.

(to say nothing of our hopes of heaven 'ereafter), don't we often an' often forget to add—

"'Thee, my most indulgent God,
I thank with heart sincere'?

"Oh, frien's! 'Tis true what I said at the beginning—what the hymn says,

"'Prayer is the Christian's vital breath,' for prayer is our hearts seeking out after God, in whom 'we live and have our being.' And may the Holy Spirit teach us to 'pray always with all prayer,' for ourselves, for those we love, for our neighbours, and for the whole world.' But let us remember, as well, that prayer means talking with God, and it means giving of thanks out of a full heart."

MARY RALPH.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden Hill, London, W., acknowledges with thanks receipt for this fund of the following sums:—A. B. C. and X. Y. Z., £2 2s.; Sir J. R. Robinson, £2 2s.; Mrs. Bryan Johnson, 5s.; L. T., 5s.; Mr. Bond, 10s.; Mr. Goring Pritchard, £2; Miss Gibbs, 5s.; Mrs. Lloyd, 10s.

OXFORD SUMMER SESSION.

Manchester College Lectures.

The summer session of university extension students now being held at Oxford rivals in interest any of its predecessors, and the part which Manchester College has taken in providing lectures bearing chiefly upon theological questions has been more warmly appreciated than upon previous occasions.

Sunday Services.

The ordinary services at the chapel on the past two Sundays have been largely attended, a good sprinkling of foreign students being observable on both occasions, and forming a fair proportion of the general audiences at the lectures also.

On the first Sunday the Principal, Dr. Drummond, preached from 1 Thessalonians v. 23:—"And may your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire, without blame, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Dr. Drummond eloquently pleaded for an education which embraced the whole faculties of man, deploring the great sacrifice of human life due to ignorance of the most elementary laws of hygiene, and urging that the theologian no less than the scientist favoured this broadening of the basis of education, for he regarded the body as the temple of the Holy Spirit. But he also pleaded for an education which paid due attention to the culture of the religious part of human nature, for, however foolish the scientist might consider these religious sentiments to be, it was false economy to neglect so potent a means for the elevation of the race, and allow that which might lead a man into sainthood to degenerate into a harmful fanaticism.

Last Sunday the Rev. E. I. Fripp, B.A., was the preacher, and was eagerly listened to in a discourse glowing with human sympathy, which, the preacher pleaded, should not be chilled by a too strict regard for what we sometimes too loosely termed "principles."

Lectures on the Gospels.

The Sunday evening lectures by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., on the gospels and how to read them, have attracted audiences which taxed the accommodation provided by the chapel to the full, chairs being placed in the aisles and vestibule. The students listened attentively for more than an hour at a time while Professor Carpenter explained the existence of parallel narratives and passages in the Synoptic gospels, and broadly sketched the theories to which they had given rise, emphasising the conclusion of most modern critics that the Gospel according to Mark was, in some form, prior to Matthew and Luke, and was in the main embodied by the compilers of those books in their narratives. Last Sunday evening Professor Carpenter drew a touching picture of the life of Christ as delineated in the synoptic gospels, when stripped of doubtful elements. He traced the development of Messianic belief, and showed how Christ was influenced by it. Continuing the "Study" next Sunday evening Mr. Carpenter will deal with the problems which are associated with the Fourth Gospel.

Dr. Drummond on Anselm.

Dr. Drummond had so large an audience at his first lecture on Anselm that it was found necessary to adjourn from the lecture-room to the chapel, where the remaining lectures took place. In the first lecture Dr. Drummond dealt with the Cur Deus Homo of Anselm, giving first a careful analysis of the work and afterwards contrasting Anselm's doctrine of the Atonement with those of the Westminster Confession and the Church of England. In his second lecture Dr. Drummond passed a criticism upon the doctrine, urging that it was fundamentally opposed to the teachings of Jesus, and yet it contained elements of permanent value to the human soul, which, conscious of its own sin—the foul blot on the fair order of God's universe—felt the need of penitence and reconciliation, but would shrink from approaching Him whom it had wronged did He not draw us to Him by the constraining power of that love which He so signally manifested in Jesus.

The Rev. W. H. Drummond was intently listened to on Wednesday last week, when he lectured on Francis of Assisi, dealing principally with the study of the Gospels in the light of the early lives of the Saint.

Buddhism and Christianity.

On the three succeeding days Professor Carpenter dealt with the supposed parallels between Buddhism and Christianity. The lectures were interesting in the highest degree, and it was evident from the looks of eager intelligence on the faces of the hearers that many were listening for the first time to the fascinating stories of Gotama the Buddha. Mr. Carpenter contrasted the monastic order of Buddhism with that of the Essenes of Palestine and the Therapeutæ of Egypt, as well as with the Christian monasticism of a later time. He also compared the parables, ethical precepts, and legends of the Buddha with those related of Jesus; and, finally, discussed the evidence of mutual influence. This he showed to be of the frailest possible kind, and he strongly deprecated the use of language by writers of popular works, which assumed a dependence of Christianity upon Buddhism, without offering any proof. They ought always to remember the entire difference between Buddhism and Christianity as a religion. Buddhism started on psychological grounds with a denial of the soul; on ontological grounds with a denial of God. Beautiful as were the ethical teachings of the Buddha, beautiful as were the imaginative stories with which the Buddhist order expressed its faith in its Lord, how far was it likely that stories based on a denial of the soul and God should have suggested to early Christian believers anything whatever in connection with him who taught us to say, "Our Father, which art in heaven."

There was a diminished audience to hear Mr. Fripp's excellent lectures on Monday and Tuesday last, owing, doubtless, to the departure of some of the students from the North; but those who attended were delighted with his literary method and the charm of his treatment of the religious ideas in "Everyman" and "Doctor Favetus."

There was again a crowded chapel when, on Wednesday, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., lectured on the influence of Aristotle's "De Anima" upon mediæval thought. Having briefly sketched the unsettled state of philosophical thought in Greece prior to the time of Anaxagoras, Mr. Wicksteed gave a luminous analysis of the underlying principles of Aristotle's philosophy—viz., those of form on the one hand and nous on the other. Aristotle's fundamental doctrine of life was, he said, precisely that which Huxley hurled upon an astonished world in his essay on "Protoplasm." Yet Aristotle declared that nous was an immaterial thing and different from the senses which were capable of being stunned by a flash of light or prodigious sound, whereas when a stupendous truth was flashed upon the intellect minutiæ of intellectual differences was discerned with a quickened power. But in Aristotle's view body and soul were not to be severed. The man thought by virtue of his nous, not vice versa.

The lecturer having shown the difficulties which Aristotle's system left unsolved gave a graphic sketch of the fascinating power exercised by Aristotle on Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, and the schoolmen. Despite the papal prohibition, men came to Aristotle as to a well of intellectual life. To make Aristotle a Christian became a question of life and death to the intellect of Europe. But while claiming immortality for nous on the one hand and matter on the other, Aristotle's philosophy was fundamentally opposed to the doctrine of the immortality of the human soul; and if the modern doctrine of subliminal consciousness could establish itself the attempts to found a doctrine of personal immortality upon it would be absolutely vain, for it led straight back to Aristotelianism.

The evident interest in all the lectures has been most encouraging. A. T.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Belper.—As announced in our notices last week the marriage was celebrated here, on the 4th inst., between Miss Clara Smith, daughter of the respected minister, the Rev. J. Kertain Smith, and Mr. Lewis Lloyd, son of a former and also much respected minister, the Rev. J. B. Lloyd. Much interest was felt in the occasion by the townspeople, among whom the bride and bridegroom, as well as their honoured parents, were well known. Though the day and the hour were kept a secret, the old chapel presented a bright appearance on the marriage morning, flowers strewed the path, and in many ways friends showed their affection. The Rev. J. Kertain Smith gave his daughter away, and Mrs. Smith, of Ringwood, and Miss Goodey, of Derby, signed the register. The Rev. Edgar I. Fripp, of Mansfield, officiated. Later, the young people had a happy send-off to York and Whitby, where they will spend their honeymoon. Miss Smith will be greatly missed at the chapel, where her labours in the Sunday-school and choir and various institutions of the congregation have been most valuable and warmly appreciated. A host of good wishes go with her from Belper.

Taunton (Appointment).—The Rev. F. A. Horner, late of West Bromwich, having accepted a unanimous invitation from the Mary-street congregation, commenced his ministry on Sunday, the 9th inst.

Tamworth.—During the past few weeks our chapel has been cleaned, painted, and decorated, and the organ repaired. On Wednesday July 29, the re-opening services were held. In the afternoon, Rev. J. Worsley Austin, M.A., preached an able sermon, in which the preacher, having described the growth of Christianity from a rejected and despised faith to one of power and influence, went on to show that all new movements in their early stages had to contend with bitter persecution. Much of the modern teaching in religion and science, though now widely accepted, was opposed and condemned when first taught. The sermon was much appreciated by all present. Tea was served in the schoolroom to upwards of seventy. This was followed by a public meeting in the chapel, presided over by Mr. A. W. Worthington, J.P., and addresses were given by the Revs. J. Worsley Austin, L. P. Jacks, W. G. Price, W. F. Turland, J. B. Higham, and J. Howard; also Mr. Charles Harding, Mr. Hugh Atkins, Mr. F. Alldritt (Mayor), and Mr. J. Belfield. A vote of thanks to the speakers and visitors was proposed by Mr. F. W. Emms, and seconded by Mr. J. Blundell. The services were continued on Sunday, when the minister (Rev. F. W. Emms) preached morning, afternoon and evening. The attendance at all the services was good, especially at the Sunday evening service, which was the largest attendance seen for many years. The collections at the services amounted to about £10.

Tees side Committee (N. & D.U.A).—On Wednesday evening, August 5, a social gathering was held at Middlesbro', with Mr. Chas. Bowes in the chair. The occasion of the gathering was that of a presentation to Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Bell, of Redcar, in connection with their golden wedding, which they celebrated on July 17. Mr. Bell has been a lay preacher for more than fifty-six years, and has rendered such excellent service to our churches, assisted by the hearty co-operation and sacrifice of his excellent wife, that it was felt to be a fitting time for a public and tangible recognition of his worth. The presentation, consisting of a roll top desk and an enlarged framed portrait of Mr. and Mrs. Bell as they appeared on the occasion of their golden wedding, was made by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, president of the Tees-side Committee, in a few well-chosen words. Representatives of the Tees-side churches also spoke in support of the presentation. Mr. Bell replied most felicitously on behalf of himself and Mrs. Bell.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, etc., received from:—J. H. C.; R. P. C. C.; R. D. D.; F. C. F.; L. M.; M. T. M.; E. C. W.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOINSON, Pier-street.

MARRIAGES.

PIKE—DIBBEN.—On Aug. 8, at St. Thomas Chapel, Ringwood, by the Rev. C. C. Coe, Stephen Pike to Blanche Dibben.

JONES—THOMAS.—On 11th Aug., at Pantdefaid Chapel, Llandyssul, by the Rev. John Davies, Allt-y-placa, and the Rev. T. Arthur Thomas, the authorised person, Dr. Evan Jones, Llanbyther, to Getta, the only daughter of the Rev. Thomas Thomas, J.P., and Mrs. Thomas, Greenpark, Llandyssul.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, August 16.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton. Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M.

Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 7 P.M., Rev. G. LANSDOWN.

Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M and 7 P.M., Rev. WALTER LLOYD.

Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M., Dr. J. H. CROOKER, and 7 P.M., Mrs. CROOKER.

Deptford, Church-street, 11.15, A.M., Rev. A. J. MARCHANT, and 6.30 Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS.

Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M., Rev. GORDON COOPER, B.A.

Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.

Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.

Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. EDGAR I FRIPP.

Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. F. ALLEN.

Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street.—Church closed during August.

Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.

Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.

Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.

Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M., Rev. H. S. PERRIS, M.A., 6.30 P.M. in Regent's-park.

Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Mr. E. CAPLETON.

Peckham, Avondale-rad, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Mr. J. BREDALL.

Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.

Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY.

S epney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR.

Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M., Evening service suspended until Sept. 13th.

Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M., Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS, and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. J. MARCHANT.

Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, East-hill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. PHILEMON MOORE, B.A.

Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Dr. MUMMERY.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M; Rev. L. T. BADCOCK (of Shepton Mallet).

BEDFORD, Library (side room), 11.15 A.M., Rev. ROWLAND HILL.

BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.

BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Church, The Hall, Lytham-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. C. C. COE.

BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. H. ROSE.

BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET, and 7 P.M., Rev. CHARLES PEACH (Manchester).

CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., Mr. J. REMINGTON WILSON.

DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.

GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. AMOS.

HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. HARGROVE. M.A.

LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. J. WRIGHT, F.R.S.L.

LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. J. JUPP.

LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. RAWLINGS, M.A.

NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. E. PIKE.

OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, M.A.

PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.

PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 P.M., Mr THOMAS BOND.

SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. OTTWELL BINNS.

SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.

SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.

SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church, Tyler-street, 7 P.M.

TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

WINDERMERE, Albert Hall, Cross-street, 11 A.M., Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.

WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M.,

COLWYN BAY, North Wales, Public Hall, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. E. MANNING, M.A.

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH.

SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F. Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS.

SOUTH-PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.—Aug. 16, at 11.15 A.M.

Board and Residence.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged. — Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

BOURNEMOUTH. — ARNEWOOD. En Pension. Grand position in West Cliff-road; sea views; South aspect; close to Winter Gardens, Promenade, and Pier.—Apply, MANAGERESS.

BOURNEMOUTH. — Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH, DEVONSHIRE.

A HOLIDAY RESORT FOR YOUNG LADIES OR SCHOOL-GIRLS, WITH OR WITHOUT CHAPERON.

Charming little Devonshire town. Perfect Sanitation. Sea and Moorland. Bracing air. Walks, excursions, picnics, splendid bathing. Main line G.W.R.

Terms and other particulars from THE PROPRIETOR.

FELIXSTOWE.—Comfortable HOME for Permanent BOARDERS, Adults or Scholars; also APARTMENTS on reasonable terms.—Apply, Mrs. ROBINSON, Kimberley, Ranelagh-road, Felixstowe.

BOARDING HOUSE.—THE FELL, TROUTBECK, WINDERMERE, is situated 550 feet above sea-level, and about 2½ miles from the station at Windermere. Every home comfort.

Situations, etc.

SUPERIOR PERSON, age 25, seeks situation as Housekeeper or Plain Cook. Thoroughly trained good references.—M. C., c/o Miss HALE, Hopefield, Honeybourne, Evesham.

WANTED, trustworthy General Servant. Must be under 40, and an abstainer. £18. No washing. Small family. Early dinners.—Mrs. WHITEHEAD, Oakdene, Wallington, Surrey.

LADY NURSE wanted, with some knowledge of Kindergarten (baby and three other children). Moderate salary, country house, three servants kept. Apply, Mrs. HARVEY, Little Eaton, Derby.

YOUNG LADY seeks post as GOVERNESS in school or family. English, Junior. Piano. Good violin.—Address, X. L., INQUIRER Office.

LADY seeks post as Daily or Resident English GOVERNESS. Certificated. French, Drawing, Music, Drill. Good references.—A. R., 1, Stella-villas, St. Cross Estate, Farnham.

FREDK. LONG & SON,
AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,
4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

Schools, etc.

CHANNING HOUSE, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N.
HIGH SCHOOL for GIRLS
and UNITARIAN BOARDING SCHOOL.
("Recognised" by the Board of Education.)

COMMITTEE OF MANAGEMENT.

F. J. NETTLEFOLD, ESQ.
Mrs. BLAKE ODGERS.
F. PRESTON, ESQ.
W. A. SHARPE, ESQ.
Mrs. W. A. SHARPE.
HAROLD WADE, ESQ.
Mrs. WILLIAM WOODING.

Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A. Honours Lond., Head Mistress.

BOARDERS' FEES:

Fifty Guineas a year, and Seat in Chapel One Guinea. Music, Six Guineas extra: or £17 17s. a term: with Music, £19 19s.

Ministers' Daughters £10 13s. 6d. a term, or with Music, £12 5s.

Outside Sanatorium, Laundry at Home, Electric Light. Good Playground and Garden. Tennis, Hockey (in field hired near School).

Opportunities afforded for Sight-seeing, Concerts, &c.

The Terms include Board, Lodging, necessary Laundry, all class lessons up to London Matriculation, Drawing, Class-singing, Physical Drill, Divinity.

Extras.—Music, Shorthand, Type-writing, Dancing, Gymnastics, Cooking.

Day Scholars, 3 to 5 Guineas a term; Music 1½ Guineas extra. Kindergarten, 2 to 2½ Guineas a term.

Next Term begins Sept. 16th.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN,
NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON
(Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

WAVERLEY SCHOOL, 24, HAMILTON ROAD, SHERWOOD RISE, NOTTINGHAM.

PREPARATORY TO THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
HEAD MASTER, Mr. H. T. FACON, B.A.(Lond.).
Next Term begins Wednesday, September 16th.
Prospectus on application. BOARDERS received. Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, Essex House, Campden-hill, W.

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
14 & 15, SOUTH MARINE TERRACE, ABERYSTWYTH.

PRINCIPAL ... MRS. MARLES-THOMAS.

This School is splendidly situated in one of the healthiest parts of Wales, overlooking Cardigan Bay, and close to excellent golf links. Pupils have passed the London and Welsh Matriculation; Cambridge Higher Local; Senior and Junior Cambridge Locals, besides the usual Theoretical and Practical Music Examinations. Scholarships have also been obtained at the Welsh University Colleges.

Gymnasium, Swimming, and excellent Hockey Club.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK
Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.
INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.
CURRENT ACCOUNTS
2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%
DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
2½% repayable on demand. 2½%
STOCKS AND SHARES
Purchased and sold for customers.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.
C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

46 pp. 8vo, price One Shilling.
THE FREEHOLD FARM, THE GARNER'D SEED-CORN OF ALL INTUITIONED THOUGHT.
INTUITIONISM:
The Release of the Mind.
By F. LINFORD WILSON.
Published by H. SEERIGHT, and obtainable of W. REEVES, 83, Charing Cross-road, W.C.

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS
By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
DAILY MEDITATIONS
(Fourth Edition Revised.)
NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.
Cloth, red edges, 6d.; roan gilt, 1s.
PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.
Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.
Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17 Mincing-lane, E.C.
Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.
F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.
Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.
STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses.—For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

MICROSCOPES, second-hand, excellent condition, from one-third original cost. Slides, great variety, best makers, from 3s. per doz. Write for particulars, THE NEW AGE PRESS, 8, John-street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

NEW RICHES FROM OLD MINES.

Who would value raw grains if all the arts of milling and preparing them were lost?

Similarly, nuts (which are foods of enormous value) have been unappreciated because the art of preparing them has been neglected.

HUGH MAPLETON, Colonial House, Ardwick, Manchester, is now making from nuts, rich, nourishing, digestible foods. Write to-day for descriptive price lists.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, August 15, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3191. NEW SERIES, No. 295.] LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 22, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 553
ARTICLES—
An Old Pedlar 555
Universities of Holland 561
The Christian Ideal of Peace 563
Natural Inspiration 564
The Homes of Wordsworth—III. 565
LITERATURE—
A German Pioneer of Liberal Religion .. 556
Encyclopædia Biblica 557
Modernising the New Testament 558
The Road Makers 558
"No Night There" 559
LEADER—
The "International" Programme 560
CORRESPONDENCE—
Is there a Gulf? 566
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 559
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 566
ADVERTISEMENTS 568

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE publish in our present issue the completed programme of the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal religious thinkers and workers to be held the week after next at Amsterdam. The energy and good-will of our friends in Holland, under the direction of Professor Eerdmans, the local secretary, and with the co-operation of the Rev. C. W. Wendte, the general secretary, have organised what promises to be a most successful and delightful International festival, and in this country Mr. Bowie and Mr. Ion Pritchard have thrown the whole of their well-known enthusiasm and organising ability into the work of smoothing the way for the large party of English visitors. The list of these, classified under the hotels at which they are to stay at Amsterdam, numbers 183, and when the time comes it is not unlikely that our party will be found to number at least 200, while the contingent of our American brethren will not fall far short of fifty. We shall do all that lies in our power to enable our readers to share in the happiness of this festival week.

THE completed programme shows one or two changes from the preliminary list of papers, advertised in these columns on Aug. 8. No room has been found for Mr. Wendte's paper on the "Emerson Centenary," and we regret to hear that Dr. Kalthoff, of Bremen, is unable to be present. His place in the programme, however, will be admirably filled by the Rev. K. Andresen, of Blankenese, near Hamburg.

WE publish this week an elaborate and interesting article on the Universities of Holland, by Dr. F. C. Fleischer, of Makkum, and this will be followed next week by a further article on "Religious Liberalism and the Dutch Protestant Churches." Dr. Fleischer, it will be remembered, was one of our guests at the London meeting of the International Council two years ago, when he contributed a paper on the Mennonite Community," of which he is himself a member. We are greatly indebted to Dr. Fleischer for the interest of these further contributions to our knowledge of the religious condition of his country.

ONCE again we are in the midst of a "Crisis in the East." Twenty-five years after the Russo-Turkish war and Mr. Gladstone's "bag and baggage" campaign, Mohammedan Turkey retains her absolute sway over a million or two of European Christians. During all these twenty-five years, Europe has known in her heart that such a dominion cannot continue for ever, and that every day it lasts means more tyranny and anarchy—an endless succession of outrages by the governing and spasmodic reprisals by the governed races. Yet mutual jealousies and fear of the effect on their own territorial interests of the ejectment of the Turk have paralysed the Christian powers, and forced them into virtual acquiescence in his excesses.

IT is humiliating to realise how completely our own country has dropped out of account in the discussion of the future of the Balkans. As the prime mover in the Berlin Conference, where the Great Powers took from Russia a share in the responsibility she had undertaken for the good government of the Porte, Britain should surely be taking the lead in requiring an immediate change in the political condition of the people of Macedonia. But to all appearances Britian, in common with the rest of the signatories of the Berlin Treaty, has resigned the whole business to Turkey's immediate neighbours, Russia and Austria, to deal with as may seem best to them. Russia and Austria have for some years been in open agreement that the one thing essential in the Balkans is not the good government of the inhabitants, but the maintenance of present political boundaries pending the yet very distant date when they can agree upon the partition of the sick man's heritage. The chancelleries of neither of these empires can feel any great sympathy with those claims to internal self-government which Englishmen traditionally regard as the one guarantee of permanent tranquility, and if these two Powers remain indefinitely in exclusive control of the crisis, the outcome is scarcely likely to be a happy one.

BUT forces are at work which may prove too strong for them. The policy of the ring fence had to be abandoned in the long run even in Crete, and its maintenance with regard to Macedonia is not likely to prove any easier. Prince Ferdinand may do his best to carry out the demand of Russia for a strict neutrality, but if the revolt in Macedonia continues to spread at its present rate, neither he nor Russia nor Austria can prevent the Bulgarians from taking up the cause of their kinsmen across the border, as Greece espoused the cause of the Cretans. Greece was defeated, but the Cretans obtained their freedom; and it may be doubted whether Austrian jealousy, assuming the absence of any intervention by other Powers from higher motives, would permit of Russia enforcing the status quo by an armed attack on Bulgaria. By far her safest plan is to bring coercion to bear upon the Sultan himself while Bulgarian excitement is still under some sort of control. How far the present movement of the Russian fleet is intended to go in this direction remains to be seen. Would that we had at the head of the British Government a man who would see to it that British as well as Russian ideas had their part in the policy which this movement is to enforce.

IN the midst of our own domestic controversies, and of the gathering war cloud in the East, we have little thought to spare now-a-days for the condition of our newest Colonies in South Africa. It is strange to think, in the light of the report of the growing destitution in the Transvaal and Orange River Colonies, that one of the most hotly discussed conditions of peace last year concerned the amount to be expended in the restoration of prosperity to the war-stripped countryside. Yet the amount then promised has long been far over-spent, and still the cry comes that famine has settled down over the land. Much is being done to relieve the inevitable distress, but far more remains. Many of us denounced with all our might the policy which destroyed crops, farm implements, and irrigation works as a means of bringing a stubborn foe to his knees. Those who defended that policy as a melancholy necessity will join, we are sure, in the demand that the long famine which is its necessary sequel shall be met with unstinting aid in money or in kind now that the country is ours.

It is stated that at the Bible Christian (Methodist) Conference, every reference to rate refusal was heartily applauded; and that the loudest cheer during the whole of the public services was given to a minister who declared himself more willing to go to prison than to pay the education rate. The Conference went so far as, by 46 votes to 6, to instruct the governors of the connexional colleges not to pay the rate. It is said, however, that more than half the Conference had left before the question could be considered, and that the majority included several very influential members. The governor of one of the colleges remarked that he might possibly become a Passive Resister to the Conference resolution. Every such debate, however it may happen to end, illustrates the mischief wrought alike to education and religion by a scheme of national education which brings to the front as the first consideration not the efficiency or the inadequacy of the instruction to be given to the child, but the denominational prejudices of those who have the child in charge.

The Daily News last Monday published a letter from Mr. William Watson, expressing great satisfaction at the prominence given by that journal to the Rev. John Verschoyle's exposure of the abuses of vivisection, apropos of the Home Secretary's recent reply to a deputation on that subject. Mr. Verschoyle's Open Letter to the Home Secretary will be found in the August number of the Abolitionist (14, St. James's Barton Bristol, 2d.). Mr. William Watson in his letter makes the following declaration, which we commend to the earnest consideration of our readers:—

We who condemn and oppose vivisection regard it as but secondarily a matter within the jurisdiction of science, and primarily an affair of morals. The questions we ask ourselves are, firstly:—"Do we as human beings really deserve to purchase benefits at so frightful a cost to other creatures?" and secondly, "Do these other creatures really deserve to bear the burden of so frightful a cost on our behalf?" No vivisector ever comes to grips with these simple, but, to the moralist, searching questions. No vivisector ever meets them with a plain "Yes" or "No." To answer "Yes" would be to give himself away as a rational being; to answer "No" and yet go on vivisecting would be to abdicate as a being endowed with conscience. Therefore, his policy is to evade these questions, and in so doing to evade the whole ethical aspect of the practice which he defends.

This letter has been followed by a number of others, wise and foolish. We will only add one other brief quotation from a letter by Mr. Stephen Smith, M.R.C.S., in Wednesday's Daily News.

Fine spun ethical questions may be weaved about vivisection. But the bulk of mankind may be divided into two classes, firstly, those who would say: "My skin is safe. I don't care what happens in laboratories," and secondly, those who have sufficient sympathetic imagination to earnestly inquire: "Does it mean torture" The former are the more numerous.

The plea, if plea it can be called, that worse cruelty is inflicted in slaughter-houses, is, of course, repeated in this correspondence, as though one cruelty should justify another. The moral crux, we are convinced, lies in the question, "Is it torture?" and "Can such a method be right?"

The Friends' Summer School—held in previous years at Scarborough and Windermere, assembled on July 23 at Woodbrooke, near Birmingham, the house provided by the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. George Cadbury, and the August British Friend publishes a most interesting record of the first fortnight's doings. Among the lecturers were Dr. Rufus M. Jones, the Rev. Dugald Macfadyen, and the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed, who gave a course of evening lectures on social and economic questions, and also two other lectures, of which the British Friend gives the following account:—

Besides his formal course of lectures and the classes connected with it, Mr. Wicksteed gave two beautiful addresses, one on Dante and the other on Sabatier and St. Francis. In the former it was wonderful how, in so short a time, the life and work of Dante was laid before us in true proportion, so that the spirit and meaning of the poet were grasped. In the other, Mr. Wicksteed first spoke of the value of the thorough and minute investigations of Sabatier into the literature about Francis of Assisi, and then lost himself in one beautiful story after another of the saint, so that the hour was all too short.

The gratitude that all the students felt towards one who had entered with such love and enthusiasm into the spirit of the Summer School, found shape, the last evening, in a torchlight procession with songs and music, up the drive at Northfield Manor. It was felt that such an occasion, rather than more serious thanks, would best testify to the general feeling of love and good will.

In this month's Mill Hill Pulpit the Rev. Charles Hargrove tells "The Story of an Old Bible" (1673-1903), a Bible which once belonged to the Rev. Richard Stretton, the first minister of Mill Hill Chapel (1672-77), and bears his autograph. Stretton had been for ten years chaplain to Lord Fairfax, on whose death it was that he came to Leeds. Subsequently he lived in London, where he died in 1712, having, before the Revolution, suffered six months' imprisonment in Newgate for conscience sake. The old Bible, perhaps, went with him there, and afterwards came into the possession of Dr. Collin, the first minister of St. Saviourgate Chapel, York. From him it passed to the Rev. Newcome Cappe, and so to the Rev. Charles Wellbeloved, whose grandson, the present Rev. Charles Wellbeloved of Southport, has now given it to Mr. Hargrove, to be handed down to successive ministers of Mill Hill Chapel. Having told the story of the book, Mr. Hargrove turns to that other story of the inward changes in views of religious truth and their conception of the meaning of the book, which have come to its successive readers.

Though the seven tourists seen to fall while ascending the Aiguille Grise prove to have escaped with their lives, the deaths which have actually occurred during the Alpine season form an impressive roll enough. Those who know, however, declare that among experienced and recognised climbers the number of accidents is steadily diminishing, whilst the misadventures among the ordinary tourists have not increased out of proportion to the annual increase in the tourist traffic. Gazing from a modest summit in the neighbourhood of Lucerne upon the wondrous panorama of snow-clad peaks to the south, it is easy to associate the passion for scaling inaccessible heights with a fervour of nature-worship closely akin to religious exaltation. With that view before him one is less ready to condemn the Alpinist as a madman than when reading accounts of Alpine fatalities in one's armchair at home.

Travelling on the wonderful railway over the Brünig Pass the other day the writer of this note met a young man of scarcely twenty years, with rope coiled over his shoulder and ice axe in his hand, and a look on his face not easily to be forgotten. The body had a splendid alertness of pose, the features were delicately and keenly moulded, and the restless blue eyes were full of an exalted fire. Some might have detected the light of madness there also, but it was a madness of a kind which has inspired to great deeds in days gone by, betraying a nobility of soul which we are fain to believe must find other outlet with ripening years than the mere scaling of natural heights, however sublime and inaccessible.

A memorial notice of the late Richard Wilton, rector of Londesborough, East Yorkshire, appears in this week's Guardian. Canon Wilton, who was born in 1827, had been for thirty-six years in his secluded country parish, a man, as the Guardian notice says, "after George Herbert's own heart," of refined and cultured nature, an intense lover of the country and of his Church; the writer of verses of no mean order. His first volume of poems, "Wood Notes and Church Bells," appeared in 1873. Other volumes followed, and only last year he published a little book of selections with some later sonnets, under the title "Lyra Pastoralis." Canon Wilton was a friend of Mr. Garrett Horder's, for whose "Treasury of American Sacred Song" he wrote the Dedicatory Sonnet besides giving ungrudging help in the preparation of his collection of supplementary hymns published in 1894. The following verses of Canon Wilton's appear as No. 105 in the revised Essex Hall Hymnal:—

Ever more as years roll round
Do thy mercies, Lord, abound;
Gifts untold on us descend
From the Love that hath no end.

Day by day thy doors of gold
Are for our delight unrolled;
Night by night thy shadows deep,
Veil our eyes in kindly sleep.

Countless homes with love made dear,
Feel thy sacred presence near;
Earth with countless blossoms crowned,
Wafts her incense all around.

Ever more our hearts would give
Thanks to thee in whom we live,
And a grateful music bear
Through each hour of work or prayer.

Channing House School.—Miss Alice M. Wright has been successful in passing the Intermediate Arts Examination of London University; also in the recent Matriculation Examination, three present pupils and one former pupil passed Alice Spears Jones, Kathleen O'Callaghan, Ruth Vernon Manning, and Daisy Lloyd Jones.

AN OLD PEDLAR.

SHE was a little apple-cheeked old woman, fresh and clean looking, with a slightly aquiline nose and clear blue eyes. The frilled border of her close-fitting muslin cap encircled her face, showing her smooth white hair, and itself shadowed by the brim of an old straw coal-scuttle bonnet, which was embellished and tied with a broad ribbon. Her gray woollen kerchief, crossed on her bosom, had its corners tucked securely into the band of her big check apron, which, like her gown, reached to her ankles. Stout grey stockings and well-blacked shoes completed her dress. A quaint picture she made as she sat under the hawthorn bush on the downs by the city. She might have been a fairy godmother come to watch over the gambols of the children, who were enjoying the great breezy space as only children can. It did not need the old woman's salutation, "God save you kindly," to assure me of her nationality, and I sat down on the bench beside her.

For a few minutes she was absorbed in arranging and rearranging her little hawker's box of shoe laces, buttons, tapes, and cottons, and neither of us spoke; but when all was in order to her mind, and she began to retie her bonnet-strings before starting again upon her rounds, I leaned forward to select a thimble or two, and said—

"You're from Ireland, aren't you?"

She flashed a look at me.

"Shure yer from th'ould sod yersolf, or ye wouldn't ax me that!" she said cheerfully. "I'm from Ireland, sure enough me lady, but I'm out of it this good while. Them thimbles is on'y ha'pence a piece."

"Have you been long here? I've not seen you before," I said.

"Well, not to say so very long," the old woman answered, "'Twill be two year if we live to St. John's day that I'm here. I don't of'en come up this-a-way, but sometimes I can do a good bit o' business at that place out there beyant—musha, I forget the name of it. I kem here from America."

"Oh," I said, "then you've travelled a bit."

"Weary on it for the thravellin', me lady! Shure when I thinks of the thousands of miles of wather I've been over, an' the sights I seen, I sez to meself, 'Whethen is it yerself that's in it at all, Biddy Reardon, or are ye somebody else?' And I declare to ye, sometimes I can't make up me mind."

"It's so seldom an Irishwoman comes back from America."

"Well, I suppose it is," Biddy answered, "but," dropping her voice, "I had a call, alanna, I had a call. An' though there's them in it now that's like the veins of me heart to me, I wouldn't go in it again for all the gould and silver in the Bank of England."

I looked interested, I suppose; certainly I felt so, and the brogue was music in my exiled ears; so Biddy set down her box between us, and said, with a certain air of shy pleasure and relief in finding a listener:—

"I never had but two childher, me lady, an' me daughter marrid, an' wint to Amerikay. An' nothing 'ud do for her and her husbant but 'Mother' mus' come too. There was no end to the letters they wrote, sayin' how well they were off and what loads and lashins of everything they had, an' a room for me, and what all. An' all the neighbours said I was the quare onnatheral ould woman that wouldn't go out to them. Me son, he was in this place, an' there wasn't one left in it but meself. But you know, alanna, that it isn't as aisy as 'kiss-hand' to give up yer own cabin that ye had this thirty year—if it was but a small place—an' go in on somebody else's flure,"—I nodded, I knew the feeling—"an' especially, of coorse, if I wint to Amerikay I couldn't be berried be the side of Mike—me husband I mane. But, however, at long an' last, whin they kep' on writin' and writin', I took and parted with me few little brilliawns of things, an' off I set with meself to New York, where me daugther lived. An' shure enough, it wasn't one word too much they said about the place they had and all of it—a fine consarn as anny-body need wish to have undher their hand—a livery stables. My dear! to see some of them horses and car'ages Tom had there! I used to wish many a time that some o' the neighbours could see the place an' the property that was in it, an' think of Tom, that used to be a-washin' cars in the hotel yard without e'er a shoe or a sock to his fut. An' I'd say to him, 'However on the livin' earth, Tom, did you gether it all together?' An' he'd laugh, an' say,

'Whethen, Mother,' (he always called me 'Mother,') 'it's funny you should ax me that. Isn't it better to be born lucky than rich?' he'd say. 'Shure, woman alive, don't you know that every Irishman is lucky with bastes, the crathurs, an' horses above all. Maggie and I worked for it,' he'd say, 'an' it's yerself ought to be proud out o' the daughter ye reared.'

"An' thin, if he was clane, he'd, maybe, put his arms round me, an' dance me round till I'd be a'most kilt for want o' breath an' laughin'."

"Well," I said, laughing too, "I think you were 'a quare ould woman entirely' not to stay with such a kind son-in-law. Why didn't you?"

"Athen, but it's yerself has the turn of the ould words upon yer tongue, achushla! Ye love ould Ireland I'm thinkin'. Shure it's making a long story I am of it, an' tirin' ye out, maybe?"

"Not a bit of it!" I answered. "Tell me everything you like. It's so seldom I get talking to anyone from home."

"Well, ye axed me why I didn't stay in it; an' I'll tell ye. I wasn't very long there till I found out one thing, an' it made me heart sick and sorry. In the walls of the world you wouldn't find two betther-natured people than Tom and Maggie. But what good was all that whin they neglected their religion. They only very occasionally wint to Mass—and ye know that's a mortial sin," the old woman interrupted herself, to explain to me with bated breath. "An' as for fastin' on Fridays or in Lint—good luck to ye! Tom 'ud lane back an' laugh at such an iday."

"Fastin'?" he'd say; 'Masha then, mother, don't ye think we fasted enough in poor ould Ireland, whin we couldn't help it? 'Twas Friday there every day in the year, an' we fasted enough for forty ginerations to come. But now, glory be to God, we've enough an' to spare of porther-house steak, an' every-thing ye like to mention. So help yerself, achushla machree, an' don't be throublin' yer ould head.'

"But I couldn't help throublin'. An' bimeby I found that no matther what time I wint out to me duty it was ill-convenient for some rason or other—and always some laugh or somethin' to be said.

"'Musha, mother, it's wearin' yerself out, ye are intirely. Shure what do ye want to be so particular for? Here's yer breakfast been waitin' this, I dunno how long'; and the like o' that. An' manny's the time I crep' away up to me room an' sat down be the registher—that's in place of a fire in the room, ye understand—an' I'd feel the ould clay flure of the cabin at home in Tipperary undher me feet, instid o' the boards, (an' a carpet, no less!) there in New York. An' I'd hear the chapel bell; an' some-times I'd hear Mike—that's me husband I mane—callin' to me, 'Biddy, thim's the last taps goin' now; come along woman it's late you'll be in it.' An' the third time I heard that, I sez to meself, 'Blessed Virgin, an' all the holy saints! sez I, it's a sign! Shure me sowl is the only thing I have left to me, an' if I lose that I lose everything. I'll go from here,' I sez to meself, 'an go where I can pray for the crcahures be day and be night.'

"But where was I to go to? There wasn't one belonging to me left in the owld place, unless it was Mike's grave. An' I didn't want the neighbours to have it to say that 'Here's ould Biddy Reardon back agin, if yer plaze. She an' her fine son-in-law couldn't get on, I suppose,' an' that sort o' thing. All the wather in the say wouldn't wash that out o' their heads if I was to show me nose back in it; and I wasn't goin' to have Tom, nor Maggie, nayther spoken of in that light sort of a way. So I wrote to me son Mike (or got one to write for me, for I'm no scholar), an' I tould him I'd come to his place for a while, 'til, plaze God, I could look round an' try to see could I do anything to earn a crust for meself, an' some hole or corner to put me head into.

"An' it 'ud do yer heart good to read the letther Mike wrote back to me. 'Dear Mother,' sez he, 'is it to be earning for yerself ye'd be talkin' of doin'? Shure, didn't I of'en tell ye that the day ye broke the last crust ye had in the ould box between Maggie an' me, afther me father was berried—an' ye wouldn't take a crumb of it between yer lips from ayther of us—didn't I of'en tell ye I swore a great oath in me own mind, by me patthern, St. Michael, that ye should never want while I could get ye bit or sup. I let ye go to Maggie,' he sez; 'bekass she always had the fond foolish heart, an' Tom's the broth of a boy; But if you want to come from them, come to me, an' Kitty an' I'll share our last crust with you. We're poor com-pared to Tom and Maggie, but we're quite handy to the chapel, an' the head priest is a very holy man. Kitty has no mother, the crachure, an' from what I tell her she says she'll take to you like as if it was her own mother was in it.'

"Well, with that, honey, I tould me daughter an' her husbant what I was manin' to do. An' it was then there was the ould work in airnest. Such a pulloloo as poor Maggie set up! an' indeed, Tom no less.

"'Arrah whisht,'" I sez to them, 'shure annybody'd think it was murtherin' ye, I was.'

"Of course, I never let on to them nor to Mike why I was going to quit out of it, annything more than that I was a restlesss ould woman, an' wanted to jog off home with meself, or, lasteways, to England, to see me son, seein' he was the on'y one I had. Shure they'd never get over it if I sed a word about anything else. Well, Tom took me passage for me, an' off I set; and if I wasn't the tired ould wreck o' bones be the time I got here, never mind!"

"It was a long way to come," I said, "and I daresay you travelled with a heavy heart. That tires one. You were leaving a great deal."

"Well, I was, alanna. An' I had a heavy heart. If the blessed Jesus hadn't sthren'thened me, I never could 'a done it at all. But He knew, and His blessed Mother knew, that I did it for me religion—an' could do no less. Shure didn't He lave a dale more than that for me? My leavin' was not worth mintion when ye come to that. But, however, it was St. John's day, in the evenin', a blazin' hot day as ever came from the heavens, whin I got into the station down below there, an' rowled out o' the car'age into Mike's arms. Him and Kitty was there to meet me. She's English, the poor misfortnit crachure, but a rale good heart she has, an' if I was the mother that bore her she couldn't be betther to me than what she is."

She was silent, with a far-away look in her eyes.

"I'm so glad to think you are happy with your daughter-in-law and son," said I.

Her lips trembled, and tears welled up as she turned to me. Laying a small brown hand on mine, she said quietly,

"It's on'y me daughter-in-law now, darlint. Mike is gone from us. God saw fit to take him from us one short month afther I got to him. That was the warnin' I had about bein' 'late in it,' an' it was the mercy of the good God that ever I saw Mike again. If you saw the arch blue eyes of him an' his curly black head goin' out through the dure, you'd turn an' look afther him, he was that fine clane figure of a man. But the will o' God be done. He was brought home a corpse to us one day. . . .

"May the blessin' of heaven be upon ye! for the kind heart ye have, an' the plazin' way ye listen to an ould woman's story, darlint. Shure, I feel as if me daughter Maggie was sittin' beside me!

"Yes, Mike's gone from us. Tom and Maggie wanted me, right or wrong, to go back to them, but Kitty said, 'Mother, I have nayther chick nor child, nor anyone belonging to me. It's on'y you has Mike's eyes. Don't leave me mother. I'll keep Mike's oath for him.' An', shure, what did it mather where I sted when Mike was gone? 'Twas all alike. And, maybe, God wanted me to be a stan'-by to the poor thing. She's been as good as her word to me. She works hard, an' Tom and Maggie is for ever sending me something or another, so we does very well.

"But, however, I never was one o' thim that could sit down an' do nothin'. Nayther could I live boxed up down there below in the city. 'Somethin' ketches me breath whin I do be in it always. So I got me one o' thim lishences, and began me rounds; and every penny I airn I puts part of it into the bank for fear Kitty should be tuk sick, an' the rest of it goes in masses for the repose of me husband's sowl an' Mike's. Manny and manny's the prayer I puts up for Tom and Maggie. The thought o' thim all does be with me in me thrapesin' an' sthravegin' an' I bowl along as light as a feather. I'm at it this two year now, nearly—an' that's two year off it.

"An' now, alanna, I mus' be leggin' on wid meself; I've a good ways to go before night. God be with ye, an' may all His holy angels have ye in their keepin', that felt for a strange ould woman's sorra, an' aised her heart."

She bowed several times before she passed out of sight behind a clump of bushes as she crossed the down; and then I saw her no more. I have never seen her since, nor shall I, most likely, until we both shall reach that city in which we hope to have close to us all those "Whom we have loved long since—and lost awhile."

Mary Ralph.

LITERATURE.

A GERMAN PIONEER OF LIBERAL RELIGION.*

Among those who took part two years ago in the London meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, Dr. C. Schieler, of Königsberg, will be remembered as contributing a paper on "The Free Religious Congregations of Germany." Dr. Schieler was at that time ministering to the congregations at Königsberg and Tilsit, but has since removed to Danzig. He told us in his paper of Dr. Julius Rupp, the founder of the movement, and of what he had to endure for the vindication of religious freedom; the account was, necessarily, very brief, but it prepared us to look with interest for a fuller record, and it is, therefore, with great pleasure that we have welcomed this first volume of a substantial work by Dr. Schieler, which promises to be not only a full biography of Rupp, but a valuable study of the movements of religious life in Germany, with which he was concerned during the greater part of the nineteenth century.

The present volume, is, indeed, a fragment, and tantalising on that account. It brings the story only down to 1846, when the Free Religious congregation was established at Königsberg, on Rupp's dismissal from his post in the State church, and this was but the beginning of the great conflict of his life. He was then thirty-five years of age, and the portrait at the beginning of the volume tells us that he lived to be an old man, but for the rest of the story, with the whole account of the fortunes of the Free Religious Communities, which were formed in other cities of Germany besides Königsberg, we must await the publication of Dr. Schieler's second volume. This we learn from the preface and the last page of the book, but there ought surely to have been some indication also on the cover and title page that the present volume is not complete in itself.

The impression we receive from this account of the early life of Julius Rupp, is of a man of noble character, fearless and resolute, prepared to suffer to the uttermost for his convictions of the truth, and endowed with fine gifts of mind and heart, a born teacher, a man of living religious faith, who had the power of impressing upon others the reality of the things of the spirit.

Rupp was a native of Königsberg, where nearly the whole of his life was spent. His parents had lost two elder children, before he was born in 1809, and he grew up an only child, on whom the tenderest care was lavished, and early received deep impressions of earnest piety and strongly-marked evangelical faith. His father, who held a modest position in the Government Excise Department, died while the boy was still at school, and mother and son faced the struggle with poverty together, only by very determined efforts securing the completions of his school and university training. This, as Dr. Schieler says, was fine discipline, and the best preparation for what he had afterwards to suffer for conscience' sake.

From the gymnasium Rupp passed in 1827 to the university of his native city, studying theology and philosophy, with the intention of entering the Church. Three years later, he went to Wittenberg to the seminary for the training of Lutheran clergymen, and there came under the influence of Richard Rothe, by whose ethical teaching he was deeply impressed. On the way to Wittenberg he had also heard Schleiermacher preach in Berlin, and to these two teachers Rupp, doubtless, owed much of his firm grasp of the fundamental principles of religion, as a matter of direct spiritual experience, dependent not on external authority, but on the inward witness.

Though intended for the Church, Rupp began his professional career as a teacher. Two years after he had left home for Wittenberg we find him back again in Königsberg, taking his degree as doctor of philososphy, teaching in his old school, and also lecturing as privat-docent on philosophy in the university. There followed a short experience at another school at Marienwerder, and then in

* Dr. Julius Rupp, ehem. Privatdozent, Oberlehrer und Divisionsprediger zu Königsberg i. Pr., und Die freie religiöse Bewegung in der Katholischen und Evangelischen Kirche Deutschlands im 19. Jahrhundert. Ein Beitrag zur Kirchengeschichte des 19. Jahrhunderts. Von Dr. theol. C. Schieler, ehemaliger Professor der Theologie, jetzt Frediger in Danzig. (C. Pierson's Verlag, Dresden und Leipzig. 1903. Vol. I. Price 6 Mark.)

1835 Rupp settled down at Königsberg, (in that year he also married), and for ten years held a regular mastership in his school, while at the same time he became more and more widely known as a preacher. At first, he took only occasional duty for the clergy of the different churches in Königsberg and the neighbourhood, but he quickly made his power felt as an independent thinker, of genuine liberalism and fearless religious utterance. Men came to hear him in great numbers, as they came to no other preacher in the city, and when in 1842 he was appointed one of the preachers at the Schlosskirche, a great congregation gathered round him, in addition to the troops for whom the services were nominally provided.

For three years Dr. Rupp was allowed to exercise this ministry, but one after another of his fearless utterances offended the orthodox Church authorities, and won for him the active dislike of the King, Frederick William IV., whose leanings were decidedly towards the ultra-orthodox pietism of the day.

Dr. Schieler relates with great fulness the conflicts which ensued. He tells of the rise of the German Catholic movement under Ronge and Czerski, caused by the scandal of the superstitions connected with the Holy Coat at Trier in 1844, which prompted Rupp to preach one of his outspoken sermons against dependence on miracle as the basis of religious faith; and also of another movement for greater freedom of religious life among the "Protestant Friends," in connection with which Rupp also spoke out against the injury done to religion by making the creeds rather than the spirit of the Christian life the test of faith. There were other occasions of offence, which led to mutterings of reproof on the part of the authorities, and unabashed defence of his principles by the young preacher, until on the last Sunday of 1844, he preached a sermon openly denouncing as unchristian, the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian Creed and on his refusing to retract or express regret, Rupp was dismissed from his post. He had already published a pamphlet, some eighteen months before, on the Tyranny of Creeds, but at that time, as he says in a statement addressed to the authorities, he was able to declare his belief that mischievous as was the use made of the Creeds, they contained nothing contrary to the Word of God. "But now," he adds, "I can no longer say that. My study of the gospels and of the historical development of Christianity has made it clear to me that in one of the creeds a principle is set forth which is in conflict with the Word of God." Therefore, he made that declaration to the Church authorities, and preached the sermon which led to his dismissal.

What followed, in the establishment of an independent religious society, based on this principle of freedom, what persecutions Dr. Rupp had in consequence to endure, what fruit his fearless witness bore for the encouragement of others, Dr. Schieler is to tell in his second volume, which we must hope will speedily see the light. Meanwhile, we are glad to note that at the forthcoming meeting of the International Council at Amsterdam, Dr. Schieler is to read another paper on "Fears and Hopes regarding the Religious Question in Germany."

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BIBLICA.*

THE FINAL VOLUME.

THE concluding volume of this great work is in every way worthy of those which have preceded it. It exhibits the same fulness of learning with the same scrupulous accuracy in detail, and here, as in the earlier portions, we have maps which are a marvel for beauty of execution, and give the careful student of the Scriptures help such as he has never had before. We refer especially to the map of trade routes in Palestine and Phoenicia and to the maps of those same countries (1) after the Egyptian monuments, and (2) after the Amarna letters. Indeed, we are inclined to think that some of the articles which appear in this last section of the Encyclopædia are the most valuable among the many valuable dissertations which we owe to the indefatigable industry and acuteness of Canon Cheyne and his colleagues. It will be well to give one or two instances.

First, then, we would call the reader's attention to Canon Driver's singularly lucid description of the Trachonitis, with its unique geology, and its no less unique combinations of features externally Roman with Greek and Semitic elements. By nature it was admirably adapted to be, as, in fact, it was, a nest of robbers who ravaged the more fruitful territory of their neighbours. But Herod, to whom this arduous business was entrusted by Augustus, laid his strong hand upon it, securing peace and quiet. Like tranquillity was maintained by Philip, Herod's son, and by the two Agrippas whose rule is attested in a number of Greek inscriptions which still remain. Nor is this all that is left to tell of a civilisation which has departed. The traveller even now gazes with astonishment at dwellings built of massive basalt carefully hewn "with heavy doors moving on pivots, outside staircases, galleries and roofs all of thes a mematerial," and these in such perfect preservation that it needs an effort to realise that the cities have ceased to be inhabited ages since.

We pass next to the article on "Trade and Commerce," by Dr. G. A. Smith. This is really an elaborate dissertation fit to rank with the learned and accomplished author's book on the "Historical Geography" of Palestine, and it is distinguished by the same grace of style. It is eminently readable and casts many side-lights on Israel's history. We can but choose points of interest here and there, though it is always unsatisfactory and even misleading to make selections from a treatise which, long though it is, does not contain one dull line. But we have been particularly struck by the proof given that the Egyptian and Assyrian conquests found their chief motive in the extension of trade, by the brilliant account of the way in which the young kingdom of Judah and Israel, having no harbour in the Mediterranean (Jaffa did not belong to the Jews till 144 B.C.), was driven to join the Phoenicians in trading expeditions on the Red Sea and Indian Ocean, and to use the opportunities afforded by its position on the great routes of land trade, and by its proximity to the centres of Aramean commerce on the North. Of course, the religious history of the Hebrews was deeply affected by the growth of the commercial spirit; we cannot understand the first literary prophets till we see how completely social relations had been changed by the introduction of a capitalist class, enriched by trade and by the consequent oppression of the smaller landholders; it was the idolatry occasioned by foreign merchandise which aroused the Puritan hatred of luxury which is so conspicuous in the prophets; it was trade, we are bound to add, which enlarged the Hebrew conception of the world, and even of God, thus in the end preparing the way for a religion which was to be neither tribal or national, but universal. Many a text gains a new meaning when Dr. Smith has taught us how to observe and what to look for. It is significant, for example, to find mules mentioned first as used in riding, and afterwards as beasts of burden. And we miss one chief difference between the "Book of the Covenant" and the later Deuteronomic code till we observe how prominent a place the latter gives to the commercial development of Israel. Thus it contains laws on usury and on debt; it mitigates Hebrew slavery, which was a consequence of debt; the blessing promised for Israel is that it shall lend and not borrow; it shows a tender love of the poor at a time when men stood face to face with those extremes of wealth and poverty which characterise mercantile nationalities.

Lastly, we cannot pass without special notice Mr. Burkitt's account of the Bible "Texts and Versions," which is, perhaps, the most valuable contribution in the whole extent of the Encyclopædia. It is remarkable, not only for mastery of the subject but also for the moderation and sobriety of its tone. The intelligent reader will be, perhaps, most grateful for the paragraph which deals with the questions which are before the textual critic of the New Testament in the immediate future. For the time Westcott and Hort have supplied the world with a new textus receptus. Evidently, however, great and undoubted as their services have been, much remains to be done, and the crucial difficulty, as Mr. Burkitt tells us, occurs where all the early "Western" documents are arrayed against the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS. Scholars, he says, have to ask how far the oldest forms of the Old Latin and the Syriac are independent, how far the Vatican, or even the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS. combined, are wholly free from "Alexandrian" corrections, how far, in fine, we can trust the Vatican text when it has the support of other Greek MSS., but has no attestation in such early versions as are not of Egyptian origin. He himself believes that no complete answer can be given to these vital questions till a complete analysis has been made of the extant Western variants to the text of the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS. We must leave this controversy in the hands of scholars competent to settle it, but we cannot quit Mr. Burkitt's masterly dissertation without extracting one passage, though in doing so we are returning from the consideration of the New Testament to that of the Old. The passage to which we refer runs thus:—

* "Encyclopædia Biblica." Edited by T. K. Cheyne, D.D., Oriel Professor of Holy Scripture at Oxford, and Canon of Rochester, and J. Sutherland Black, LL.D. Vol. IV., Q to Z. (London: A. and C. Black. 1903. 20s.)

It is always wholesome to remind oneself of the comparative soundness of the text. That there are blots, especially in the Old Testament, some of them probably irremovable, must be admitted. But they are not enough seriously to obscure the main features of the narratives related or the ideas expressed. So far as the Pentateuch is concerned we may be especially at our ease. It would have been impossible to separate the documents with the minuteness which modern scholarship has found possible, if the text had been much confused by scribal errors. And with regard to the Prophets, though their works are less accurately preserved than the Pentateuch, we can be sure that textual corruption never improves the style or the thought. The fact that so much of the Prophetical Books is—judged by any standard—of the first rank as literature, is the strongest proof that they have not been utterly disfigured in transmission.

These are weighty words and they are—may we not say?—the preservative against extravagances which have done much to obscure the varied excellence of the Encyclopædia Biblica. The present writer feels, as much as ever he did, the evil of those extravagances, though he is not disposed to say much more about them than he has already said in reviewing previous volumes. He is still utterly unable to believe that the Encyclopædia Biblica represents the present state of Biblical criticism. It represents the extreme radicalism which exists, though it is largely discredited, among people of the German tongue; it also represents the criticism, if criticism it can be called, which denies that St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Romans. Other schools are practically ignored, and when we turn to an article on the Resurrection, on the Son of Man on the Son of God, we know beforehand what the conclusions will be. Moderate writers do, no doubt, appear in the list of contributors, but they are confined to ground theologically neutral. Nevertheless, we may well be thankful for the immense amount of useful information which the Encyclopædia gives, and he who sees in the Bible the organ of supernatural revelation, and believes that everything which is bears witness to Christ, will welcome the utmost freedom of argument, and cherish the confidence that all things work together for good.

WILLIAM ADDIS.

MODERNISING THE NEW TESTAMENT.*

DR. WEYMOUTH'S book is a translation made directly from the Greek of the New Testament, and "is in no sense a revision." It is an effort to realise how the inspired writers would have expressed their thoughts had they been writing in our age and country; whilst at the same time avoiding the patois whether of society or the uneducated. Some hostile criticisms have been directed against it, possibly excited by the over-much self-recommendation of the preface. But it seems more reasonable to welcome any sincere and painstaking work of the kind. The results of the vast labour expended upon New Testament criticism are known only to the few. To the majority the Bible is what it has always been; and faith and scepticism use it in the old ways heedless of the new light which shines from its pages. And that new light is not spread even by many treatises. But, by greatly daring, an isolated worker may cause the light to shine at something less than the cost of a treatise. A new translation means new readers; and every new reader is so much to the good. The Twentieth Century New Testament was eagerly perused by men for whom the older version had no attraction. They did not miss the stately phrases of the A.V., because they had scarcely known them. In its familiar dress the New Testament is very largely an unknown book. Stateliness is sometimes unapproachable. If only on the ground then that a translation travels further than an essay, this book is acceptable. It has an attractive appearance, and it reads well. It avoids the unconventional phraseology which at times startled one in its immediate predecessor; but at the same time does not repel the average reader by being too "literary." An examination of a number of selected passages deepens the impression of its fairness. It would answer satisfactorily, for instance, most of the tests in the later sections of Professor Carpenter's second lecture in "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century." In a few disputed cases it supports the A.V., and there is a general tenderness for the old readings where an old doctrine is involved; but the translation is sufficiently fair to warrant the assertion that doctrine has not been the chief consideration in the translator's mind.

Mr. Moon's book is one that tries the patience. It is a series of criticisms on Bishop Thornton's "Laudation of the Revised Version of the Scriptures; and also of the English of the Revisers, showing that the version put forth by them contains errors against religion and morals so unpardonable as totally to unfit it for circulation." The pamphlet which aroused the ire of this venerable gentleman was issued by the S.P.C.K. in 1902, and spoke disparagingly of the A.V., and approvingly of the Revised Version. Mr. Moon sets out to correct the Bishop's English and also that of the R.V., and he appears to have fallen foul of nearly all the pronouns in the New Testament and some of the prepositions. "The Revisers tell us, in Matthew xxi. 12," he writes, "that Jesus 'overthrew the seats of them that sold doves, and he saith unto them, It is written, My house shall be called a house of prayer: but ye have made it a den of robbers.' Very naughty of the doves; or else very naughty of the Revisers not to have been particularly careful as to the pronouns." There are 164 pages of similar stuff, with some announcements as to terms for revision of MSS., whether prose or poetry. There may have been need for it (the criticism), but busy men will want to get on to something more useful.

* "The New Testament in Modern Speech: An Idiomatic Translation into every-day English from the text of 'The Resultant Greek Testament.'" By the late R. F. Weymouth, M.A., D.Lit. (James Clarke & Co. 2s. 6d. net.) "The Bishop's English." By Geo. W. Moon, Hon. F.R.S.L. (Sonnenschein & Co. 3s. 6d.)

THE ROAD MAKERS.*

I have had many literary and poetical translations of my pictures sent to me from time to time, but I may say that none have seemed to me so much in keeping with the work as your "House of Life." I greatly like the ring of the old Celtic poetry.

So writes Mr. G. F. Watts to the author of these poems, who must be counted happy to receive such commendation. His little book is well printed on good paper, and bound in the style of Mr. Stephen Phillips' volumes. It reveals a versatile talent expressing many moods and many admirations.

I remember coming out of the Manchester Art Gallery deeply stirred by Ford Madox Brown's famous painting called "Work," and suddenly meeting a lady friend, I began to bubble with enthusiastic unreserve. I was promptly frozen up. I now know that the democratic worship of

The toiling gang, in brown-ribbed corduroys,
Knee-strapped and belted, coats off, sleeves rolled up,
Sweating in chill October, is not a universal religion. Yet is it a religion for all that, and it has inspired the poem which has given the title to this volume, and also a prose volume by Michael Fairless, called, curiously enough, "The Road Mender."

Only those of us who have looked on a crowd of labourers busy at midnight constructing a tram-line

Great sons, firm girt and swathed in brawn

—navvies, sour-shirted, enveloped in smoke, lit up by the flare of many fires, and with dyes of flame upon their fustian—only those who can see in this the ritual of labour and derive from this an ecstasy that stirs the heart to ask:

What doest thou to smooth the way of feet?

will thank Mr. Johnson for this particular poem.

A larger number of readers will appreciate his interpretations of well-known pictures like Millet's "Angelus," "Sower," "Gleaners" and "A Woman Sewing by Lamplight." Here a woman bends to her sewing, looking up at times, we may suppose, to gaze wistfully at her babe.

Yet will she urge him gently from her side,
Like mother-birds the fledglings from the nest,
Guide his first steps, and teach the lisping
word;
And he may wander from the parent-home,
And she may stretch out mother-arms in vain,
And clasp thin air and bitter memories;
And maybe he shall kiss her ere she die!

The Watts' poems, in the section "House of Life," are perhaps the best things in the volume, for they touch the heart, not by pathetic description or argument, but in a Celtic way by great symbols and hieroglyphic images—the first and last language of the soul. Of these Mr. Watts has spoken, and it is unnecessary to quote.

A cycle of sonnets suggested by the frescoes of Puvis de Chavannes in the

* "The Road Makers and Other Poems." By Harrold Johnson. (Watts & Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

Boston Library, U.S.A., brought Mr. Johnson, we believe, the public thanks of the city librarian. They are all of more than ordinary merit, and some lines have genuine distinction.

These are followed by poems on "Fair Women," mainly Shakespeare's women, hardly so successful, though they have a charming simplicity of their own. The "Poems Chiefly Lyrical" are fragmentary and of unequal merit.

One would like to linger over other pieces here printed. "Dorothy" should be quoted in full or not at all. It is a ballad fresh as a wild rose, and as full of country fragrance as the breath of cattle or the froth of new milk. But enough has been said, I hope, to induce the reader to slip this book into his holiday bag.

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

"NO NIGHT THERE."

"IN the Land of the Midnight Sun" is the title of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's sermon in the August number of Sermons for the Day, preached in Hope-street Church on his return from a summer holiday in Norway, among the Lofoten Islands. With great vividness it pictures the wonderful effects of the constant summer daylight, in that land of which the dreamer of the Book of Revelation had not heard when he pictured the celestial city in which there should be no night, but then returns to the thankful confession that better still, more rich in blessing, are the "alternate mercies of the darkness and the day," amid which our life in these latitudes is spent.

Having described the glorious scene as they steamed northward between the mainland and the Lofoten, until they arrived at their destination on one of the islands, Mr. Armstrong adds:—

On this scene of strange and majestic beauty the sun never set during the fortnight or so that we lingered within those higher latitudes. We visited many other scenes—now a little fjord set gem-like in the midst of the frowning steeps, with its wealth of ferns and birch and bilberry lining its lovely banks, and the great cataract thundering down from the snows above, where we climbed the cliffs in the flooding sunlight of two in the morning; or again the open sea, with nothing but broad waters visible between us and the North Pole, where at twelve o'clock post meridian "the unwearied sun" far above the horizon, there was nothing to tell us that it was not mid-day. Many and various scenes, and various lights, too, now dancing sunlight, and a glow of gladness on cliff and sea, now mists and frowning clouds, and whole mountain ranges blotted clean out of sight—but always, always daylight, never the concealing veil of night, the full face of nature ever gazing on you, the mystery of darkness never floating down upon the world.

* * * *

It was all very wonderful—very beautiful.—But for how long would one like the sun thus to circle ceaselessly round the visible heaven and send his rays unceasingly upon the face of land and sea? I confess that after some ten or twelve days of this marvel, I began now and again to feel how delightful it would be to see the darkness softly creeping over mountain and ocean. And there kept uttering itself in my heart that phrase in one of Martineau's inspired prayers which praises God for sending us "Alternate mercies of the darkness and the day."

* * * *

Let me be no traitor to the wonder and beauty of that perpetual day, with all nature bursting into luxuriant life, after the long winter darkness, wherever moss or fern or shrub could find leave to grow, or myriad buttercups could dash the green with gold. I would not be without that experience for more than I can say. Still sunset glory and rosy dawn have meanings which would be unknown to a world fixed under a perpetual sun. And coming back after one's sojourn in those high latitudes to a zone which always knows God's "alternate mercies of the darkness and the day," one felt the deliciousness of darkness and the deeper restfulness of its repose. And when the first star opened its eye over the sea which the sun had not permitted to declare itself to us for so long a span of days, its shining seemed to have a holiness which one would not willingly miss from the influences of life.

We trust that we may be forgiven this long quotation. It should send many readers to the sermon itself as a whole.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE STORY OF SHEEMAH.

ADAPTED FROM A POEM BY LOWELL.

ALTHOUGH most of us feel that it would be a very nice thing to change places with Robinson Crusoe for a little while, no one really wants to spend the whole of his life right away from everybody else; we know we are made to live together in little companies, in families, in groups, and we find out that all that is good and truly noble in us is brought out by our mixing with other people, by giving and taking amongst our fellows. The Indian story which follows is meant to show what loss there is when men and women forget that they are here first of all to help each other, that each is his brother's keeper.

By the side of a great lake lived an old chief with his children. His wife had been dead some few years, and now he felt he was dying also; he called his two elder children to his side, and told them that the time had come for him to leave them. They were young, strong, and able to take care of themselves, but their little brother Sheemah was as yet a mere child, knowing nothing of hunting or fishing, nor able to protect himself from the wild animals and the cold. "So," said the chief, "he needs all your love and care; be kind to him, for my sake, when I am gone." Then both the elder son and daughter faithfully promised to look after the little one till he was able to manage for himself.

For a little while both of them kept their promise, but at last the elder brother began to feel a longing for other company than that of his sister and the little child. He thought of the tribe to which he belonged, and made up his mind to go and join his relatives there, leaving his sister to look after Sheemah as best she might. One day he went out as usual with his bow and arrows as if for hunting, but he never returned; he found the wigwams of his tribe, became a great man amongst the people, found a wife for himself, and forgot all about Sheemah and the duty which his father had laid upon him.

Long did the sister wait for his return, and very sad was she when she knew that he would never come back again; but she struggled bravely and did the best she could for Sheemah, going out in the woods to get food for herself and him, and watching to see that no harm came near. With a stronger love than her brother, her patience lasted longer, but at last she began to feel, as he had done, the loneliness of the place, and a desire to see the others of the tribe; she thought less and less of her promise and her duty, and so stronger and stronger grew the desire to get away.

One night Sheemah found himself alone. In fear and sorrow he tried to sleep, hoping he would wake to find his sister as usual by his side; but neither sleep nor sister came, and the morning found him worn out from crying, and beginning to realise that he was utterly deserted.

Poor little Sheemah, afraid to stir from the cave, waited day by day for the step that never came, and little by little his store of food (the last kind act of his sister's doing) began to disappear, till all was gone. Then he had to face the snow, and seek for means of life in awful terror of wild animals and unknown dangers in the woods. So it happened that he became the companion of a wolf. More starved than that wild hunter, he had often been obliged to eat the pieces that the wolf had thrown away, and at last a feeling of sympathy for a being hungrier and more afraid than himself made the wolf his friend and helper, so that before the spring came the two hunted together and shared the same den. The friendship deepened, and Sheemah lived entirely with the wolves and just as one of them.

Now a good while later it happened that Sheemah's brother was fishing in the lake when he was surprised to hear upon the shore a low moaning noise that was neither a child's cry nor a wolf's howl, but seemed somehow to be made up of both. When it came again, something in his heart told him it was Sheemah's voice. Full of shame for his broken promise, he hastened to the shore to find him, but the sight that met his eyes filled him with horror. There was what seemed a child, and yet was half a wolf, all the body covered with hair, gray and shaggy, and just the face left that was quite human, and even that seemed to change more and more into a wolf's as he gazed upon it. Spell-bound he stood, while the thought of his neglected duty burned his heart. At last he was able to cry out a word to the creature that was already turning as if to flee away. "Sheemah," he said, "little Sheemah, do you not know me? Come to me, your brother; forgive me, we will live together and you shall not want again." Answer at first there was none, and then, as though it were difficult to find a human voice, the creature, in tones that belonged more to a wolf's than to a human being, said, "No, I don't know you, you are no brother of mine. The wolves are my brothers, and till your heart is changed from what it is you are not worthy to be called their friend." The brother groaned bitterly. He was ready now to do anything for this little brother, work for him, live for him, die for him, if only he would come to him. But it was too late. Looking up, fearfully, to make one more appeal, he saw only a wolf, that slank away to hide in the woods; and over the lake in the dull evening's quiet was wafted a dreary howl that chilled the hearts of all who heard it.

[ARTHUR HARVIE.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom, or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, AUGUST 22, 1903.

THE "INTERNATIONAL" PROGRAMME.

WE have now received a copy of the completed Programme of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, which is to meet in Amsterdam, September 1 to 4. The programme is perhaps already in the hands of those who have secured membership tickets, or will very shortly be so, but many other of our readers will take a keen interest in the meetings, although unable themselves to be at Amsterdam, and we shall therefore give here a synopsis of the whole programme. The subjects of the various papers are given, we conclude, in the language in which each will be read.

The programme, which is printed at Leiden, is most attractively produced, in much the same form as the London programme of two years ago. It contains a capital map of Amsterdam, with a slighter sketch of Haarlem, to which an excursion is to be made on the Thursday afternoon. In Dutch, English, German, and French, it gives all needful information, and promises, with much hard work, a most delightful week.

Monday evening, before the arrival of the main party from England, and Tuesday morning, are devoted, it will be seen, to the annual gathering of Dutch Liberal ministers, postponed this year from its usual time of meeting in the Spring to the International week. The proceedings will be in Dutch, and members of the International Council are cordially invited to attend, but members of the reception committee very considerately offer both morning and afternoon to conduct parties of visitors for sight-seeing in Amsterdam. Then in the evening comes the united religious service, followed by a welcome to the foreign delegates.

The Council, it will be seen, is not to pass an idle week. Wednesday morning and afternoon and Thursday and Friday mornings are to be devoted to its business, which, including the President's Address and the secretary's report, amounts to the reading and hearing of twenty-four papers. The following list of subjects shows how happily the various interests and nationalities are blended in this common work. But even if enthusiastic endurance gives faithful attention to the whole of the twenty-four papers, there is ample respite and abundant opportunity for enjoyment of other kinds.

The Dutch rendering of the Merchant of Venice on Wednesday evening, and the excursions to Haarlem and Edam on Thursday and Friday afternoons, are arranged with the most hospitable foresight, in their provision of varied pleasures, high interests, and delightful opportunities for social intercourse.

PROGRAMME.

Monday, August 31.

7.0 p.m.—Meeting of Dutch Liberal Ministers in the Gebouw van den Werkenden Stand, Kloveniersburgwal, 87–89.

President's Address, Professor Dr. T. Cannegieter.

P. Feenstra Jr. "Mogen wij toelaten, dat de behoudende stroomingen op godsdienstig en staatkundig gebied zich het uitsluitend recht op den Christennaam aanmatigen? Zoo neen, hoe daartegen te reageeren?"

Discussion.

The proceedings of the Ministers' Meeting on Monday and Tuesday will be in Dutch. Members of the International Council are cordially invited to attend.

11.19 p.m.—Arrival of the main party from England.

Tuesday, September 1.

10.0 a.m.—Meeting of Dutch Liberal Ministers, Kloveniersburgwal, 87–89.

Dr. C. H. Ris Lambers. "Uit welken wortel stamt het Néo-Calvinisme onzer dagen; welke zijn zijne vruchten; welke toekomst is er voor te verwachten?"

Dr. J. van den Bergh. "Hoe is de oplevende gehechtheid aan Kergenootschap onder Modernen te verklaren?"

10.0 a.m. to 4 p.m.—Members of the International Council Reception Committee will attend at the office, at the Hall of the Vrije Gemeente, Weteringschans, near the Leidsche plein, to conduct parties for sight-seeing in Amsterdam.

7.0 p.m.—Religious service in the Old Walloon church, Oudezijds-Achterburgwal, near the Hoogstraat.

Preacher, the Rev. J. van Loenen Martinet.

8.30 p.m.—Welcome to foreign delegates, in the Gebouw van den Werkenden Stand, Kloveniersburgwal, 87–89.

Admission here and to the service by Membership-ticket.

Wednesday, September 2.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL, in the Hall of the Vrije Gemeente, Weteringschans.

10.0 a.m.—President's Address, Prof. Dr. H. Oort. (Leiden).

10.30 —Secretary's Report, Rev. C. W. Wendte.

10.45—Prof. J. Estlin Carpenter (Oxford), "The place of Christianity in the Religions of the World."

11.15—Prof. Dr. J. Réville (Paris), "La religion et la conception moderne de l'ordre naturel."

11.45—Dr. S. A. Eliot (Boston), "Liberal religion in America."

12.10—Prof. Dr. T. Cannegieter (Utrecht), "Persoonlijkheid en Godsdienst."

2.0 p.m.—Prof. O. E. Lindberg (Göteborg), "Die religiösen Verhältnisse in Schweden."

2.20—Rev. R. A. Armstrong (Liverpool), "The conception of God as the 'soul of all souls.'"

2.50—Prof. Dr. A. Bruining (Amsterdam), "Het agressief karakter van het vrijzinnig-godsdienstig geloof."

3.10—V. R. Shinde (Bombay) "Liberal religion in British India."

3.30—Rev. J. Hocart (Brussels), "Les difficultés pour la religion libérale en Belgique."

3.50—Dr. C. Schieler (Danzig) "Befürchtungen und Hoffnungen bezüglich der religiösen Frage in Deutschland."

4.10—Prof. S. Cramer (Amsterdam), "Do liberal religious believers want to be organised as a Church?"

8.0 p.m.—Performance of "De Koopman van Venetië" (Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice), in the Paleis voor Volksvlijt, Frederiksplein.

Admission by membership ticket.

Thursday, September 3.

9.30 a.m.—Dr. J. H. Crooker (Ann Arbor), "American Ideals in Education."

10.0—Prof. Dr. O. Pfleiderer (Berlin), "Das neutestamentliche Christusbild im Lichte der Religionsgeschichte."

10.30—Rev. P. H. Wicksteed (Childrey), "The revived interest in mediæval Religion."

11.0—Rev. J. E. Roberty (Paris), "Le mysticisme chrétien et la Protestantisme libéral français."

11.30—Prof. Dr. E. Montet (Geneva), "Le principe monotheiste en dehors du Christianisme consideré comme base d'une alliance religieuse universelle."

12.0—Edwin D. Mead (Boston), "The world's debt to Holland for the Propaganda of Universal Peace."

1.0 p.m.—Excursion to Haarlem, by special train.

3.30.—Organ recital and Zalsman Quartet in the Groote Kerk (St. Bavo).

6.0.—Dinner in the Brongebouw.

8.0.—Concert in the Gardens.

10.30.—Special train leaves for Amsterdam.

Excursion tickets, 3fl. (5s.) inclusive, must be taken by Wednesday, 4 p.m.

Friday, September 4.

9.30 a.m.—Rev. N. Józan (Budapest), "Religious movements in Hungary."

9.50—Prof. Dr. M. A. Gooszen (Leiden), "De Evangelische Reveil in Nederland omstreeks 1834."

10.10—Rev. K. Andresen (Blankenese), "Die Notwendigkeit neuer positiver Glaubenslehren."

10.30—Rev. G. Schoenholzer (Zürich), "Die Entwicklung des freisinnigen Christenthums in der deutschen Schweiz.

10.50—A. Bourrier (Sèvres), "L'émancipation de la pensée religieuse parmi les prêtres."

11.10—Z. Toyosaki (Tokio), "Liberal religion in Japan."

12.20 p.m.—Excursion to Edam and Volendam on the Zuiderzee.

By steam-tram to Edam.

4.15.—Steamer leaves Volendam, arriving 6.30 at Amsterdam.

Tea on board.

Excursion ticket, 1fl. (1s. 8d.).

THE UNIVERSITIES OF HOLLAND.

THE history of the universities of Holland is one of great glory and of shameful neglect.

After the wonderful rise of our State in the seventeenth century came the no less surprising and rapid decline of the eighteenth century. The "Maid of Holland," who once stood "within her garden wall,"* with proud challenge, who dared to send her men-of-war even to the mouth of the Thames, and fought at the same time England, France, and two of her neighbours—she was now sitting like an old, tired lady, with folded, weary hands, pondering upon her lost past, in the dark back room of Europe.

Our academies followed her fate. Flourishing in the time of the Stadtholder Frederick Henry, and the Grand Pensionary, John de Witt, as much as our school of painting, they went to an incredible decay in the luxurious but egoistic, snobby period of the eighteenth century.

The restoration of the house of Orange and the increasing stability of the royal throne, brought back constancy of development to our public institutions, and was favourable to the social welfare of the people. Hence the renewed flourishing state of our academic instruction.

Universities Past and Present.

Nowadays we boast of four properly equipped public universities—in Leiden, Amsterdam, Utrecht and Groningen. Moreover there is in Amsterdam a beginning of a private university, with three scantily provided faculties, called the "free university," though it is the most unfree seat of science, as it is bound to the system of Calvinistic dogmatics. It is little more than a college for the training of young men for the ministry among the most conservative Protestants of our country, who are united in the so-called "reformed churches" (Gereformeerde Kerken). Likewise the Roman Catholic Church has her grand seminaries at Rijsenburg, Culemborg, Warmond, Haaren, Hoeven and Roermond, whilst the Episcopal Catholic Church, the Jews, and other denominations also have their own seminaries or colleges.

Four universities in a country of a little more than five million inhabitants is, perhaps, too much. Yet the number has already much diminished. In the time of the Republic each of the seven provinces had her own university, or at least her Athenæum, except only the province of Zeeland. There were at that time universities in Leiden, Groningen, Utrecht, Francher (a town of Friesland) and Harderwijk (a town of Gelderland), and besides an Athenæum, a kind of second-rate academy, in Amsterdam and Deventer.

Leiden University.

The queen of all was the university of Leiden, founded in 1575, a reward for the splendid and successful defence of the town against the Spanish armies during a stubborn siege of nearly half a year.

The chief purpose of the university was the education of Dutch reformed ministers. The university was to represent the "Palladium of the Church of Christ." It would prove, however, quite difficult to get a dozen learned professors. It was a time of war; Holland was in notorious revolt against her legal prince, the King of Spain. The chance of arms was most uncertain. The reformed clergy were for the most part an unlearned company. Several endeavours failed. Thomas Cartwright, for instance, rejected every claim to his interest in the designed rampart of the Reformed faith. The beginning was most humble. Balthasar Lydius said about it: "All is scanty here in Leiden; scanty are the professors, scanty are the students."

This changed all at once, when the learned and celebrated Justus Lipsius, la lumière de son siècle, le prince du sénat des savants, accepted a professorship, 1578. So much the greater was the disappointment when he went back to his native land, 1591, becoming, moreover, a convert of the despised Roman Catholic Church, and giving the splendid light of his renowned learning to the hostile university of Louvain.

Joseph Scaliger.

Two years after that Leiden enjoyed a more than sufficient compensation by the coming of the not less celebrated scholar Josephus Scaliger, likewise a famous man of letters. He received the rank of a professor without any obligation to give either public or private lectures. He lived sixteen years at Leiden, and was attended like a prince. The Stadtholder received him at his table, and placed him above his own cousins. When he died (January 21, 1609), the university wore mourning, and all lectures stopped for a week. At the time of his funeral even all business was prohibited. The mere fact of his dwelling in Leiden attracted in the course of sixteen years more than 3,200 students, among whom 1,250 were foreigners. No wonder that he was subjected to the deadly hatred of the Jesuits.

Salmasius.

In the year 1630, another decoy-bird was engaged—his equal, the renowned Salmasius. He too was bound by no other duty than that of dwelling in Leiden and writing learned books, especially a confutation of the "Annales Ecclesiasticæ" of Baronius. This agreeable charge was paid with a yearly allowance of fl.2,000, which in course of time was increased to an amount of fl.5,000, with free lodging and exemption from all taxes.* At his father's death he went for some time to France, and the Admiralty put a man-of-war at his disposal for the passage to Dieppe, and escorted her by a whole squadron!

Among the professors at that time were also Heinsius, Golius and Vossius. Golius composed an Arabian dictionary, which Bedwell judged to be complete, and a Persian one, printed in London; Vossius was esteemed as the "perfectus grammaticus."

Privileged Leiden.

Who would wonder that the fame of the university of Leiden spread far beyond the frontiers of our small Republic? For example, Henry IV., of France, allowed to the graduates of the faculties of Law and Philosophy the same rights as the graduates of a French university. Louis XIII. accorded the same favour to all faculties of Leiden.

The trustees or curators of the university did, indeed, their utmost to justify the reputation of our Dutch Athens. Leiden, f.i., was the first university to provide for the needs of astronomical instruction by erecting an observatory. The observatories of Tycho Brahé and that of the Landgrave of Hesse were the only ones of earlier date. Renowned astronomers at Leiden were Snellius, Gravesande and Kaiser. The library of the university was founded by William the Silent, who endowed it with the "Biblia Regia." At present the library is known because of its considerable collection of Oriental manuscripts. The Government of Holland provided for the increase of the library by the wise Act of 1653, by virtue of which the printing of a book would not be licensed unless the university was presented with a copy of it.

The medical faculty got an incomparable renown through Sylvius, whose reputation attracted hundreds of foreigners, and still more in the glorious days of Boerhaave (1709–1738), the "Dutch Hippocrates."

Decay and Rejuvenescence.

The eighteenth century was, for the rest, a time of lamentable decay, an undeniable proof of the destructive effect on science and civilisation, exercised as well by social luxury as by political agitation. The university was in the years 1760–1800 but a shadow of her past. Fuimus Troes! Fuit Ilion et gloria Tencrorum!

The revival came with the reign of Louis Bonaparte (1806–1810), and the

---

* The coin of Holland in the time of the Republic showed the "Maid of Holland" (Maagd van Holland, Hollandsche Maagd) standing within a "garden wall" (tuin van Holland) with a lion at her feet and a "hat of liberty" on her lance.

* The ordinary salary of a Professor was then in Holland about fl.600, in Germany scarcely the half of that amount.

annexation of our country by the French Empire (1810–1813), followed by the incorporation of the Academy of Leiden in the Imperial University (Université Impériale).

A new period of flourishing life began in the year 1815, when Holland, new-born under the royal auspices of the dear house of Orange, regenerated all her best qualities. A number of great scholars adorned the university, and made her known again throughout the world: Cobet, the "Archigræcus," the best citizen of Athens, as an Athenian professor said some years ago; Fruin, the historian; Lorentz, who got the "Nobel prize" last year, and others.

Liberal Theologians.

Last, not least, the renowned theologians Scholten, the father of the "Moderne Richting" (i.e., the Liberal Protestant tendency in theology and church), Kuenen, Rauwenhoff and Tiele, whose well-known merits I need not dwell upon here.

The present faculty, Van Manen (just retiring from his academic chair), Pijper, Eerdmans, Kristensen, Chantepie de la Saussaye, is happily maintaining the liberal traditions, though in the person of the latter somewhat infected with conservatism. Professor Oort, the Hebraist, belonging to the literary faculty, Gooszen, Knappert and Groenewegen, seminary professors, are supporting their efforts in concurrent harmony.

Utrecht University.

The universities of Leiden, Utrecht and Groningen are national institutions, while the (public) university of Amsterdam is a municipal one. For this reason only, and not because of the importance of the university of Utrecht, I will deal now with this latter.

During the Middle Ages Utrecht was the ecclesiastical centre of our country, and though our historians unjustly used to treat Holland (in consequence of her later preponderance) as the focus of our mediæval history as well as of that of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, it was Utrecht that was the centre of the political, social and scientific life of the Netherlands of those days. One cannot, consequently, be surprised to find the foundation of a university at Utrecht planned as early as the year 1470. The plan, renewed in 1580, was only realised in 1632, when a municipal Gymnasium Illustre was erected, inaugurated in 1634 and reorganised in 1636 as a State university with six professors, of whom but one was a theologian. The beginning was rather humble, as we see, and the history of this university was never exceedingly brilliant during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Nevertheless, it had at times renowned scholars, like the warlike Voetius, the battle-axe of Orthodoxy. In the nineteenth century the radiant light of the popular philosophers, Van Heusde and Opzoomer, shone in the scientific firmament of Utrecht.

Among the students at Utrecht there have always been a large number of Hungarian theologians; and if I am not mistaken, there are some still.

Napoleon degraded the school of Utrecht to an école secondaire, but King William I. re-established it in its former rank, and at present it is one of our most important and much frequented universities, with a brilliant medical faculty. The theological faculty is still nowadays a seat of orthodoxy, though one of the ecclesiastic professors, Dr. T. Cannegieter, a well-beloved man, adheres to the principles of liberal theology. He is the representative of the University of Utrecht among the members of the Committee of the International Congress.

Groningen University.

Groningen, the birth-place of Wessel Gansfort, the lux mundi, who preferred a Greek and a Latin Bible to a bishopric, offered him by Sixtus IV., is the most flourishing town in the north of the Netherlands. The university, founded in 1614, enjoyed a very high reputation till 1672, and at that time attracted a great many foreigners, especially from Germany. Even some Englishmen sought their intellectual food at the breast of our northern Alma Mater.

Among her most celebrated scholars of those days are to be mentioned Gomarus, the author of the anti-Arminian conflict, and Maresius, a born Frenchman and a true game-cock, who raised, f. i., a fearful cry againt John Biddle, the father of English Unitarianism, charging the whole British nation and its governors with Socinianism, since a Master of Arts of the university of Oxford openly professed such execrable views.

After 1672, the year of the siege of Groningen by the Bishop of Münster, the prosperity of the university faded quickly away. 1679–1680, during three half years there was not even one single theological professor at the university! 1690–1691 the whole Academical Senate was composed of not more than four professors; in the year 1712, not even this number was attained! Moreover, the university of Groningen has been notorious because of the quarrels of its professors.

But happily there followed better days. The celebrated Bernouilli, a great naturalist, shed during some ten years the light of his endowments upon the university. Napoleon maintained the Academy of Groningen in its rank of a university.

About 1850 a school of evangelical theologians, founded by Professors Hofstede de Groot and Van Oordt, and called the Groningen Richting, prepared the path for the "modern" theology.

The present theological faculty of Groningen is a mixed one, composed of a tolerant orthodox majority and a liberal minority. The liberal students, however, organised themselves some years ago, and are trying to get a sufficient scientific guidance by establishing free courses of lectures, given by independent scholars from elsewhere.

Amsterdam University.

The university of Amsterdam is one of the best equipped in Holland, and registers the largest number of students. The faculties of medicine and natural science are the favourites of the trustees, and rejoice in the possession of magnificent laboratories and hospitals, and are adorned by the names of several eminent teachers. One of the most celebrated, the learned Professor J. H. Van't Hoff, endowed with the first Nobel prize, left the university some time ago and is appointed now at Berlin. Professor Hugo de Vries is the father of the Mutation Theory. Many other names could be mentioned, testifying the high standard of the university. But there is a grave reverse, viz., that the university of Amsterdam, though gifted with the same rights as the other universities, such as that of granting degrees, is a municipal institution, and follows, therefore, the variable humour of the municipal board of Amsterdam. Our metropolis is a commercial town, and the fate of science is hardly to be committed to the hands of merchants who usually value things according to their obvious practical results. So the university was threatened. not for the first time, in 1893, with nothing less than total abrogation!

Founded in 1632 for mere municipal needs as a Gymnasium Illustre, it was soon after distinguished as the Athenæum of Amsterdam. Vossius, the Perfectus Grammaticus, and Barlaeus, renowned littérateurs, were her godfathers and first professors, The fear of Leiden that her university could be damaged by the Athenæum of Amsterdam, was as little founded as that of Switzerland, that the school of Amsterdam would become a focus of Arminianism. The Athenæum was indeed, during a long course of years, an asylum of free science.

In 1878 the Athenæum was transformed into a university, and rejoices since then in the most flourishing state she ever knew.

Among her renowned theologians are to be mentioned the Lutheran A. D. Loman and the Mennonite S. Hoekstra, who both died some years ago. The present faculty, D. J. Völter, S. Cramer, I. J. de Bussy, W. Brandt and A. Bruining, are to be reckoned among the most deserving representatives of liberal theology.

The Bane of Theological and Philosophical Disputes.

The universities of Holland have been conspicuous by their sharp dogmatic and philosophical quarrels. It was the fault of the time, and partly to be understood by the constitutional rules of our academies, for these were chiefly founded in order to serve the interest of the church, to wit, the Church of the State—the Dutch Reformed Church. The academical laws of Groningen contained the following rule:—Professores sunto in religione orthodoxi; pugnantia cum orthodoxia, catechesi Palatina (the catechism of Heidelberg) et Confessione Belgica (the Dutch Confession written by Guy de Braye), comprehensa non defendunto. Si quis id fecerit pertinacius, aut defendentibus aliis serio patrocinatus fuerit, nec monitus destiterit, exautorator. By virtue of this rule, even a Law Professor, the learned Van der Marck, was dismissed, 1773. One of his colleagues, the celebrated naturalist Bernouilli, the inventor of the experimental method (seven or eight years before Keill, who is estimated in England to be the father of that method), suffered so much from odium theologicum that he left the university of his own accord.

Orthodox dogma being connected with the Aristotelian philosophy, the system of Aristotle was stipulated to be the only one allowed at our universities.

Hence repeatedly virulent theological and philosophical controversies and even persecutions. Socinianism, Arminianism, Cartesianism, Coccejanism and Spinozism were scandalous sins and intolerable heresy. Not seldom political circumstances decided those quarrels. The accession to the Stadtholdership of William III. brought the victory to the side of Voetianism and Aristotelianism, and the old Professor Heidanus, an adherent of the Cartesian philosophy, was dismissed. When Voistius, an Arminian and Socinian, as he was said to be, was appointed at the university of Leiden (1611), a foe of his sent his books to George Abbot, the Archbishop of Canterbury. Abbot gave them to James I., and the king sent an angry letter to the Dutch Government, affirming that he would be gravely offended if such a "monster should get a place of honour in the Church." He called Voistius a malheureux hérétique on plutost atheïste. In the atriums of the universities of Cambridge and Oxford and on St. Paul's Churchyard he erected wood piles and caused the books of Voistius to be burnt. The Dutch Government opposed in vain, and ended by dismissing Voistius most honourably.

Not infrequently theological and philosophical controversies caused fights between the students, at Leiden even in the auditorium medicum. It sounds all like an old fable now; the passion of truth has long since given way in the scientific arena to the love of truth. May this remain our dear companion through life, enriching all our earthly days. In service of this love of truth the universities of Holland are trying to do good work. May they prosper in spite of the somewhat conservative or even retrograde politics of our present Government!

Makkum. F. C. Fleischer.

THE CHRISTIAN IDEAL OF PEACE.*

BY THE REV. JOHN HUNTER, DD.

It is the one supreme business of the church, and of the pulpit as the organ of the church, to keep the ideal, the Christian ideal of life and duty before men. In great public questions the church ought to be representative of moral authority, informing the mind and conscience and helping to create a new and better mind and conscience in regard to things, supplying people with the Christian interpretation of their duties and with those principles which steady both head and heart amid difficulties and problems which would otherwise confuse and bewilder. In days of great public excitement and trouble, men need more than ever to have the events of the time lifted out of the dusty and noisy ways of the world into the light and calm of eternal principles, so that they may be given a meaning which they did not have before. The very fact that the minds of men are indisposed by the strong feelings which war ever evokes toward the quiet and serious consideration of the law and ideal of Christ, is all the more reason why the pulpit should not neglect its duty of interpreting or applying the Christian wisdom of life, and of doing what it can to produce the Christian temper and outlook. Any defection or failure here would betray on the part of a Christian minister a cowardice or corruption of nature, and would be nothing less than a falsehood to his calling. Of course, it is not his calling to be a political agitator or demagogue, or to speak in the pulpit rash and ill-considered words, but he is called upon to lift passing things into their truer, and higher, and larger meanings, and to accentuate the truth of life, not with secular, but with devotional tones. And I know from my own experience that it is possible to speak plainly and faithfully from the pulpit to mixed congregations, to men of all political schools and parties, on the subject of war without giving any offence. In spite of all appearances to the contrary, men who are of most real value to the community like to hear the practical problems of life considered from the standpoint of the Christian ideas and the Christian spirit, and that is one chief reason why they go to church Sunday after Sunday. They have had enough of the superficial and merely temporal and newspapery aspects of these problems during the week, they now want to see them illumined by the light which eternal principles throw over them. But even if men were not sympathetic and responsive, but hostile or indifferent, the Christian teacher must not hesitate to declare the mind of his Master at whatever cost to himself. Our religion is a principle and law for the whole of life, its field is the world, a field as wide as our relations to God and mankind. And to every Christian man the great end of politics is the conformity of our human institutions and affairs to the divine order. A religion which is likely to lead us astray in our public and political affairs, in our attitude towards great national and international questions, is not a safe guide for us in any relation of life—it is not a religion fit for any wise and honest man. But people who do not want to apply Christianity to politics are either ignorant of Christianity or have never really taken it to their hearts. The order of God on earth—"as in Heaven so on earth"—was the central idea and enthusiasm of Jesus Christ. Everyone who lives deep in His fellowship cannot doubt the coming of a day of universal brotherhood and peace, and what is more, cannot help living and working amid honour and dishonour in the direct line of his conviction and hope and prayer. Let not then anything ever move us to part with, or even to lower in the slightest degree, the Christian ideal. Let us cherish and maintain it in the face of much that seems to deny it—nations learning war as they never did aforetime, men employing all their intellect and skill to perfect the science of destruction.

* * * * *

The military system needs to be jealously watched, but we cannot yet do without it. When a better spirit reigns, the armies and navies of civilised and other nations will never be the instruments of ambition or oppression, but a kind of international police, the stewards and guardians of the people, the security of all that is just, and wise, and good, and peaceful in the life of nations.

The day of war, alas, is not past, but morally it is an anachronism and retrogression in civilisation. It ought not to be necessary now between civilised and Christian nations. It is a method and device of a barbarous period of social progress, and wherever practised, by modern nations, in some period of critical strain, it ought to be regarded like capital punishment—as a horrible and tragical thing, not to be welcomed, not to be rejoiced at, but to be lamented, as a crime against humanity and a sin against God. For how it reverses all the natural and moral relations of men and it decides nothing as to the right or wrong of the questions at issue—only which is the stronger of two military forces. A mere physical conquest can confer no moral right. Might cannot be right, and the successes brought by violation of, or compromises with, moral law, are the most dangerous successes that can be won by men or nations.

The true strength of nations rests in their allegiance to the highest ideal, and law, which they see and know. This, which is the teaching of religion, is the verdict of history. There never was a bolder and braver prediction than the third beatitude, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Though the word "meek" has been spoiled for us by its association with weakness and want of spirit, yet we know well what it meant. Jesus meant that the coming race would not be a coarse and brutal and arrogant people, but a race strong in all the higher qualities, strong in justice, strong in truth, strong in love and sympathy and self-sacrifice and religion; chivalrous, gentle, friendly, brotherly people. It is a bold prophesy, I say; but to an extent which few realise it has become true, and will become more and more true as years and days go by. The progress of civilisation so far has actually consisted in the gradual ascendancy in communities of the higher human qualities and of the unselfish virtues. And all noble development is in this direction, in leaving behind us our animalism, brutalism and barbarism, and all the methods and ways born of them. In the lower and ruder stages of life, the survival of the fittest seems a merciless law, but by-and-by it takes on a new expression; it takes the weak under its protection, by summoning to their aid those human sympathies which render it necessary for the strong to help and defend the weak, if they themselves would come off conquerors in the struggle and vindicate their own fitness to live.

Let us not turn our faces away, then, from the possibility of universal peace. Let us keep the ideal of Christian civilisation steadily before us—the nations of the world bound in the bonds of brotherhood. We are no longer at the brutal and barbarous stage of social evolution; and it is no longer right to think and speak about war as men used in less enlightened times, praising and glorifying, as did Tennyson in "Maud," that worthless and, even then, antiquated barbarism—the Crimean war—because it broke in upon a state of things at home that was full of wrong and shame. If war is to be encouraged on the ground that without it the noble passions and heroic virtues grow cold and die, why do we not return to the savage state when every man was a fighter? But "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war"; and the manly and heroic qualities need have no difficulty in finding, as they have found, other fields for their exercise and display than the battlefield. Think of the great moral and social reforms which were carried forward during the reign of Queen Victoria without shedding a drop of blood. Let us do the fullest justice to the courage that is shown in battle, but let us also remember the courage, the moral and Christian courage, that is shown in the service of truth and charity. It is time that war was seen in its true colours, stripped of the trappings with which it is usually adorned. No matter how righteous or unavoidable it may seem to be, its actual facts are ever unspeakably horrible, its methods brutal and morally vulgar.

* From an address at the recent annual meeting of the Peace Society.

Few of us have imagination enough to realise the enormous costliness of the war-system as it is in Europe, even in times of peace. All that is annually spent on libraries, art galleries, and on public education is more than swallowed up by a few days of war. That is part of the cost which civilisation pays to barbarism. And to all this we have to add the diversion of the mental and moral energies of a people from the ennobling arts of peace with all their fruits. It is true the tremendous cost of war—its cost in human life and suffering, the injury it inflicts on civilisation and religion, the great back-wave which it ever starts in the direction of barbarism, its obscuration of high ideals, and all its demoralising effects—it is true that all these things are not sufficient reasons in themselves for not going to war, if war is the right thing and inevitable, but they are reasons weighty and impressive, for not going to war for any end save the restraint of unprovoked and unscrupulous aggression; save the restraint of injustice and wrong; reasons for not going to war, if it be at all possible to settle quarrels and secure just ends by the exercise of that wisdom which Solomon said, long ago, is better than weapons of war.

NATURAL INSPIRATION.

I have often been struck with a sentence in Professor Seeley's preface to the second edition of "Natural Religion." He says: "As I meant the inquiry to be serious, I thought it essential to take the scientific view frankly at its worst. I therefore make no attempt to show that the negative conclusions so often drawn from modern scientific discoveries are not warranted, but admitting freely, for argument's sake, all these conclusions, I argue that the total effect of them is not to destroy theology, or religion, or even Christianity, but in some respects to revive and purify all three." Professor Seeley's book discusses the essence of Religion. Without waiting to notice that such and such an axiom accepted by scientific men is doubtful, or that such and such a conclusion is not warranted by the facts in hand, he leaves the scientific men to correct their own errors, as they are able; meanwhile, he says in effect, we will discuss our problem on the supposition that there is nothing substantial to correct.

It has several times occurred to me that our times demand that a companion volume should be written. A book is now wanted such as even the ever industrious and ever helpful Harnack has not yet supplied; a book that shall take Biblical Criticism seriously, in Professor Seeley's sense of that word. For the first time in their lives English readers are put into possession of the worst that the critics can say. The Encyclopædia Biblica, whatever defects it may have, has this great merit: that it is calculated to compel the English reader to consider what the soul of the Bible will be when the critics have so bemauled its body that they, literally, "have no more that they can do." As Seeley called his book Natural Religion, there is room now for a book that might deal with Natural Inspiration.

Suppose that by-and-by the long-suffering English reader shall cease to resist the inevitable. Harnack and Friedrich Delitzsch, Kuenen and Van Manen, Cheyne and Estlin Carpenter shall have their own way. Where there is any possible doubt, the most extreme conclusion shall be considered to be the most probable. Will not then the whole worth of the Bible be summed up in the phrase which Dr. Stanton Coit has used for his little book of selected readings, "The Message of Man"? As a set of commandments given forth from Sinai amid thunder and lightning and trumpet sounds, and engraved afterwards on stone tablets by the finger of God, the Decalogue has lost authority. It speaks to us only as Man's message to man. "These words," says the Deuteronomist, "the Lord spake unto all your assembly in the mount out of the midst of the fire." "These words," so the modern reader has to translate, "These words some earnest Israelitish prophet put before his people as worthy to be for them an abiding law"; moreover so wisely were his words chosen that we of another race, living somewhat more than 2,500 years later than that prophet, even yet find his brief summary a convenient measuring rod whereby we may make a rough preliminary estimate of a man's dutiful or undutiful behaviour. The prohibitions appear to us as just and wise regulations; and the appeal to the spirit of gratitude and mercy in the Sabbath command awakens response yet in the consciences of those to whom the special considerations there adduced do not apply, and for whom the Sabbath regulation, as a positive institution, never had authority. Briefly: in this typical case of the Decalogue the Word of God as a positive ordinance of unquestionable authority is gone; the Message of Man, though in this case an unknown man, abides and still wakens a response in the breasts of other men. It will be evident that similar illustrations of the breaking down of the authoritative claims once put forth, and of the retention of the lessons simply "for example of life and instruction of manners," could be given from the Psalms, the Epistles, the Gospels, the Apocalypse. All these, including the discourses of Jesus, are now placed morally, and for purposes of edification, on precisely the level which St. Paul voluntarily assumes in his letters to the Corinthians. He speaks there as a man to men; this does not exclude a certain authority derived from the fact that his readers are for the more part his converts; further, his own special and peculiar experiences give him a certain special capacity; occasionally, he claims that he believes that what he is now saying represents the mind of Christ; but he intended that the Corinthians should read his arguments and appeals, not as the Word of God, but as the letter of Paul, as the message of man to wise men who should be able to understand and to appreciate his message.

If this position is accepted; if the authority of the Bible is the authority of the man who wrote the portion we happen to be reading; if its worth depends upon the response that it awakens within; an interesting problem which needs consideration may be presented in these words:—What are the natural affinities of the Bible? The question as here raised does not concern so much the place of the Bible among books of edification, the classification of the Bible, so to speak. It is a practical question. What books, speaking practically and not scientifically, are nearest akin to the books of the Bible? The question is raised for reasons that will appear. While the men of science have been dispersing the miracles of the Bible into thin air; while the critics have discredited the ecclesiastical traditions which gave to Bible writings an authority never duly theirs; the sacred writings of other nations have been collected and translated and edited with immense diligence and reverence. No serious man is likely to deny that the work is well worth doing, that new light upon our own Scriptures has already been shed by corresponding passages in the Buddhistic writings; that the Hindu Scriptures and even the teachings of Confucius have not been explored in vain. But is it not perfectly certain that these Scriptures can never make up to us that which is lacking in our own Bibles? It is an early lesson in arithmetic that seven times nought is nought. The special Divine Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures has been reduced to a point not the equivalent of x but of 0. The similar claims made for other ancient scriptures can be estimated at no higher rate. When a young friend tells me that he is very sceptical about the Bible, and then in a few minutes adds that he wishes I would preach from the Koran and read lessons from it, I perceive there is something deficient in his religious logic. The Koran claims to be the Word of God with a systematic pretence that only has an analogy in some of the least admirable parts of the Bible, say in the Book of Leviticus. Is the Bible akin to the Koran because the Moses of the xivth Leviticus and the Mohammed of the xivth Sura make the same baseless claim?

If the Bible, when it reaches its due level, is to be reverenced and loved, for that it speaks the message of Men to Men; because Truth which touched some other heart and prompted some other man's expression is brought home to my soul and there prompts responsive expression in word and deed; those books are akin to the Bible, in the only features that need concern the practical man, which speak to my soul as the Bible does, which convince me of sin, or arouse me to action, or invite me to prayer with effectual working. I humbly confess that the Koran never does. If there be an Englishman alive who can turn from Paul's epistles, from the Old Testament prophets, even from those stories in Genesis in which a recent critic finds no law, no moral order, no justice, and find sustenance in the declamations of Mohammed,—he is an interesting character. Excepting some parables and proverbs of Gautama, it has been my lot, hitherto, to meet with very little from the Sacred Scriptures of the world that will bear comparison with what I can find in the Old and New Testaments. Perchance, the exception illustrates the rule. The Buddhistic parables are in spirit like the sayings of Jesus; I do not go outside of Christianity when I go forth to meet them.

A younger generation, commencing their studies with greater advantages, will be likely to discover treasures hidden to many of us now. But as at present minded, looking for the Word of God in the message of Man, I am inclined to think that outside the Bible, which remains as ever the Book of Religion, par excellence, the right place for me to seek that Word of God, which must come from the heart of men or from nowhere, is the literature of my own country. The hymns of Dr. Watts and Charles Wesley may be poor to the Vedic hymns. But they speak the language I know, and the Vedic hymns even in translation speak partly in an unknown tongue. The sayings of Confucius are manifestly admirable; in them prudence shows almost like piety; but the Essays of Lord Bacon are informed with a spirit of worldly wisdom so deep and clear, that the foundations of heavenly wisdom are seen shining through. I would refer to the little essay on Revenge, and the charming little sentences, almost a hymn, on Adversity, which come next in order. If here and there Bacon gives us teaching more equivocal, as when he hints that a lie is useful if it be managed with discretion and not too often repeated, the complete and ghastly failure of his own little tricks in that direction afford a commentary which is never out of print. If a frivolous and profane generation that spends its time deceiving and being deceived would find out for its own advantage that while Bacon did not write Shakespeare's plays, or spend his time in translating Pope's Homer into cipher, he did actually write a few short essays, and a long essay on the Advancement of Learning, much of which is worthy to be part of an Englishman's Bible, it might repent and amend. We have too lightly esteemed our own great teachers. They have been to us not even as men who can play well upon an instrument, but as men who can be toyed with and insulted as Mrs. Gallup has insulted Shakespeare. God has sent to us great men, rising up early and sending them, and we—at the bidding too of religious periodicals—turn their writings inside out, hunt in them for puzzles, ransack them for a prize, as who should neglect a whole kingdom and inquire of the Lord for his father's asses.

The bringing down of the Bible to its rightful level as a book by men for men, shall it not suggest to us to go back to our own greatest teachers for the word that shall make up to us whatever is lacking in Holy Writ. The same wise Providence which gave us the severity of Ezekiel, and the tenderness of the second Isaiah, has given us the severity of Milton, and the tenderness and severity both of Shakespeare; the wisdom of Francis Bacon, the sweet reasonableness of Addison, the vigour of Dryden, the pert good sense of Alexander Pope, and the sense and vigour both of Browning. Shall I go on? No.

J. Ruddle.

THE HOMES OF WORDSWORTH.

III.

It was in 1799, when in his thirtieth year, that Wordsworth settled in the green heart of the Lake District, matured and decided in his purpose of following his calling as a poet, whoever might not agree with him, but happily assured of the concordant companionship of his sister and Mary Hutchinson, whom he married two years later. At Town End, Grasmere, a cottage at £8 a year, in a lovely part near the lake, became the poet's home for eight years. It had been a public-house with the sign of "The Dove and Olive Bough," from which circumstance comes the name by which it was sometimes known in Wordsworth's time—"Dove Cottage"—and which, since its purchase through the efforts of Rev. Stopford Brooke and others as a memorial of the poet, has been more definitely attached to it. Unattractive modern buildings now shut out the lake view which it enjoyed. It is a small, separate, two-story house. "The front of it faces the lake; behind is a small plot of orchard and garden ground, in which there is a spring and rocks; the enclosure shelves upwards towards the woody sides of the mountains above it." (Wordsworth's Memoirs.)

> This plot of orchard ground is ours;
> My trees they are, my sister's flowers.

Happily the cottage may be seen by any visitor, and the garden too, almost unchanged, but for the ugly building obstructing the view, and the pictures and other memorials of the poet which it contains in place of the domestic furniture and utensils of the time when it was a home. Nor could a more suitable custodian readily be found than the old lady whose duty it is to open the place to visitors. Here and in the country near at hand, especially at their favourite resort under Helm Crag, most of the finest of the poems were composed in company with the two devoted women, Wordsworth's companions and understanding helpers,—his wife and his sister. The household was extremely simple in all its arrangements, "plain living and high thinking" were characteristic, without sense of virtuous conduct therein, or repining, or discontent. This was, more than any other house, Wordsworth's home, so nearly akin to nature, so friendly to her company, and with such true and harmonious human fellowship

Now was the poet in the very heart of the mountains, surrounded by trees and flowers and streams, near a gentle and placid lake, and a small, secluded village, but with some of the highest mountains towering above their own precipitous sides, and several smaller but not less wonderful peaks breaking the abruptness of the descent. At Cockermouth he was born to the distant prospect of the mountain ranges. At Hawkeshead he lived among the rising hills looking to the heights. At Grasmere the peaks were all around him, and the grandest and gentlest valleys; the calmest and most turbulent streams flowed to the lake; rich verdure and luxuriant flowers were at his feet, and the hardy growths of the bleak rocks above them, and the clear sky was over all.

At Allan Bank, also at Grasmere, about a mile from Dove Cottage, the family, increased in size, lived a less comfortable and satisfactory life, though the house was larger, from 1808 to 1811. During this period the greater part of "The Excursion" was composed. The house is well placed, but does not look so suitable, nor was it; the removal was no doubt necessary to accommodate the four children born before this date. A fifth was born in 1811, in which year they moved to the Parsonage at Grasmere, close to the graveyard. There, two of the children, Dora and Thomas, died.

Rydal Mount was Wordsworth's home for thirty-seven years, from 1813 until his death in 1850. The house is built on the side of Nab Scar. To the left the view is bounded by Wansfell, beneath which is Ambleside, indicating its place by the smoke rising from its domestic chimneys. Windermere brightens the scene, and Loughrigg Fell is conspicuous in front. The footpath from Rydal to Grasmere, the most ancient of ways between these two villages, was the poet's favourite walk. These two-and-a-half miles of rough road and pathway, and the scenes visible from them were probably the occasion of more poetic inspiration than any other countryside in England, excepting the delightful resort of the Wordsworth household in Easedale below Helm Crag.

The house itself was of moderate size with two tiers of five windows; on the right of these was the porch, and above, to the right, two other windows, the higher looking out of what was the poet's bedroom. The gable end first seen on entering the grounds from the road contained the dining-room. The outside walls were of sober hue and partly covered by roses, ivy, jasmine, and virginia creeper. The terraced garden was beautiful in itself, and rich and varied in its prospects. There have been necessary renovations and some alterations since Mrs. Wordsworth's death in 1859, but the above particulars are taken from the Memoirs of Wordsworth by his nephew.

This position appears to have given Wordsworth complete satisfaction. His income, increased by his appointment through Lord Lonsdale's interest to the Distributorship of Stamps for the County of Westmoreland and afterwards for Cumberland also, enabled him to meet the larger though still modest expenses of his house; but he refused a more lucrative office, which would have required his removal from Rydal, and at a time when he feared lest he should be obliged to leave the Mount, he purchased the small adjoining property below.

This little district in mid-lakeland he made his own, of voluntary choice and set purpose, to live the life of a poet and interpret nature. For more than fifty years (1799 to 1850) he resided at Grasmere and Rydal. With Grasmere must be associated the freshest inspiration and the fullest poetic power; with Rydal, maturity and then declining genius.

Though he did not seek society, he did not shun companionship. Southey at Keswick was his valued friend. De Quincey came to live at a house by the side of Rydal water within a mile of Rydal Mount. Dr. Arnold was a centre of intellectual influences at Fox How. Hartley Coleridge, and many neighbours of very various position were among his friends.

A visit to the Highlands of Scotland in 1803 resulted in some very fine poems at the time of his greatest inspiration. But his tour in Switzerland and Italy in 1820 produced very little inspired poetry. He had almost outlived his genius. He loved to wander, and he travelled as often and as much as he could afford; but all his wanderings, which were few and circumscribed compared with those that have become usual in a later age, but were not so according to the ideas of his own time, did not take off his mind and heart from their allegiance, nor reduce his power of interpreting nature in his own chosen home. They gave him comparison and wider knowledge, increased perception and insight on returning to that which he loved most and best.

When poetic inspiration waned and departed, he was left in the integrity of his choice of home and work. The divine muse had indeed been his guest and left a glorious record through his obedience of life and sincerity of purpose. These remained when the muse's visits were fitful and few. The man was still there and true to his allegiance.

Priestley Prime.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. Letters cannot be inserted without the writer's name; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

WHERE IS THE GULF?

Sir,—The Reverend Mr. Solly in last week's Inquirer (August 8) suggests as a question worth serious consideration, "How is it that there is a class of subjects, or a manner of treating them, adapted to the minister, but not to the layman?"

And again: "Are they interested in different subjects, do they demand different treatment for such subjects as are of common interest?"

Surely Mr. Solly answers the real, moving question, when he adds "A universal feeling about sermons proves that the more religious a sermon is, the more the laymen who hear it are interested in it.

Perhaps the fundamental question really is why sermons should ever be other than religious: religious in association, in devotion, in Christianity, in worship?

Assuredly when the people—I hate the weedy growth of a distinction between an order of laymen and an order of ministers (or rather, perhaps, of clerics)—are gathered for brotherhood, and religious communion and exercise, and common worship, it is in Religion, and they desire and expect religious address, exhortation and blessing from their pastor. It is not any adroit discussion of his function, or solution of his difficulties, or his varied fancies about the opinions of others, or scholarly exposition of any spiritual imaginations of his own, that will serve either them or him. They only want him personally to speak religiously to them, being themselves personally religious: or desiring to be so.

His people do not want to hear any more or less involved explanation of questions of so-called philosophy, or psychology, or ethics or criticism, from the gentleman in the pulpit who may or may not be really as able to discuss them as some at least of the men and women who hear him, or his disentangling his own perplexities on such subjects, much less his attempts to show how thoroughly he understands God Himself and His plans, and His purposes!

If the minister and people have joined in singing psalms and hymns, and he has, by the grace of God, lost himself in pouring out his heart in common prayer, or in the lesson from Holy Scripture, each is then and there prepared for and panting after God, thirsting for the living God.

It is desecration indeed, to have the stones of criticism or serpents of sophistry, positive or puzzled, flung out to the listening, eager, inspired souls, lost in the house of God, amongst the multitude keeping holy day!

If there is any gulf, as Mr. Solly calls it, it is surely of the minister's past or present making; too unfortunate in offering what his people turn from in shocked distaste: or perhaps it may even be that in all his criticising, his philosophising, his theologising, his theory of divine character and methods, he has killed his own religious passion and power, and strangled simple religious pastorate?

If he has learning or insight, or biography, or history, or criticism, let him preface and deliver his lectures or his journalistic letters, and he will find hearty welcome and full appreciation in their proper place, as the Rev. J. E. Carpenter has done with his lectures and his charming Italian notes.

However I must confess that I am disposed to believe that his misfortune in preaching is not only too common, but has of late years been peculiarly and even studiously fostered by a certain overmastering self-consciousness of effort and of expression, which has trained up a grievous pursuit of a sort of ostentation of form and style of utterance, often in weaker organs degenerating into faluting verbiage.

It was not thus that the apostolic preachers of our own recollection inspired and sustained their people, old and young, in communion with each other and with Jesus, and, in united worship, with His God and theirs, and in truly healthy congregational life: such as—to name only such as now live only in our passionate veneration and love—the Reverend J. G. Robberds, the Reverend Thomas Madge, the Reverend J. J. Tayler, the Reverend J. H. Thom, the Reverend P. P. Carpenter, and Travers Madge, who would not be so called.

I myself, perhaps profiting somewhat by such education and—I venture to say very humbly—with a certain continuous culture of religious faculty and passion, confess that I have especially of late years, and with the help of a ready translation into my own tongue of the varied phraseologies of my neighbours, habitually found myself more simply at home in brotherhood and in worship, with the Christianities of Roman Catholics, or Methodists, or Congregationalists, or of the men and women of the Salvation Army, than under any too obvious exhibition of self-conscious and even emulous subtlety of thought or ambitious facile beauty of expression.

It is not only in the effort of profundity or brilliancy in the pulpit, or in the more frequent and easier utterances of controversies in the newspaper, that this degeneration has exhibited itself. It is also in what seems to be a deplorably increasing suppression of personal passion, of personal appeal, of personal exhortation and personal encouragement, of personal humility and of personal devotion to faith, hope, and love, and to Jesus and to the Kingdom of God within us. The truth is that the reality of open brotherhood, of the true Christianity of Jesus and the very Kingdom of God within us, have always, since Jesus himself was among us, been the religion of ministers and people, under and in spite of all the vanities and imperfections of self-regarding humanity, or of any imaginary ministry, which may not be ministration.

May I add, once for all, that I am not in any sense failing to reverence the zeal and earnestness of ministers, or their anxiety and effort to live and speak religiously in or out of the pulpit; but only attempting to offer one religious layman's solution of Mr. Solly's anxious perplexity.

R. D. Darbishire.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Belper.—In last week's note the father of the bridegroom was stated, in error, to have been the late Rev. J. B. Lloyd. It should have been Rees Lewis Lloyd, who was minister at Belper for forty years.

Burnley.—The school anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday last in Trafalgar-street church, by the Rev. J. Page Hopps. Mr. Hopps spoke to the children in the morning on "The Great Secret." In the afternoon he preached on "Great Teachings for Small People," and in the evening his subject was "The Call of God to Man." There were good congregations all day, the church being crowded to overflowing in the evening. The services were inspiring and the sermons greatly appreciated. The collections were over £30.

Colwyn Bay.—The attendances at the services this season have, so far, not been equal to those of last year. The Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Manchester, preached on Sunday last and had a satisfactory congregation in the morning, when friends from Bolton, Leeds, Dudley, &c., were present, but at night the gathering was small. The Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., reports a similar experience on Sundays, August 2 and 9.

A number of the worshippers have expressed their pleasure that services were being held. The Rev. J. J. Wright, of Atherton, will be the preacher on August 23 and 30.

Denton.—The Rev. H. Rawlings and Mrs. Rawlings are to be welcomed to Wilton-street at a garden party, to be held on Saturday, August 29, and on the following Sunday Mr. Rawlings is to conduct special services in the chapel.

Dewsbury.—It has frequently been said by Unitarians, in reference to the attendance of working classes at public worship, "If they won't come to hear our beautiful and simple message, it is plainly our duty to take it to them!" Yet how few the instances in which this is carried into practice! Dewsbury, however, is an exception. The Market-place has been invaded after evening service by the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman and his Unity Church people. The first open-air service was attended by between 200 and 300 persons, mainly belonging to the working class. They joined heartily in the service, listened attentively and reverently to Mr. Whiteman's address, earnestly asking pertinent questions at the close. It is hoped this courageous step will be crowned with the success which it so well deserves. On Sunday last, during Mr. Whiteman's holiday, the services were conducted by Mr. Fred Clayton, secretary of the Lay Preacher's Union, Leeds, who in the afternoon also distributed the prizes won by the scholars in the Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union Examiation.

Leeds (Hunslet).—On Saturday, August 15, the teachers and scholars of the Sunday-school enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. W. Holbrook, who had invited them to a garden party at his house at Chapel Allerton.

London: Highgate.—The Islington Daily Gazette, of August 14, published an earnest and eloquent sermon, preached by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, on Sunday-week, from the text "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all."

London: Rhyl Street.—Rev. W. Wilson preached his farewell sermon on Sunday evening last, his text being, "What doth the Lord require of thee?" That, he said, was the greatest question that could be asked of anyone, and the most successful Church was the one that induced most people to ask it of themselves. It was a question even an atheist might well ask himself, and no doubt some atheists did ask it of themselves more than many professedly religious people—not, of course, in these words, but in the real meaning of them. He and his friends at Rhyl Street would always feel close to one another, well acquainted with and attached to each other if they felt that they were sincere and humble disciples of Jesus, because they had learned of him to be continually asking themselves, "What doth God require of me?" It was a quiet, serious, and unexcited service, but there were unmistakable signs at it, and have been since the necessity of leaving was made known, that the people at Rhyl Street are parting with Mr. and Mrs. Wilson with the utmost regret—a feeling which they reciprocate. Happily, an immediate successor to Mr. Wilson has been found, even if only temporarily, in the person of Dr. Read, of 22, Willoughby Road, Hampstead, an old and well-tried friend of the Mission, who has already done good service in many ways, as has also Mrs. Read. Dr. Read has kindly consented to take up the duties for several months, with the possibility of continuing longer.

Manchester Domestic Mission (Willert-St.).—By the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Windsor, upwards of one hundred poor children have had an opportunity to enjoy the fine scenery and fresh air of Chapel-en-le-Frith, Derbyshire. Week by week during a part of July and August, parties of twenty and twenty-five have been sent under the efficient care of Mr. Harold Windsor to the fine old farmhouse known as Hollin Knowle. These holiday arrangements were the more gratifying as the children themselves paid the greatest part of the cost, by paying their few pence each week through the year. Another feature was that the diet provided was strictly vegetarian, and the unanimous testimony is that it made the holiday all the more enjoyable and satisfactory. To-morrow (Sunday) the Sunday-school Anniversary Services are to be held, when Mr. Richard Robinson will give an address to the parents in the afternoon and preach in the evening. The school at Willert-street is a very large one, there being over 500 scholars, and teachers are much needed, especially a gentleman to take a class of lads aged seventeen to twenty-two, also one who would give an evening in the week to superintend the Young People's Guild. The Rev. J. W. Bishop would be glad to hear of any friend who will volunteer.

Trebanos: South Wales.—On Thursday and Saturday afternoons, the 13th and 15th inst., a bazaar was held in the Board School, opened by Mrs. J. Aaron Thomas and Mr. C. B. Jenkins respectively, the object being to liquidate the building debt. The takings at the stalls on both afternoons realised £102, exceeding the highest expectations of the promoters. The Silver Band played selections on both afternoons. Great credit and praise are due to all for their co-operation and hard work in bringing about such a successful issue. Through the generosity of the B. and F.U.A. and kind friends, it is to be hoped that the debt of £300 will shortly be wiped off. When this is accomplished the congregation will still be sorely in need of a convenient schoolroom.

Warrington (APPOINTMENT).—The Rev. C. Harvey Cook, of Holbeck, has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of Cairo-street Chapel, in succession to the Rev. E. W. Lummis.

York.—The Rev. H. Rawlings, having concluded his ministry at St. Saviourgate, a meeting of the congregation was held on July 26, when it was moved by the chairman, Mr. E. F. Lewin, seconded by Mr. F. D. Wood, one of the wardens, and unanimously resolved: "That this congregation hereby accords to the Rev. Henry Rawlings, M.A., and to Mrs. Rawlings, its thanks for their services to the chapel and Sunday-school for the past three and a-half years, and offers them its best wishes for the future."

BIRTH.

WINDER.—On the 17th inst., at Ely House, Newton Heath, near Manchester, the wife of Oliver Winder, of a daughter.

MARRIAGE.

TAYLOR—ORRETT.—On Aug. 12th, at Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester, by the Rev. J. R. Montgomery, assisted by the Rev. H. E. Haycock, John Taylor, of Accrington, to Caroline Annie, eldest daughter of William Orrett, of Chester.

DEATH.

HOLMES.—On Aug. 14th, at Bickerley-terrace, Ringwood, Keziah Holmes, in her 94th year, until within the last year a regular attendant at St. Thomas's Chapel.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, August 23.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton. Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M.

Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 A.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON. 7 P.M., REV. B. KIRKMAN GRAY.

Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M and 7 P.M., Rev. F. W. STANLEY.

Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.,

Deptford, Church-street, 11.15 A.M. and 6.30, Rev. A. J. MARCHANT,

Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M., Rev. GORDON COOPER, B.A.

Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.

Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place. Church closed.

Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Dr. WARSCHAUER.

Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.,

Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street.—Church closed during August.

Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.

Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.

Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.

Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M., Rev. J. J. MARTEN, 7.0 P.M., No Service.

Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Rev. F ALLEN.

Peckham, Avondale-rad, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. G. CARTER.

Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.

Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M. Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY.

Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. ERNEST AMES.

Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M., Mr. Z. TOYOSAKI. Evening service suspended until Sept. 13th.

Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M., and 6.30 P.M., Mr. T. ELLIOT.

Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, Easthill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. PHILEMON MOORE, B.A.

Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Dr. MUMMERY.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel. Closed till Sept. 6.

BEDFORD, Library (side room), 11.15 A.M., Rev ROWLAND HILL.

BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.

BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Church, The Hall, Lytham-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. C. C. COE.

BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS.

BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET.

CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., Mr. J. REMINGTON WILSON.

DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.

GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Mr. G. WARD.

HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. G. LANSDOWNE.

LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. HARGROVE, M.A.

LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 A.M. Rev. W. L. TUCKER, M.A. No evening service.

LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.,

NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. E. PIKE.

OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, M.A.

PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.

PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 P.M., Mr THOMAS BOND.

SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. OTTWELL BINNS.

SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.

SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.

SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church, Tyler-street, 7 P.M.

TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

WINDERMERE, Albert Hall, Cross-street, 11 A.M.; Rev. CHARLES TRAVERS.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.

WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M., Rev. T. READ ELLIOTT.

COLWYN BAY, North Wales, Public Hall, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. J. WRIGHT.

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH,

SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F. Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS.

International Council
OF
Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers.

MEETINGS
. . AT . .
AMSTERDAM
September 1—4.

A SPECIAL REPORT
OF THE PROCEEDINGS
will appear in the . . .
Inquirer of Sept. 5 & 12.

ORDER EXTRA COPIES EARLY.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17 Mincing-lane, E.C.
Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.
F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.
Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.
STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses.—For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

MICROSCOPES, second-hand, excellent condition, from one-third original cost. Slides, great variety, best makers, from 3s. per doz. Write for particulars, THE NEW AGE PRESS, 8, John-street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

HOLBECK, LEEDS.—Domestic-street Unitarian Church. Pulpit vacant. Applications invited.—Apply to the Secretary, GEO. A. REASON, Daisy-hill, Rawdon, Leeds.

Board and Residence.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged.—Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

BOURNEMOUTH. — ARNEWOOD. En Pension. Grand position in West Cliff-road; sea views; South aspect; close to Winter Gardens, Promenade, and Pier.—Apply, MANAGERESS.

BOURNEMOUTH. — Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH, DEVONSHIRE.

A HOLIDAY RESORT FOR YOUNG LADIES OR SCHOOL-GIRLS, WITH OR WITHOUT CHAPERON.

Charming little Devonshire town. Perfect Sanitation. Sea and Moorland. Bracing air. Walks, excursions, picnics, splendid bathing. Main line G.W.R.

Terms and other particulars from THE PROPRIETOR.

Situations, etc.

YOUNG LADY seeks post as GOVERNESS in school or family. English, Junior. Piano. Good violin.—Address, X. L., INQUIRER Office.

WANTED, Sept. 15th, for Channing House School, Resident Fourth Form Mistress, able to teach advanced mathematics. Games and Drill desirable. Must be Unitarian, and either trained or experienced in teaching large classes. Salary £40, laundry free.—Apply by letter, stating age, qualifications, and experience, and enclosing copies of recent testimonials, to Miss L. TALBOT, Channing House, The Bank, Highgate, London, N.

LADY (Unitarian, Homeless) seeks post of trust. Housekeeper (where servant), Nursery Governess, Companion, or Lady Help. Would travel. Excellent testimonials. NEWTON, Bryn Felin House, Uplands, Swansea.

FREDK. LONG & SON,
AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,
4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK
Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS
2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
2½% repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES
Purchased and sold for customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Schools, etc.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN,
NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON
(Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

---

46 pp. 8vo, price One Shilling.
THE FREEHOLD FARM, THE GARNER'D SEED-CORN OF ALL INTUITIONED THOUGHT.
INTUITIONISM:
The Release of the Mind.
By F. LINFORD WILSON.
Published by H. SEERIGHT, and obtainable of W. REEVES, 83, Charing Cross-road, W.C.

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS
By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
DAILY MEDITATIONS
(Fourth Edition Revised.)
NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.
Cloth, red edges, 6d.; roan gilt, 1s.
PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.
Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

JOHN PAGE HOPPS' MONTHLY.
THE COMING DAY.
ENLARGED. PRICE THREEPENCE.

Contents for SEPTEMBER.

Shew us the Father.
Jesus and the Hiding Throng.
Personal Prayers.
The Posing of Jesus by his Friends.
The Personal Self.
Our Great Men.
The Principles and Teachings of Spiritualism
The Evolution of a Lie.
An Ideal Christian State.
Those Rowdy Bells.
Dirt and Don't.
The Mother and Jack's "Rubbish."
Notes by the Way. Notes on Books, &c.

London, Edinburgh, and Oxford:
WILLIAMS and NORGATE, and all Booksellers.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOINSON, Pier-street.

NUT FOODS.

The following Nut Foods are specially suited for the hot season:—

Banana and Nut Food, 7d., 1/-, and 1/4 per Tin. A new delicious food made from ripe fresh Bananas and Nuts. Can be sliced for sandwiches, or used as cheese.

Almond Cream, 3½d., 1/-, and 1/10 per Tin. Unrivalled as an accompaniment for fresh or stewed fruit.

Malted Nuts, 2d., 6½d., and 1/- per tin. Promotes digestion of all cereal food.

Full descriptive Price List from the Manufacturer:
HUGH MAPLETON,
COLONIAL HOUSE, ARDWICK GREEN, MANCHESTER.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, August 22, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3192. NEW SERIES, No. 296.] LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 29, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 569
ARTICLES—
International Programme 571
George Fox and his Message 571
Religious Liberalism and the Dutch Protestant Churches 577
My First Visit to Holland 578
International Council Notes 580
The Gentle Foot-Pad 581
LITERATURE—
Unitarianism in America 573
Divine Immanence 574
Child Lore 574
LEADER—
With the Brethren in Holland 576
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 575
OBITUARY—
The Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved 575
Sir Edwin Gaunt 575
POETRY—
Amicus Amico 570
To the Road 582
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 582
ADVERTISEMENTS 584

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

NOTES on the International meetings at Amsterdam next week will be found under a separate heading. This week we publish also Dr. Fleischer's valuable article on "Religious Liberalism and the Dutch Churches," and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed's "My First Visit to Holland."

IN addition to a special report of the first part of the week's proceedings, we hope to publish next week the President's address and the sermon by the Rev. J. van Loenen Martinet in full. In the following week we shall complete the report, and hope to publish two of the papers in full, i.e., Dr. S. A. Eliot's on "Liberal Religion in America" and the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's on "The Conception of God as 'The Soul of all Souls.'" Other papers we hope to be able to publish in subsequent weeks.

ON Wednesday evening Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, entertained Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association, and Dr. J. H. Crooker, of Ann Arbour, at dinner at the National Liberal Club, the other guests including several past presidents of the Association and members of the executive. Dr. Eliot, in responding to the toast of his health, expressed a strong desire that the bonds of union between the Unitarian Churches of America and Great Britain might be more closely drawn, for the strengthening of their common cause. We ought, he said, to harness ourselves in strong teams. The work should be better organised, for you cannot carry the water of life to people in a sieve. There was need of a larger power of constructive ability, and of aggressive work, not indeed in attack on the orthodox, but in the furtherance of positive religious teaching. Organisation, they were well aware, would not bring salvation, though its machinery was needed. The great need was of a larger religious consecration. During his brief visit to this country, staying in the homes of our people, he had been impressed by the real depth of religious fidelity and life which he found there. It was a good omen for the future of the churches. In America they had won the victory of the broad church, they had now to prove that it could be a deep church, a church of the Spirit, searching the deep things of God. There were signs that they were about to enter on the new era of deeper consecration.

DR. CROOKER also spoke, and bore testimony to the warm friendliness that had been shown to him and Mrs. Crooker during their stay in this country, and to the reverent and earnest spirit in the congregations they had visited. He had been much struck by the congregational participation in the services, and the capacity shown by the laity for carrying on the work of a church. After the International meetings in Amsterdam Dr. and Mrs. Crooker will return to this country, and are to sail from Liverpool by the s.s. Saxonia for Boston in the following week. Dr. Eliot will return home direct from Holland, sailing with the Rev. C. W. Wendte and others of the American party from Rotterdam by s.s. Ryndam on Saturday next, September 5.

THE year that has elapsed since Lord Salisbury retired from the Premiership has led to gentler criticisms of his career now that his death has come, and this, not only through time's blunting of antagonisms, but also through the contrast afforded between his rule and the rule of his successor. It was said with truth while yet he was in office that his control over his Cabinet was far weaker than that ordinarily associated with British premierships. But the chaos which has admittedly since overtaken his party shows his discipline strong by contrast. It is impossible to imagine him ever resorting to the pitiful expedient of the "open mind" in order to keep together a Cabinet hopelessly divided on a fundamental question of principle, or allowing a subordinate to carry on a campaign from inside the Cabinet on behalf of vital changes to which its head was not himself committed.

THE two salient characteristics by which Lord Salisbury's statesmanship is likely to be remembered are his love of peace and his deepset distrust of democracy. He resigned office over Disraeli's Reform Bill, and though he became in some sense a party to Mr. Gladstone's Acts of 1885, it was only in the way of bowing to the inevitable. With ameliorative reform he appears to have had some sincere sympathy, closely hedged about, however, by the veneration of the high Tory for the "rights of property." But such reforms were, in his eyes, the gift of the governing to the governed classes, and had no merit as the simple execution of the mandate of the people.

BUT it was in foreign rather than in domestic affairs that Lord Salisbury's interest mainly centred, and it was this pre-occupation that constituted one of his chief weaknesses as the head of a Cabinet. But by comparison, at any rate, he was a good foreign Minister. It was his fate to be closely associated with the bellicose policies first of Lord Beaconsfield and last Mr. Chamberlain; but posterity will probably associate him less with these than with the peaceful solution of the Venezuelan crisis, the German and French agreements over the partition of East and West Africa, and the dolorous concert of Europe in Near and Far Eastern complications. Critics at both extremes have denounced him for excessive weakness, and have declared that peace on this and that occasion has been bought at too dear a sacrifice of national honour. But, viewed as a whole, and by contrast with that of other members of his party, his foreign policy will, we believe, stand out in history in no unfavourable light.

THE Russian fleet, having sailed to Turkish waters, has now sailed back again, and the conflict in Macedonia proceeds with greater fierceness than ever. Turkey has glibly promised the trivial reforms demanded of her, and Russia has professed herself satisfied therewith, dashing to the ground such hopes as had been built up on her warlike action. It is, of course, useless to appoint a few Christian officers to the Gendarmerie while these remain under Moslem control, and so long as the Porte remains in sole charge of the execution of the reforms it promises, there is not the remotest prospect of any improvement in the lot of its subjects. When the minimum demand of the insurgents has been granted and a Christian governor has been appointed, drawing his authority from the Powers, like Prince George in Crete, and owing only nominal allegiance to the Sultan, then, and not till then, will there be a chance of good government. But while the Powers cruelly hold back the insurgents are doing effective work on their own behalf. The revolt is spreading far and wide, and not even the terrible massacres of the Turks can stay it. Effective European intervention must take place sooner or later, and the sooner it is resolved upon the sooner will useless bloodshed cease.

The Archbishop of Canterbury finds it "strangely difficult to get people to understand the real underlying principle" of the attitude of the Church party towards recent legislation on education. That principle, he says, is that > there should be definite religious teaching given, and that it should be given by teachers whose qualifications to give it they were definitely allowed to ascertain and to test.

That is a principle which those holding it are perfectly entitled to put into operation in schools which they themselves provide and maintain, but not in schools maintained out of the pockets of others; and its mere enunciation, in however gentle tones, will not meet the charges of "the gross selfishness and callous indifference and greed of the Church" which cause the Archbishop so much very natural distress. To talk of the money provided for education by the Church before the new Act came into force, and to cite as an example of her generosity the appointment of a solitary Nonconformist teacher on a staff of tested Churchmen, go a very little way indeed towards "contradicting by positive fact" allegations of narrowness and bigotry based on the seizure of rate aid. Is it really impossible to get Archbishops "to understand the underlying principle" that those who pay the piper should call the tune, and that those who call the tune should pay the piper? On this and other kindred topics his Grace would find a useful instructor, were he ready to learn, in the Bishop of Hereford, whose comments at Oxford on present political tendencies are in refreshing contrast with the general run of episcopal and archiepiscopal utterances.

The recent purchase of Heaton Park by the city of Manchester is a real contribution to the health, physical culture, and general well-being of its citizens and those of surrounding districts. Within about half an hour's tramcar ride of the centre of Manchester, for which the fare is twopence-halfpenny, it gives the people what they have never had before, a wide expanse of greensward, groves of trees, and winding paths, in their own ground, open to all. One may walk a couple of miles right forward and remain within the walls. There are wildflowers and birds, and long grass, and pools of water. One may get out of sight of all but the park itself and the sky above it. Londoners have had such possibilities for generations, but the Manchester men and women and children are finding a new experience of enjoyment and healthy exercise.

Heaton Park exceeds the combined area of the whole of the parks and recreation grounds previously owned by the city. Its blessings for the people are realised when, on an ordinary weekday, one meets parties of children wandering as children love to wander, and playing their games in the grass, undisturbed, mother sitting on the seats conveniently provided, boys cricketing, whole families making a picnic as if they were in the country, men strolling or sitting after their day's work. On holidays there is the throng of a great multitude, but still there is room to get away from the great crowd into quieter places.

There are fairer scenes of natural loveliness, and grounds more beautiful and more carefully tended, but where in private demesnes can we feel so fully the sense of communion with man and nature? With the consciousness of the overcrowded city, and its roar and rush just left behind as we entered at the gates, we see the happy children sporting, and the relaxing features of the labouring men and women, for whom no summer vacation is in reserve, and a thrill of enjoyment and sympathy runs through us as we give thanks for the wisdom which provides, though at great expense—it cost £230,000—such a breathing-place for the people. We wish that the landowners in our large towns would do something towards the working out of their own salvation by presenting, rather than selling, some of their land as a contribution to the physical, mental, and moral culture of their country.

The Christian World, in a leading article last week on "Candour in the Pulpit," called attention, with approving comment, to Mr. T. J. Hardy's "Chart and Voyage," a little book just published by Mr. Philip Green, at Essex Hall. The advantage for religion, and for the true and helpful interpretation of the Bible, of perfect frankness is strongly emphasised, and the article concludes as follows:—

> There is one other consideration of first importance. "Experience tells me," says Mr. Hardy, "that the most brutal frankness can hardly injure the character so much as the refinements of deception"; and there is only too much truth in this. In our anxiety to disturb no one we are apt to forget the many who are already disturbed and are looking for guidance. It would come as a startling revelation to know how many people have quietly drifted away from the churches, and sometimes even from religion, because of intellectual difficulties which a little candour would have removed. Men and women cannot always be living in a religious hothouse, and contact with the world soon proves the futility of reserve and deception. Through the activity of the rationalist press, and in many other ways, the minds of people are being imbued with anti-Christian ideas far more than is generally imagined, and the great counteractive is in a candid pulpit. There, at least, let men be sure of counting on honesty, on that "splendid veracity" which should belong supremely to religious thought. Failing this, preaching must become a mockery to the self-respecting.

We regret to hear that Professor Lindberg, of Göteborg, who contributes to the International Council Meeting a paper on the "Conditions of Religious Life in Sweden," is after all not able to be at Amsterdam.

AMICUS AMICO.

[any cripple to the hale.]

Here am I sitting alone by the sea:
Always alone, wheresoever I be;
For who is the man should be shackled to me?

Better alone, that I grieve so the less
For the joys of another my griefs would distress;
Let me meet, not to curse other lives, but to bless!

To feel that the scope of a sturdier frame
Were measured by my little tether were shame:
Should the friends of a cripple be likewise
all lame?

Time was I had fears that to silence a soul
That had uttered no word of its burden were dole
To a world gone awry, lacking lead to its goal.

But I've heard the wild waves on a limitless beach,
And the billows men's break-waters harness and teach;
They rehearsed different music, but perfect was each.

Is Nature less sure of her ends than this tide
Of topping the sands, though some wave in its pride
Break short of the shingle where all the rest died?

Not surer to rise to its mark by the roar,
By the bluster, of tempest, the tide comes ashore
Though the face of the waters be smooth as a floor.

And I know that a man and a planet so sit
To the scale of creation, it matters no whit
If either should perish before it seem fit.

Howbeit this planet spins on, and its dust
Is sweating through wearisome days, since it must.
Were it good to thank God one is cool?
Were it just?

Nay; I cannot content me with shutting
my eyes,
And thanking kind Heaven I toil for no prize;
I fail of earth's joys; but I shirk not earth's sighs.

Counts a man for so little, the tenth of a man Might as well cut his throat? But what if his plan
Be to make men by compounds of tenths as he can?

So I may not despair, though I sit here alone;
Though my spirit is weary, too weary to groan;
Though the voice of the breakers is mine
in its moan.

And it seems just worth while to be wishing to drown
A too conscious sense by invoking you down
With a tonicky tome of your brave Manxman, Brown.*

H. A. R. J.

* T. E. Brown, the Manx poet.

INTERNATIONAL PROGRAMME.

Monday, August 31.

7.0 p.m.—Meeting of Dutch Liberal Ministers in the Gebouw van den Werkenden Stand, Kloveniersburgwal, 87–89.

President's Address, Professor Dr. T. Cannegieter.

P. Feenstra Jr. "Mogen wij toelaten, dat de behoudende stroomingen op godsdienstig en staatkundig gebied zich het uitsluitend recht op den Christennaam aanmatigen? Zoo neen, hoe daartegen te reageeren?"

Tuesday, September 1.

10.0 a.m.—Meeting of Dutch Liberal Ministers, Kloveniersburgwal, 87–89.

Dr. C. H. Ris Lambers. "Uit welken wortel stamt het Néo-Calvinisme onzer dagen; welke zijn zijne vruchten; welke toekomst is er voor te verwachten?"

Dr. J. van den Bergh. "Hoe is de oplevende gehechtheid aan Kerkgenootschap onder Modernen te verklaren?"

10.0 a.m. to 4 p.m.—Members of the International Council Reception Committee will attend at the Hall of the Vrije Gemeente, Wetering-schans, near the Leidsche plein, to conduct parties for sight-seeing in Amsterdam.

7.0 p.m.—Religious service in the Old Walloon church, Oudezijds-Achterburgwal, near the Hoogstraat.

Preacher, the Rev. J. van Loenen Martinet.

8.30 p.m.—Welcome to foreign delegates, in the Gebouw van den Werkenden Stand, Kloveniersburgwal, 87–89.

Admission here and to the service by Membership-ticket.

Wednesday, September 2.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL, in the Hall of the Vrije Gemeente, Weteringschans.

10.0 a.m.—President's Address, Prof. Dr. H. Oort. (Leiden).

10.30 —Secretary's Report, Rev. C. W. Wendte.

10.45—Prof. J. Estlin Carpenter (Oxford), "The place of Christianity in the Religions of the World."

11.15—Prof. Dr. J. Réville (Paris), "La religion et la conception moderne de l'ordre naturel."

11.45—Dr. S. A. Eliot (Boston), "Liberal religion in America."

12.10—Prof. Dr. T. Cannegieter (Utrecht), "Persoonlijkheid en Godsdienst."

2.0 p.m.—Prof. O. E. Lindberg (Göteborg), "Die religiösen Verhältnisse in Schweden."

2.20—Rev. R. A. Armstrong (Liverpool), "The conception of God as the 'soul of all souls.'"

2.50—Prof. Dr. A. Bruining (Amsterdam), "Het agressief karakter van het vrijzinnig-godsdienstig geloof."

3.10—V. R. Shinde (Bombay) "Liberal religion in British India."

3.30—Rev. J. Hocart (Brussels), "Les difficultés pour la religion libérale en Belgique."

3.50—Dr. C. Schieler (Danzig) "Befürchtungen und Hoffnungen bezüglich der religiösen Frage in Deutschland."

4.10—Prof. S. Cramer (Amsterdam), "Do liberal religious believers want to be organised as a Church?"

8.0 p.m.—Performance of "De Koopman van Venetië," in the Paleis voor Volksvlijt, Frederiksplein.

Admission by membership ticket.

Thursday, September 3.

9.30 a.m.—Dr. J. H. Crooker (Ann Arbor), "American Ideals in Education."

10.0—Prof. Dr. O. Pfleiderer (Berlin), "Das neutestamentliche Christusbild im Lichte der Religionsgeschichte."

10.30—Rev. P. H. Wicksteed (Childrey), "The revived interest in mediæval Religion."

11.0—Rev. J. E. Roberty (Paris), "Le mysticisme chrétien et la Protestantisme libéral français."

11.30—Prof. Dr. E. Montet (Geneva), "Le principe monotheiste en dehors du Christianisme consideré comme base d'une alliance religieuse universelle."

12.0—Edwin D. Mead (Boston), "The world's debt to Holland for the Propaganda of Universal Peace."

1.0 p.m.—Excursion to Haarlem, by special train.

3.30.—Organ recital and Zalsman-Quartet in the Groote Kerk (St. Bavo).

6.0.—Dinner in the Brongebouw.

8.0.—Concert in the Gardens.

10.30.—Special train leaves for Amsterdam.

Friday, September 4.

9.30 a.m.—Rev. N. Józan (Budapest), "Religious movements in Hungary."

9.50—Prof. Dr. M. A. Gooszen (Leiden), "De Evangelische Reveil in Nederland omstreeks 1834."

10.10—Rev. K. Andresen (Blankenese), "Die Notwendigkeit neuer positiver Glaubenslehren."

10.30—Rev. G. Schoenholzer (Zürich), "Die Entwicklung des freisinnigen Christenthums in der deutschen Schweiz.

10.50—A. Bourrier (Sèvres), "L'émancipation de la pensée religieuse parmi les prêtres."

11.10—Z. Toyosaki (Tokio), "Liberal religion in Japan."

12.20 p.m.—Excursion to Edam and Volendam on the Zuiderzee.

By steam-tram to Edam.

4.15.—Steamer leaves Volendam, arriving 6.30 at Amsterdam.

GEORGE FOX AND HIS MESSAGE.

"STIFF as a tree and pure as a bell, we could never bow him": such seemed the founder of Quakerism to his persecutors. He was of the race of the prophets, a man of simple but leonine nature; large, open, virile; terrible in his wrath against hypocrisy, fearless in his fidelity to truth, a man of action whose words were as deeds. Not for him the subtleties of thought: mystic and teacher though he was, he had not the mind of a philosopher or a theologian. His gifts of piercing vision and mystical consciousness belong to such natures as are stiff as a tree and pure as a bell. And in them he illustrates the nature of the "child" of the kingdom; but his love lacked something of those qualities which add infinite tenderness and charm to the "childlikeness" of Jesus, of John, of Francis, of Juliana.

His masculine character belongs to his message also, the sword-like intensity of which often tended to narrow it to immediate circumstance and purpose, and to impair the universality of its application to all persons and ages.

But virile and stern as he was, he never lost the bell note. The tenderness of a strong soul wells up full and deep in his reverberating voice, and many a passage of his Journal sings like a lyric.*

I. Only the very foolish and the very wise are content to judge by first impressions; since experience teaches that there is something in the aspect of genius which immediately affronts and irritates whatever is gross or conventional in us. And the first glimpse we catch of Fox is not altogether prepossessing; he is too angular in his originality, too bald, too loud. Outraged worldliness often reacts upon the prophet, and takes its revenge by forcing him into eccentricity. It thwarts his expansiveness, and where he is thwarted there his strength is concentrated to break down the barrier, till the originally well-proportioned spontaneity of his nature loses something of its symmetry. He may preserve the equilibrium of sanity in his spirit, but his life and his message will bear the mould of his age. And among his followers, those who are imitators rather than sons will be characterised by an exaggerated emphasis.

This is illustrated in Fox's case by the emphasis he laid upon "plain speech," upon puritanism and upon theological orthodoxy. It is inconceivable that "thee-ing and thou-ing" can always be essential to pure religion as Fox himself defined it, even though it be defended out of thirty languages as in The Battledore of 1660. Yet it became perhaps the most widely known peculiarity of Friends. The reasons for "plain-speech" appear to have been a somewhat pedantic fidelity to verbal accuracy, and a refusal to profess reverence or seek favour by polite but inaccurate speech. It represents an effort to secure and to revive sincerity and freedom of expression in a rhetorical age. The refusal to take any oath was principally due to the same passion for veracity. As a result of persecution, these peculiarities attained an altogether disproportionate prominence in the customs and tenets of Quakerism, they came to mark the officially recognised, and as it were stereotyped, idiosyncrasy of a sect, while Fox himself probably came to regard them as essentials of the faith. In our time we cannot so regard them, the emphasis falls on another part of his message; but we ought not to allow his insistence on matters which appear to us almost trivial to stand between us and him. This thought applies even more to his puritanism, and to his orthodoxy. They are set forward as the truth by Fox, but they evoke no longer that response of the truth within us to which he always appealed. As we come to know him, we see how they found a place in his teaching, but they do not constitute his message.

* This lyric power belongs to the mystics; Fox shares it with Boehme and William Law, as well as with Blake.

And yet while admitting all this and more, we cannot but recognise the contemporary necessity for an even pedantically accurate speech in such a document as George Fox's Journal. When in a rhetorical and hypocritical age, a man's speech is of the most real but most mystical of the experiences of life, it is well that his words should carry the fullest possible authority, and be clear and simple. The penalties of the law and the almost incredible cruelties of its exasperated minions become an invaluable and convincing attestation to the veracity—the cool scientific temper—of those who suffered them in order that their plain speech might be set above all question.

II. Fox's Journal is sadly prolix, running in the eighth (reprinted) English edition* to more than a thousand pages, hundreds of which are occupied by redundancies or matters of little interest. But in these two volumes we see George Fox frankly and fearlessly portrayed by his own pencil, in his strength and in his weakness. In thus presenting a full-length portrait of one of the historic prophets of all times, the Journal aids in the interpretation of those who spoke in the same spirit in earlier ages. Some of its passages rank indeed with their canonical utterances, and there will be a Book of George Fox included in the revised Bible of the world's Holy Scriptures, which is yet to be compiled for the coming ages of faith. It will, forsooth, contain but a tithe, or a tithe's tithe, of the Journal; it may be as brief as the Epistle of James, but will it be less significant? I think not, for its words will be still as far from the language of platitude, and its lesson is not less essential to the fulness of gospel truth. The actual Journal is not all of that pure gold, but it rehearses the message spoken to his own generation, and enables us to appreciate its inspired appropriateness.

In those days men were gone out into high notions of religion, their mouths were full of theological formulas and doctrinal debates, but the great majority, even of the preachers of Christianity, had ceased—like the men of our own time—to believe in the actuality of faith and the deeper religious experience. The minds of most were superficially occupied with religious questions; a few only, known as Seekers, inquired for the substance of faith. For forty years the word of George Fox challenged all with the authority of knowledge. "True religion is . . . . the life and power of God planted in the heart and mind by the law of life." In this brief declaration is the burden of his message, which is not a new doctrine, but a new voice declaring the identical witness of the whole communion of triumphant saints. To label this "Quakerism" would be absurd; it is the statement of an experience no sect can monopolise: such truth scorns any livery. George Fox asserts this, and yet he recognises in it the essential quality which distinguished the early Friends from their contemporaries. In his thirty-sixth year he wrote from Lancaster gaol: "The Quakers are not a sect, but are in the power of God, which was before sects were: they . . . . are come to live in the life which the prophets and apostles lived in." A great but—in those days—not a preposterous assertion, for it was vindicated in many lives; a claim and a vindication to make all lives better worth the living. For if it be indeed true, as these veracious spirits say, that acording to the law of life which is in them, men may live and work to their utmost scope of heart and mind in the divine power and vitality, how great, how satisfying to the soul is that most practical of all the arts, the art of living! Perhaps we have here some excuse for the slight passed by these adepts upon all arts besides.

To live in the power of God—this was the calling to which Fox encouraged Friends in an Epistle (1657) which rings like a clarion:—"Be rich in life, and in grace which will endure, ye who are heirs of life, and born of the womb of eternity, that noble birth that cannot stoop to that which is born in sin and conceived of iniquity; who are better bred and born; whose religion is from God, above all the religions that are from below; and who walk by faith, by that which God hath given and not by that which men make."

I cannot here attempt to set forth the mystical doctrine of "the Seed," or divine element in man to which these words refer. Far removed as it is from any current theory of that sub-conscious self which is at present engaging the thought of psychologists, the recent investigations of scientists may serve to prepare the mind for and direct attention once more upon the ancient truths of mystical science. And especially to that pure uncontaminated element, that holy will, that seed of perfection, which it affirms is concealed beneath the external consciousness and may be evoked into potency by rightly directed appeals. Such is the appeal just quoted, and it was to this inner "Seed" that the message of George Fox was consciously addressed, and to this that it appears to have reached, to this that it will still reach in so far as it is effective. In the realisation of this inner seed lies, for Fox, the meaning of life. To come into conscious identification with this is to grow up in "the image and power of the Almighty," to grow up "to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." That it is possible, was the message and, in part, the witness of the early Friends.

III. George Fox came to the discovery of his message through the deeps. His experience was so full that he could only vaguely suggest it in words. Under the year 1648, when he was twenty-four years old, he records: "Now was I come up in spirit through the flaming sword into the paradise of God. All things were new, and all the creation gave another smell unto me than before, beyond what words can utter. I knew nothing but pureness and innocency and righteousness, being renewed into the image of God by Jesus Christ, to the state of Adam which he was in before he fell. The creation was opened to me; and . . . . I was at a stand in my mind whether I should practise physic for the good of mankind, seeing the nature and virtues of things were so opened to me by the Lord. But I was immediately taken up in spirit to see another or more stedfast state than Adam's innocency, even into the state in Christ Jesus that should never fall. . . . As people come into subjection to the Spirit of God, and grow up in the image and power of the Almighty, they may receive the word of wisdom that opens all things, and come to know the hidden unity in the Eternal Being."

Such a passage will mean much or little to the reader as he catches or misses the thought behind the words. In spite, however, of the opportunities it affords for misapprehension, it is so characteristic of Fox that I have ventured to quote it. Though coloured by human and adventitious elements, it is that antithesis of rhetoric, the sheer poetry of inspiration.

If we are to value Fox and his message at their permanent worth, we must try them by the only test he recognised, the test of the inner witness of our hearts. We shall not always be able to follow him; his message itself often leads away from him into larger and more quiet fields than the arena of his strife; but that message, accepted in the spirit of reality in which it was given, brings us to our true selves, and to that self within the self which is the saviour from self. So we may be glad with him that he was sent "to turn people to that inward light, spirit, and grace, by which all might know their salvation and their way to God; even that divine spirit which would lead them into all truth."

RICHARD ASKHAM.

Note.—George Fox was born in 1624, and died in 1690. The work of organising the Society of Friends may be considered as dating from 1666; when, at the age of 42, he began to establish monthly (or business) meetings. The later part of his life was largely occupied in building up the body of those who had responded to his message.

BE noble, and the nobleness that lies
In other men, sleeping but never dead,
Will rise in majesty to meet thine own;
Then wilt thou see it gleam in many eyes,
Th n w ll pure light around thy path be shed,
And thou wilt nevermore be sad and lone.

J. R. Lowell.

* Headley Bros., London. 1901. Price 5s. net. An abbreviated edition, which has found an ideal editor in Dr. Rufus M. Jones, of America, is now nearly ready for publication.

LITERATURE.

UNITARIANISM IN AMERICA.*

IN a substantial and amply illustrated volume, Mr. G. W. Cooke has furnished, as he says in the preface, "a history of the origin of Unitarianism in the United States, how it has organised itself, and what it has accomplished." He has written with the thought constantly in mind of those who have not been educated as Unitarians, but have come into the inheritance, as he himself did, through struggle and search, and with the aim of being helpful to those still engaged in that search, by letting them know "what Unitarianism is, and what it has said and done to justify its existence."

This purpose is carried out in a very attractive manner. The book is not, indeed, an inward history of Unitarianism so much as a narrative of its outward fortunes and its relations with the world at large. The questions of theological controversy and of the progress of religious thought are only lightly touched upon, while much space is given to a record of denominational developments, and various forms of religious and philanthropic activity, concluding with an enumeration of a great company of Unitarian men and women in America, who have been distinguished in the public service, in education and philanthropy, and literature. This enumeration is made in an inclusive spirit, naming not only those influential Americans who have been actually connected with Unitarian churches, but those "who have been in practical accord with Unitarianism." Among these latter we find Whittier and Walt Whitman; and Lincoln's declaration of faith is quoted, as in fullest harmony with the position of the Unitarian churches. He had never united himself to any church, he said, "because I have found difficulty in giving my assent, without mental reservation, to the long, complicated statements of Christian doctrine which characterise their articles of belief and confessions of faith." And he added:—

> When any church will inscribe over its altar, as its sole qualification of membership, the Saviour's condensed statement of both law and gospel, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind, and thy neighbour as thyself," that church will I join with all my heart and all my soul.

For the history of the old controversies and the progress of thought, Mr. Cooke refers to such works as G. E. Ellis's "Half Century of the Unitarian Controversy," J. H. Allen's "Our Liberal Movement in Theology," Mr. Gannett's memoir of his father (Channing's colleague and successor), and Mr. Chadwick's "Old and New Unitarian Beliefs." To these may be also added Mr. Chadwick's admirable studies of Parker and Channing, the latter published since the appearance of Mr. Cooke's history.

"The Sources of American Unitarianism," so Mr. Cooke begins his narrative, "are to be found in the spirit of individualism developed by the Renaissance, the tendency to free inquiry that manifested itself in the Protestant Reformation, and the general movement of the English churches of the seventeenth century towards toleration and rationalism." He then sketches the progress of Liberalism in America, showing what influences were at work in the churches and at Harvard; he tells of Jonathan Mayhew, who became minister of the West Church in Boston in 1747 and was an avowed Unitarian, shunned in consequence by his brother ministers; then notes the adoption of a Unitarian liturgy at King's Chapel in 1785, the appointment of the Unitarian Henry Ware in 1805 as Divinity Professor at Harvard, and so carries on the story through the definite separation of the orthodox from the Unitarian Congregational Churches, the founding of the American Unitarian Association in 1825, and of the National Conference in 1865, down to the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Association in the spring of 1900, and the founding on that occasion of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal religious thinkers and workers, which met for the first time in London in 1901, and is now on the eve of its second meeting at Amsterdam.

It is a story of great interest, and occupies the larger half of Mr. Cooke's book. Then follow several chapters on the "Ministry at Large," on Sunday School work, the Women's Alliance, the Missions to India and Japan, the Meadville Theological School, "Unitarian Philanthropies," &c. The illustrations, which include pictures of some of the old churches, the A.U.A. buildings in Boston, the Meadville School and the Unitarian building in Tokio, with an interesting group of the Japanese workers, furnish also portraits of as many as sixty men and women, sometimes as many as five on a page, and with the well-known portrait of Channing as frontispiece. A few of the portraits belong to the eighteenth century, and come down to Emerson, Holmes, and Lowell, Margaret Fuller and Louisa Alcott, Dorothea Dix and Sallie Ellis, the first Postal Mission worker. On one page are John A. Andrew, Freeman Clarke, and Edward Everett Hale; on another, grouped round Dr. Bellows, W. G. Eliot, Starr King, F. H. Hedge, and Theodore Parker.

Having told his story, Mr. Cooke has a final chapter on "The Future of Unitarianism," from which it will be interesting and useful in conclusion to quote some passages, ending with the last paragraph of the book:—

"The early Unitarians in this country did not desire to form a new sect. They wished to remain Congregationalists, and to continue unbroken the fellowship that had existed from the beginning of New England. When they were compelled to separate from the older churches, they refrained from organising a strictly defined religious body, and have called theirs a 'movement.' The words 'denomination' and 'sect' have been repellent to them; and they have attempted, not only to avoid their use, but to escape from that which they represent. They have wished to establish a broad, free fellowship, that would draw together all liberal thinkers and movements into one wide and inclusive religious body."

* * * * *

"The chief value of Unitarianism in the past has been that it has pioneered the way for the development of the modern spirit within the limits of Christianity. The churches from which it came out have followed it far on the way it has travelled. Its most liberal advocates of the first generation were more conservative than many of the leaders are to-day in the older churches."

* * * * *

"The promise of Unitarianism for the future does not consist in its becoming a sect and in its striving for the development of merely denominational interests, but in its cultivation of the deeper spiritual life and in its cosmopolitan sympathy with all phases of religious growth. Its mission is one with philanthropy, charity, and altruism. Its attitude should be that of free inquiry, loyalty to the spirit of philosophy and science, and fidelity to the largest results of human progress. It should always represent justice, righteousness, and personal integrity. That promise is not to be found in the rapid multiplication of its churches, or in its devotion to propagandist aims, but in its loyalty to the free spirit and in its exemplification of the worth and beauty of the religion of humanity. As a sect, it will fail; but as a movement towards a larger faith, a purer life, and a more inclusive fellowship, the future is on its side.

* * * * *

"The future of Unitarianism will depend on its ability, further, to reconcile individualism with associative action, the spirit of free inquiry with the larger human tradition. Its advantage cannot be found in the abandonment of Christianity, which has been the source and sustaining power of its life, but in the development of the Christian tradition by the processes of modern thought. The real promise of Unitarianism is in identifying itself with the altruistic spirit of the age, and in becoming the spiritual interpreter of the social aspirations of mankind. In order to this result it must not only withdraw from its extreme individualism, but bring its liberty into organic relations with its spirit of social fidelity. It will then welcome the fact that freedom and authority are identical in their deeper meanings. It will discover that service is more important than culture, and that culture is of value to the end that service may become more effective. Then it will cheerfully recognise the truth that the social obligation is as important as the individual right, and that the two make the rounded whole of human action."

How much more we might make of our family life, of our friendships, if every secret thought of love blossomed into a deed! . . . There are words and looks and little observances, thoughtfulnesses, watchful little attentions, which speak of love, which make it manifest, and there is scarce a family that might not be richer in heart-wealth for more of them.

—Mrs. H. B. Stowe.

* "Unitarianism in America: A History of its Origin and Development." By GEORGE WILLIS COOKE, Member of the American Historical Association &c. Boston: American Unitarian Association, 1902. (To be had at Essex Hall. 9s. net.)

DIVINE IMMANENCE.*

"Ethical Pantheism" is the title Mr. Hugenholtz has given to his new book, as it is the name which seems to him the best for the form of very earnest religious faith which inspires his teaching, and which he here with great simplicity but with real eloquence expounds. Yet, as we read, it was the thought of the "Divine Immanence" which constantly recurred to us as more truly describing the writer's fundamental thought, and as avoiding the misconception so easily attaching to the use of the word Pantheism. It is, as Mr. Hugenholtz says, a question of words, and the fact remains that at the centre of his religious faith is the conviction that Divine righteousness is supreme, and that there is no escape for man from the ethical facts of life, which are not to be explained away, but accepted as a call to the highest service, for the fulfilment of the end of his being. Modern thought more and more makes for a system of Monism in the interpretation of life, but it must be religious Monism, says Mr. Hugenholtz, that is, Ethical Pantheism, instinct with reverence and trust, with the watch-word, "God with us, God in us," and the all-sufficient prayer, "Thy will be done."

Mr. Hugenholtz resigned his ministry in the Dutch Reformed Church in 1877, and, with his brother, the late Dr. P. R. Hugenholtz, founded the Vrije Gemeente in Amsterdam, the Free Congregation, in the spacious hall of which the International Council will next week hold its meetings. It is, therefore, with a special personal interest that we have turned to this book, and our expectation has been abundantly rewarded. "This is a layman's book," Mr. Hugenholtz says, at the beginning of a brief preface. Born of his own spiritual need, it tells, without pretension to a specialist's knowledge of philosophy, how he himself has found satisfaction in the form of religious thought here expounded; and he writes in the hope of helping others.

After an introduction, stating the fundamental position of his "Ethical Pantheism," which aims at uniting the Aryan belief in the immanence of God with the Semitic view of His transcendence, the greater part of the book is occupied with a sketch of various forms of "Pantheism," which constantly appear throughout the history of religion, in the profoundest and most earnest teachers. The first chapter tells of "Heathen Pantheism," quoting various forms of thought in the Veda and the Bhagavad-Gita, in Sophocles, Socrates, Plato, the Stoics, and others. Then follow chapters on "Christian Pantheism," in which reference is made to the deepest religious experience of Jesus and Paul, to great churchmen such as Clement and Origen, Augustine and Aquinas, to heretics and mystics, down to Carlyle and Emerson, and the poets and philosophers, among whom are Goethe, Wordsworth, and Walt Whitman, Kant, Hegel, Schopenhauer, down even to Paul Carus. Some of these, no doubt, may be rightly termed Pantheists, but a mere enumeration of the names, from which we have selected only a few of the chief, is sufficient to prove that what Mr. Hugenholtz has done is to show how constant, under many forms, in the deepest religious experience, has been the conviction of the Divine Immanence in the world.

In a final chapter of more than fifty pages, Mr. Hugenholtz gives a deeply interesting exposition of his own "Ethical Pantheism." A writer in last year's Theologisch Tijdschrift suggested "Panentheism" as a better name for such religious faith in the unity of all in God, but Mr. Hugenholtz prefers the old word. He holds fast, as we have said, to the true ethical life of man, with reverent trust in the Eternal Goodness, the Power which "makes for righteousness." God is in all, and in God all must be well; our part in the battle of life is to strive ever after the ideal, and so to find our peace, and do our part to make all well. This faith Mr. Hugenholtz expounds with a noble moral fervour and moving power; and such teaching appears to us to involve a true communion with God, such as Pantheism in the strict philosophical sense does not allow.

As to personal immortality, Mr. Hugenholtz appears to find the highest ideal in George Eliot's "Choir Invisible," and yet recognises other possibilities for the living soul in the spiritual realm, beyond all known conditions of our present life. Here also, it appears to us, his strong hold upon the ethical facts of human life should lead naturally to more assured conviction, that we, who can know and love God, cannot be subject to the law of death.

For prayer also he finds a place, unknown to the strict Pantheist, but pleads that words must be very few, in reverent aspiration and submission to the Divine Will.

Such, very briefly, are the main lines of Mr. Hugenholtz's thought. We are grateful to him for the vivid interest and stimulus of his book. No earnest religious thinker could read it without being drawn in sympathy to the writer, even if the exposition does not always carry complete conviction, nor without being the better for the companionship of such a teacher.

* Ethisch Pantheïsme: Een Studie door P. H. Hugenholtz, Junr. (Amsterdam: Van Holkema & Warendorf. fl. 2.50.)

CHILD LORE.*

The Rev. William Harrison has conceived and carried out a rather bold experiment. Knowing, as we all do, that parents, ministers, teachers, and most other people who have to do with children, are in the way of reporting their odd sayings and doings, he has made a collection of stories, gathered far and wide, and here he presents them in print. The risks of such a venture are obvious. In the first place, cold print is a far less sympathetic medium for such matter than personal narration with its animated tones and appropriate acting. In the second place, people who tell stories about their own children or pupils, and tell them very heartily and well, are apt to be less interested in similar stories told by other people about other little wits and sages. Besides, there is a special risk attending all works of a purely anecdotal character. The reader, if he once really commits himself to a perusal of such a book, is conscious, more or less, of revelling in things too sweet. Sober judgment soon says he has had enough; but appetite, increased by what it feeds on, pleads for just one more; and so he goes on, fascinated by the charms of the story-teller, yet probably ashamed to be so easily caught. Then comes a mental reaction, and, thenceforward, he looks askance at such fare.

On behalf of the present work, it must be pleaded that the author has grouped his stories into convenient sections, so that the weaker brother may halt (if he can), as he comes to the end of the respective divisions. There is, as might be expected, a good deal in the book illustrative of the child's notions of religion. Many bits are quaint, some pretty; others chiefly reveal the deplorable way in which the young mind is stuffed with things theological, but neither natural nor divine. In his experience as examiner, Mr. Harrison has come upon some choice gems, and even if an over-sceptical reader suspects a little polishing here and there, the stories, undoubtedly, remain good ones. Many of the anecdotes come to him from brother ministers, and who can suppose an excess of imagination in our special company of prophets? Here and there we come upon variants of well-preserved tales, which, or their analogues, have lightened the more serious toils of many generations. The ingenious narrator of stories must not be envious, and must beware of disparagement when he lights on one or another of his own favourites, fondly thought to be private proverty, but here shown to belong to humanity's common stock. For our own part, we have rather been surprised to find so much that is new to us among these treasures which, like a kindly householder, Mr. Harrison has brought forth. If any one, not knowing the potency of the anecdote, even in discourses of much gravity, should ask the author at the end of his book, "What is the good of all this?" he may fitly receive in reply Michael Faraday's defensive query, "What is the use of a baby?"

W. G. T.

* "Children: Their Thoughts, Words and Ways." By W. Harrison, author of "A Continental Holiday," "How I Saw Italy," &c. (John Heywood, Manchester. 3s.)

Servetus Memorial.—Since the last acknowledgment of a donation to this fund we have received the following:—Mr. R. D. Darbishire, £5; per Rev. B. Walker, £5; making a total of £21. After the International meetings at Amsterdam we propose to forward this sum to Geneva, with any further gift that our readers may care to send, as a mark of sympathy with the "faithful sons of Calvin," who desire to erect this "expiatory memorial," to the honour of Servetus and in condemnation of Calvin's act. The line in the proposed inscription, which speaks of that act as "an error which was that of his age," has been sharply criticised by the Christian Life as contrary to fact, seeing that the crime was condemned by practically the whole Protestant world at the time. It is, perhaps, not too late to reconsider the terms of the inscription. With the purpose of our friends in Geneva we have already expressed our cordial sympathy.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. C. H. WELLBELOVED.

MANY friends will hear with sorrow of the death of the Rev. Charles H. Wellbeloved, of Southport, who had been for some time in failing health, and passed away on Monday last, in his sixty-eighth year.

A native of Leeds, where he was born October 23, 1835, Mr. Wellbeloved was a grandson of the elder Charles Wellbeloved, for so many years the revered head of Manchester College at York, and minister of St. Saviourgate Chapel in that city. In early life Mr. Wellbeloved was by profession an engineer, and was resident in Manchester, but the call to the Christian ministry came to him, and after two years' training in Belfast, under the Professors of the Non-Subscribing Association, he became in 1873 minister at Evesham. Two years later he removed to York, called to his grandfather's pulpit, drawn also by the fact that he could thus be with his venerable uncle, the late Rev. John Kenrick, during the closing years of his life. Mr. Kenrick, who had also been an honoured teacher in Manchester College, and minister at St. Saviourgate, died in 1877, and in 1880 Mr. Wellbeloved accepted an invitation to the Old Meeting at Mansfield. His longest ministry has been at Southport, where he entered on his charge in the summer of 1883. With faithful diligence he laboured all these years, sharing also in the public beneficent activities of the town. His ministry was of the quiet, helpful kind, and the memorial of it is in many hearts.

SIR EDWIN GAUNT.

By the death of Sir Edwin Gaunt, Leeds loses one of its oldest and most respected citizens; Mill Hill Chapel, one who among many worthy men was conspicuous for ability, determination, and a lifelong devotion to the service of the people. Born in 1818, his father a poor schoolmaster, himself one of seven children, he had early to work to increase the scanty income of the family. At the age of eleven he was already in full employment, when the times were good working seventeen hours a day, when they were bad eking out a wage by rising early in the morning to get papers for the few who then indulged in the luxury of having their morning newspaper on their breakfast table. But amid all the toil of his daily life he found time for self-improvement, and he was a reader and a scholar almost to his last year.

The Leeds papers have long accounts of his life and labours, and it is to the credit both of the Yorkshire Post and Sir Edwin that the longest and most appreciative notice appeared in the columns of that Tory organ. For he was all his life a strenuous fighter for what he believed to be the cause of God and humanity. And he could smite hard at those, whether of his own side or the other, whom he judged to be obstructing the good cause. That such a man should have lived to win the respect of all his fellow citizens of all parties is a fact to be laid to heart by those who may be tempted to win favour by subserviency.

Sir Edwin was a member of the City Council from 1861 to 1898, except for the space of three years during which he was kept out by his determined refusal to please his constituents in the matter of a certain salary which they objected to the increase of, which he believed ought to be raised. He was alderman for twenty-four years, twice mayor, a magistrate of the borough, manager of the People's Concert Society, &c. He was to the fore in every good work which sought his aid, and was in accord with his inclinations.

But one word must be added of his least conspicuous and perhaps noblest work. As a young man, he joined with others to begin an undenominational Sunday-school in Holbeck—this was before the Domestic Mission was started there. To this school he gave up his Sundays, till the infirmities of one getting on to eighty compelled him to leave the work to younger men. The first class was at six o'clock in the morning, a fine being exacted of all who were a minute late. Here Mill's Political Economy and other solid works were read by men who came young, and continued scholars on to middle age. At half-past seven they adjourned for breakfast, returned for the ordinary school and service, and after dinner began again with the two hours of afternoon work and song.

The high esteem in which Sir Edwin was held was shown by the crowd of men and women of all sorts and conditions, from the Lord Mayor to the humblest and poorest, which attended his funeral, and lined the long path from the cemetery chapel to the grave. He was indeed a man of rare ability and character, of whom it is hard to speak briefly, of whom Leeds and Mill Hill may both be proud.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE KIND-HEARTED LITTLE BROOK.

ONCE upon a time there was a little tarn who lived on the side of a high mountain. But, although his home was very beautiful, he was not contented, and he looked enviously at the tiny streamlets that trickled down their crooked paths to the sea which was not far distant.

"Oh dear!" he sighed, "if only I were a brooklet I would be able to see the world; I could see the home of the fallow-deer that come here at noon-day to drink, the baby goats that dwell in the valley while their father scales the high mountain crags, and men like the travellers who sometimes pass this way. But I would not be crooked and curved like my brothers; I would run straight to the sea, and so be much wider and nobler."

"Your wish is heard!" cried the sweet voice of the Water Nymph. "To-night I shall send a great flood, and you shall be transformed into a little brook. I shall mark a straight path for you, and you must find your way to the sea where I shall meet you."

The little tarn thanked the Water Nymph and was very glad, because he knew that he would be straighter and handsomer than all the other streams.

That night there was a great flood, and the little tarn broke his bounds and started on his jounrey to the sea. Down he rushed for a short distance, and then, going more slowly, he looked at the wonders of Nature and was charmed with all, till, at a short distance, he saw a beautiful fallow-deer lying wounded and panting after a cruel chase.

"Perhaps some water would do him good," thought the little brook; "it is not very far out of my way." So he slipped quietly along a little ravine, and refreshed the stag with his pure water.

A little further on his way he saw two baby goats. "Poor little goats!" said the brook. "How thirsty they look!" And, forgetting all about the straight path to the sea, he rippled along near to their home. But he soon remembered and ran back again, resolving never to let his good-nature lead him astray again, for he was very ambitious, and besides, he feared the Water Nymph.

After a little while, however, he saw, at a great distance, a little boy carrying a toy boat. He also saw the little brook and cried, "Come here, little brook! I want you!" But the little brook steeled his heart and said to himself, "No, no! I will not be caught again!"

Then the child began to cry, because he had no place to sail his boat, and the heart of the little brook melted within him; so, although he had gone a long way past he turned and ran back another way, and the child clapped his hands in glee.

He had scarcely started once more when he saw a young maiden carrying a heavy bucket to fill at a distant well, and his kind heart pitied her so much that he ran to meet her, and then slid quickly away again, for he was very shy.

Next a poor old man attracted his attention, and he went to give him a drink; then his path crossed that of a mule-driver, and thinking that it would frighten the poor beasts to cross water he went a long way round to avoid them. Then he went to give water to a party of travellers, then to a poor wood-cutter, a thirsty dog, a herd of sheep, some withering flowers, and an old peasant woman.

At last he reached the sea, but even here he left the straight path to avoid the garden of a poor fisherman.

"Look!" cried the Water Nymph sternly. "Look back upon your track! You, who were favoured above all other streams! Have you thus basely left the path you begged to follow? Look!"

In fear the poor little brook glanced back, and lo! he was more crooked than any other stream. For shame he would have plunged into the sea and there have hidden his disgrace, rather than pause to say he was sorry, because he had still the memory of the happiness he had caused; but the Water Nymph still stayed him a moment.

"Oh, most foolish of streams!" she cried in the softest and sweetest tone, "wherefore didst thou not consult thy heart at first? Could thy ambition conquer thy kindness? Thou fearest my anger! Behold, thou hast gained the love of all by thy kindness of heart, so why feel shame? This gift shall be thine as reward: thou shalt never in the greatest drought lack water, and thou shalt be revered above all thy brother streams. Fare thee well, little one, and be happy, for in future men shall know thee as the kind-hearted little brook!"

E. CLEPHAN WATSON.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom, or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, AUGUST 29, 1903.

WITH THE BRETHREN IN HOLLAND.

IT is with the keenest expectation that we look forward to the meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Amsterdam next week. We remember the happiness of the first meeting of the Council in London two years ago, the delight of the great gathering of friends, the deep interest of welcoming and hearing representatives of Liberal Religion from many lands, the inspiration which came to us through the sense of a greater fellowship united in the one Spirit for a common cause throughout the world. And this happy experience of deepened conviction and renewed aspiration, of the bonds of brotherhood more closely drawn, we have every reason to hope will be repeated at Amsterdam. Not so many of our own people, naturally, can be there, yet we shall be a company of close upon two hundred, if not more, from all parts of the country, and America will be much more largely represented than two years ago. India and Japan, Hungary, France, Germany, Switzerland, Belgium, and Sweden are also represented on the programme, and there will be friends from New Zealand and Denmark, and, doubtless, other countries, also present at the meetings. America is to be represented by the President of the American Unitarian Association and other distinguished ministers, our own country by the Presidents of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the National Conference, and the Sunday School Association, and by other of our most distinguished men and faithful workers. There will, of course, be difficulties of language in such a gathering, and this, perhaps, is one reason why provision has not been made in the programme for daily services of devotion, as the beginning of each morning session; but at the one religious service on Tuesday evening, an English translation of the sermon, which is to be preached in Dutch, will be in the hands of those who desire it; and for the rest we may be assured that even should we, some of us, at times be listening to one who speaks in an unknown tongue, the silent spirit of a true devotion may unite us, and refresh and quicken the inward life of each one throughout the whole proceedings of the Council.

It will be delightful, as we have said, to meet brethren of a common faith from so many lands; and there are special reasons why we should be grateful to our friends in Holland for their hospitable readiness to receive the members of the Council at Amsterdam. We do not refer here to the feelings with which they must have contemplated an invitation which involved the welcoming of a large number of English guests, while the bitter memories of the South African War are still so fresh in their minds and ours. They have recognised that the bonds of the "International" in the matter of religious faith unite us in spite of the sharpest differences of judgment in regard to that lamentable time, and they also know how closely many of us were united to them in the profoundest sympathy throughout those dark days. We from England and they in Holland cannot meet and be altogether heedless of those memories. Even if on that matter no word is spoken, our prayer must be that, in the light of a humble faith and a deepened sense of brotherhood, our judgment (on both sides) may grow clearer, our self-judgment more unfaltering, and our readiness for self-sacrifice in the cause of all who suffer wrong, in a true devotion to the common good, may be confirmed.

But when we speak of gratitude to our friends for asking the International Council this year to meet in Holland, it is on account of the wealth of interest attaching to their country as the home of civil and religious liberty, and because of the admiration with which we must think of the heroic period of their history, and the honour we would gladly pay to their great scholars, who have done so much for the progress of liberal religious thought and life.

The memory of "Haarlem, Leiden, Alkmaar," has recently been recalled in these columns. Those who rejoice in a rich inheritance of spiritual freedom cannot enter Holland without a tribute to the people who engaged in that heroic struggle for freedom, and to the greatness of WILLIAM THE SILENT, whose tragic death brought to his people, not despair, but a new passion of devotion to the cause for which he was willing to die. We, also, shall not be forgetful of that other WILLIAM, who came from Holland to give fresh liberties to our people; and both we and our brethren from America must recall with gratitude another episode in our common history. For in the city where the International Council is to meet the church of the "Pilgrims" once found a hospitable refuge, and afterwards in Leiden, before the sailing of the Mayflower and the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers on Plymouth Rock. At Leiden it was that the venerable JOHN ROBINSON last ministered to his church, and, with great words of faith, bade farewell to those who were to cross the ocean to secure a new home of freedom. In a parting exhortation, we are told, he urged them "to study union rather than division," and charged them to keep an open mind for truth, "for he was very confident the LORD had more truth and light to break forth out of His holy Word." From Delfshaven, by Rotterdam, the little company sailed for England, and thence in the Mayflower for New England. Now after many days their spiritual sons return, and make grateful pilgrimage to Holland, rejoicing in the knowledge that the teacher's prophecy is amply fulfilled.

ERASMUS, of Rotterdam, rendered great services to scholarship in the early days of the Revival of Learning and of the Reformation. Dr. FLEISCHER, in his interesting article on the Universities of Holland last week, mentioned other renowned scholars of later generations down to our own time, and of the latest school of Dutch theologians, of SCHOLTEN, KUENEN, and their comrades in fearless and devoted labours, Mr. WICKSTEED also writes gratefully this week. They have been among the chief in our own day, who have shown how new light and truth do break forth from the Word—and how the Word itself is to be reverently studied in a greater and more wonderful universe than the fathers of the olden time had yet conceived. It is a happy privilege we shall enjoy in meeting in their country, among their own people, with those who are still carrying on their great work.

May the Spirit of freedom, in the love of truth and the confidence of brotherly love, unite us all in earnest aspiration, looking ever to the light, and renew our consecration to that high service to which we all alike are called!

De wet des Heeren is volmaakt, bekeerende de ziel; de getuigenis des Heeren is gewis, den slechten wijsheid gevende. De bevelen des Heeren zijn regt, verblijdende het hart; het gebod des Heeren is zuiver, verlichtende de oogen. De vreeze des Heeren is rein, bestaande tot in eeuwigheid; de regten des Heeren zijn waarheid, zamen zijn zij regtvaardig.

Want gij zijt tot vrijheid geroepen, broeders! alleenlijk gebruikt de vrijheid niet tot eene oorzaak voor het vleesch; maar dient elkander door de liefde. Want de geheele wet wordt in één woord vervuld, namelijk in dit: gij zult uwen naasten liefhebben, gelijk u zelven.

De vrucht des Geestes is liefde, blijdschap, vrede, langmoedigheid, goedertierenheid, goedheid, geloof, zachtmoedigheid, matigheid. Tegen de zoodanigen is de wet niet.

Draagt elkanders lasten, en vervult alzoo de wet van CHRISTUS.

Zalig zijn de armen van geest; want hunner is het Koningrijk der hemelen.

Zalig zijn die treuren; want zij zullen vertroost worden.

Zalig zijn de zachtmoedigen; want zij zullen het aardrijk beërven.

Zalig zijn die hongeren en dorsten naar de geregtigheid; want zij zullen verzadigd worden.

Zalig zijn die barmhartigen; want hun zal barmhartigheid geschieden.

Zalig zijn de reinen van harte; want zij zullen GOD zien.

Zalig zijn de vreedzamen; want zij zullen GOD's kinderen genaamd worden.

Zalig zijn die vervolgd worden om der geregtigheid wil; want hunner is het Koningrijk der hemelen.

Zalig zijt gij, als u de menschen smaden, en vervolgen, en liegende alle kwaad tegen u spreken, om mijnentwil.

Verblijdt en verheugt u, want uw loon is groot in de hemelen; want alzoo hebben zij vervolgd de Profeten, die vóór u geweest zijn.

Gij zijt het zout der aarde: indien nu het zout smakeloos wordt, waarmede zal het gezouten worden? Het deugt nergens meer toe, dan om buiten geworpen, en van de menschen vertreden te worden.

Gij zijt het licht der wereld; eene stad boven op eenen berg liggende, kan niet verborgen zijn. Noch steekt men eene kaars aan, en zet die onder eene koornmaat, maar op eenen kandelaar, en zij schijnt allen, die in het huis zijn.

Laat uw licht alzoo schijnen voor de menschen, dat zij uwe goede werken mogen zien, en uwen Vader, die in de hemelen is, verheerlijken.

RELIGIOUS LIBERALISM AND THE DUTCH PROTESTANT CHURCHES.

IN the days of the Republic of the United Netherlands, founded by the Treaty of Utrecht, 1579, the leading principle of church politics was that which afterwards was adopted by the Westphalian Peace Conference, cujus regio illius religio. And, as the sovereignty belonged to the so-called States of each province, the assembly of the representatives of the body of knights and of the principal towns, each provincial Parliament had to decide which form of religion should be adopted. In course of time, all the provinces decided in favour of the Calvinistic church organisation, and so the Reformed Church became the Church of the State in the whole Republic. Lutherans and Mennonites were only connived at. The patronage of the Reformed Church by the Government, not only by the several States of the Republic, but likewise by the magistrates of towns and villages, was at times excessively paternal, but yielded the considerable advantages that the public exchequer furnished the material needs of the church and that public offices were open only to its members.

The Revolution of 1795 changed all this, and, proclaiming everyone equal before the law, granted the same rights to the different denominations. Since then, the position of the Reformed Church has entirely altered; but, to understand her present state, her slowness in adopting new customs, and her tolerance of what is conspicuously opposed to her own fundamental principles, her past glory and character as an established church must be taken into account.

Doctrinal Standards.

During the Republic, the Reformed Church adopted a confession of her own, the Dutch Confession of Faith, written by Guy de Bray, who died a martyr to Protestantism on the gallows, 1567. Moreover, the Synod of Dordrecht, 1619, accepted the Heidelberg Catechism and the Rules of Faith, five articles composed at that time, for the purpose of controverting Arminianism. Whoever professed these Formularies of Unity, found his place and rights within the Reformed Church.

It is a contestable point whether the church still rests upon the same foundation or not, whether William I. by organising the Dutch Reformed Church in 1816 only re-installed the old church or erected an entirely new one. This is the hinge on which all controversies turn. If the first alternative be adopted, alteration and progressive evolution of dogmatic views can obviously not be reconciled with membership in the church. Now it is a fact that every candidate for the ministry has to bind himself "to work conformably to the principles and the character of the Reformed Church of this country." Accordingly, there is much to be said for this interpretation, and those seem to be in the right who assert that the church is a doctrinal or confessional church.

Many reformed ministers, however, deny any doctrinal character to their church, and maintain that it is "a seat of religious liberty, on the ground that, since the Synod has not distinctly defined those principles, everyone "has to find these in his own way" (Professor Eerdmans, in his paper at the International Council, 1901).

On the other hand, there have been found in the course of time thousands of people who could not accept this view. Among them have been people of almost wholly opposite opinions, agreeing only in this one thing, that it was impossible to remain within a body so inconsistent with itself. They, therefore, left the church and founded their own communities.

Secessions.

The first of these separations took place in 1834, when the adherents of the Revs. H. de Cock and H. P. Scholte came out and established the Christian Reformed Church upon the basis of the above-mentioned three Formularies of Unity, sanctioned by the National Synod of Dordrecht in 1619. The members of this new church, persecuted by the Government of King William I., insulted and jeered at by the mob as Separatists, Nodders, &c., have vindicated their right to exist by means of respectability and quiet constancy. At present they form the second Protestant Church of our country, with nearly 200,000 members.

A second separation on almost the same terms happened in 1886, when Dr. Abraham Kuyper, late minister of the Dutch Reformed Church at Amsterdam, instituted a new community under the old name. His effort was successful, and the number of his followers at present amounts to little less than 200,000.

In 1892 the Reformed Church of Dr. Kuyper—whose cart is driving on a smooth road—and the Christian Reformed Church united, and may justly glory now in being a large community with 679 chapels and more than 500 ministers.

An exodus upon wholly different grounds, though resulting from the same ambiguous character of the Dutch Reformed Church, took place at Amsterdam in 1877, when the brothers Hugenholtz left their ministry in the metropolitan parish, and founded the Vrije Gemeente (i.e., Free Congregation), in the meeting-house of which the International Congress is to assemble next week.

The Reformed Church Still Dominant.

In spite of these and other bleedings, the Dutch Reformed Church is still the spiritual home of the majority of our people. It registers more than 2,500,000 members, and consists of 1,349 congregations, with upwards of 1,600 ministers. According to the report of the last triennial church inspection, there were 562 churches in which service is held only once a week. Most of these are managed by liberal vestries, and, therefore, we shall not be far wrong in rating the number of liberal congregations at about 500. As Professor Eerdmans said at one of the meetings of the International Council, in 1901, "one-third of the church may be reckoned to be liberal." This is, however, by no means the same as saying that two-thirds are orthodox, for a great many of the so-called members are neither this nor that, but are indifferent.

The Lutheran Church.

Numerically speaking, the third church of our country is that of the Lutherans, which includes some 90,000 members in 57 congregations, with about 75 ministers. The spiritual strength of this church, however, is alas! by no means according to its numbers. The Lutherans have been since 1791 divided into an orthodox and a more or less liberal church. The first, the Restored Evangelical Lutheran Church, includes a rather small minority, but for the last twenty-five years has been steadily increasing. In the latter, the Evangelical Lutheran Church, the orthodox party is not a very mighty one, though by no means to be set at naught. The Lutheran Church has some eminent preachers, who are to be counted among the best representatives of liberal religion.

The Mennonites.

The Mennonites, numbering about 60,000, are a group of free congregations, each of which enjoys an unlimited autonomy. They are by no means bound to liberal theology; but, in consequence of their free organisation, they are, as it were, predestined for free thought and free science. Among their 130 ministers there are not more than nine or ten who adhere to somewhat orthodox ideas, and even their orthodoxy is of a rather mild, evangelical tendency. All the rest are frankly devoted to the development of liberal religious thought and life, and many of them belong to the fighting phalanx of modern theology.

The Remonstrants.

The fifth large and important community is the Remonstrant Brotherhood (Remonstrantsche Broederschap), at present one of the most flourishing communities, which numbers nearly three times as many members as it did some forty years ago, though containing not yet more than about 15,000 in 26 congregations, with 25 ministers. These latter are, with a single exception, frankly upholding progressive theology and free church life; and as they are, to a large extent, recruited from among the best liberal preachers of the Dutch Reformed Church, they generally enjoy the reputation of popular eloquence.

Other Smaller Bodies.

Besides the churches now enumerated, there are some small communities of less significance. Among these, not reckoning the French, English, and Scottish sections of the Dutch Reformed Church, I mention the Anglican Episcopal, the English Presbyterian, and the Scottish Mission Church, of which the second is patronised by the Colonial and Continental Church Society in London. I do not know of any Unitarian Church in Holland, nor is there need of one, considering that all British Churches, together with the British sections of the Reformed Church, do not number above 1,000 or 2,000 members.

Conflict over Liberal Theology.

Liberal theology, or, as we call it, Modernism (de Moderne Richting) caused a vehement division among the Dutch Protestant churches half a century ago. It was a sharp knife against traditional conservatism, and many a pulpit seemed to be a battlefield, where week by week a stubborn fight was fought. This did not fail to attract the more intellectual of the people; but then the want of edification repelled others not less needed in the church, the unassuming pious souls, whose quiet devotion forms the strength of every religious community. It has been the good fortune of the Mennonite congregations that they have succeeded fairly in keeping together these desired elements.

Within the Dutch Reformed Church a steadfast orthodox reaction is gradually organising itself with all the means of success. Hence an undeniable, imminent danger for Liberalism, at least for its development within the churches. Without a careful and confident resistance on the part of the liberals there is much fear that they will end by being expelled from the most important church of our country, which would be an irreparable loss. Considering the surprising and wisely promoted increase of orthodox divines, I do not know any question more important with regard to the future of Liberalism than that of the supply of candidates for the ministry. Alas, this fact is by no means fully realised, even by such as are accustomed to complain of the progress of orthodoxy.

The so-called Evangelicals, a middle party, which will be represented at the Congress by Professor Gooszen, is concerned in the same threatening danger. At the thirty-first anniversary meeting of the Evangelical party this year, reference was made to the alleged deity of Christ, and this dogma, together with that of the Trinity, was reprobated as unevangelical and in contradiction to the declarations of Jesus himself. This induced an orthodox divine to trouble the Synod with the question, whether such heretics ought to be suffered any longer within the Dutch Reformed Church. As it happened, the Synod this year contained a majority of liberals, as there were some orthodox members absent through illness. Nevertheless the position of the Evangelicals within that church is by no means an enviable one; distrusted on one side and the other they do not justify any expectation of a hopeful, strong current of life, and have on the contrary to fear loss both on the left and the right. Sometimes they have been the guides of orthodoxy, the means by which liberal congregations have been regained for the old creeds.

The Protestantenbond.

The chief corporation by which the liberal banner is upheld is the Nederlandsche Protestantenbond (Dutch Society of Protestants). This Society, with 158 district societies and 17 agencies unites about 1,900 liberals of every denomination for the promotion of free religious thought and life. By the founding of Sunday-schools, of which already 160 have been established, by organising free religious services and popular lectures, by the publication of books, by postal mission, Toynbee-work, district nursing, &c, the Protestantenbond tries to spread our principles, and undoubtedly does a very good work, on the importance of which I need not dwell. Nevertheless there is still much to do, and in my view there ought to be more done within the limits of Church life and by a more aggressive propagation of our opinions and aims.

I know there is a sharp division of opinion about this. Authorities contradict each other. Our mutual friend, the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, of Amsterdam, and many others, judge it to be the only righteous and efficacious proceeding to divide what proves inwardly inconsistent. He and others warn us not to put new wine into old bottles. Therefore, Mr. Hugenholtz separated from the Dutch Reformed Church and founded an independent society, the above-mentioned Vrije Gemeente. Following the same course, though somewhat hesitatingly, the district societies of the Protestantenbond at Schiedam, the Hague, Utrecht, and Bussum have appointed their own ministers. This is all very well so far as it is an intermediate remedy against the pressing superiority of orthodox consistories. But quite wrong is, in my opinion, the proceeding of large parties of for the most part intellectual people, who leave the Reformed Church and join Remonstrant and Mennonite congregations, nay, are founding new ones, though, naturally, the latter denominations bid a hearty welcome to those who like to join them of their own accord.

A better way is chosen by the Liberal Reformed Societies at Leiden and at Middelburg, the Paul Society at Wommels, the liberal party at Menaldum, and perhaps by other associations elsewhere, by which weekly services, religious teaching of the young, baptism, &c., are provided, without insisting on the giving up of membership in the Reformed Church.

Need of Aggressive Work.

But all this is not enough. Liberalism has to work out a more positive character for itself, and must enter upon popular aggressive tactics against the system of orthodox belief, church life, and social organisation. It stands now at the parting of the ways. The organisation of orthodoxy is undeniably to be admired, armed as it is by its large and small, daily and weekly journals, its special schools—seminaries for the training of ministers and teachers, gymnasiums, boarding schools and primary schools—with its domestic mission chapels, young men's, boys' and girls' associations, its hospitals of every kind, &c. Liberalism must follow this example and gird on the same armour, lest it suffer defeat.

Would it succeed? Sometimes I fear that we entirely fail to see what it is that moves people. Looking at the mutual quarrels of the different orthodox parties, we are apt to consider that they are all equally narrow-minded and bigoted, that they are often contending, as the Greeks said, for an ass's shadow. Would not they, perhaps, think the same about us? It is not by passion and prejudice that our judgment is to be led. We must try to face the actual points of difference, understand and compare their aims and ours, that we may push forward. This cannot be done by learned discussion and scientific work, though I would not be understood as undervaluing theological study. We must go down to the people themselves. In this regard, I think, we have much to learn from the Unitarians and their methods of work.

Signs of the Times.

If we do so, I venture to predict some good results. Not only because our faith in the well-founded truth of our conviction forebodes inevitable success, but also because many promising signs of the fulness of this time are to be seen. Even among orthodox people the sacramental character of the church is losing its hold, modern critics are penetrating into remote sanctuaries of conservatism; change of conviction is by no means a rare occurrence where a zealous and gifted preacher has entered the pulpit.

In any case, whether it will succeed or not, the attempt must be made. Of course, it is a pity that so many liberals shrink from this struggle, although this be generally regarded as a sign of peaceableness, for to keep back the truth, even for the sake of peace, is as foolish as it is wrong. It is an open question whether this dislike of conflict is a sign of benignity or of weakness. For it is not to be denied that there is much of the sin of the Laodiceans among the so-called liberals: many a one is neither cold nor hot, but lukewarm. Holding aloof entirely from any movement, they appease their conscience by reasoning that new doctrines cannot spread with great rapidity. Meanwhile they abandon the outworks. Most of the town parishes are already lost. Many a country parish is threatened. Caveant consules!

The garrison of the liberal fortress has withdrawn to its vital defences. Would to God they might find the very tactics they need, for at present there is nothing on which opinion is less settled among us.

It is particularly for this reason that I welcome the International Congress at Amsterdam as a providential incident which promises infinite good for the strengthening of our national liberal religious movement. May a spring of confidence and hope result from the blissful manifestation of that catholic Love to God and Love to Man by which all liberal religious thinkers and workers throughout the world must be united.

F. C. FLEISCHER.

Makkum, August, 1903.

MY FIRST VISIT TO HOLLAND.

BY PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

I HAVE been asked to contribute to THE INQUIRER a few personal recollections of the great Dutch theologians of my youth, but I find that what Dante calls the "illusion of self-love" draws me with clinging affection to the recollection of how I myself came to know these said theologians, and so what I have to say resolves itself into a sketch of the Dutch chapter of my own autobiography.

I think I was twenty-two when I settled at Taunton, and began to set about supplementing what Mr. Solly has recently told us is the very imperfect education provided for us by our college; but, oddly enough, I sought the supplement in the study of theology. Amongst other things, I started, systematically, reading through the back numbers of the Theological Review, and then I encountered papers by Albert Réville and John James Tayler, speaking with high admiration of the Dutch theologians. I paid no particular heed to them at the time, but, as Wordsworth says, though a sense of gay confusion may still be uppermost after such miscellaneous reading, "Yet to the memory something cleaves at last, Whence profit may be drawn in times to come."

Old Testament Studies.

Meanwhile, I was employed by my aunt, Miss Charlotte Lupton, in a subordinate capacity, as an assistant in the translation of Ewald's great "History of Israel." Miss Lupton was a standing refutation of the dictum that tastes and talents are sure to coincide. She had a passion for philology, and even for phonetics, combined with the utmost difficulty in acquiring languages, or pronouncing even her own correctly. But her enthusiasm triumphed over everything. She made herself a fair Hebrew and Welsh scholar, and gained a perfect mastery of Ewald's cumbrous and intricate diction. To present this great scholar to England had been the steadily pursued purpose of years and years of her life; but though she learned to understand Ewald's German perfectly, she could never learn to turn it into luminous or idiomatic English; and at last, recognising her limitations, she called in the aid first of Russell Martineau, then of a whole series of his pupils (Estlin Carpenter, myself, Frank Jones, and Harry Solly), and finally handed over the completion of the work, which had now secured its public, to Frederick Smith. Her name never appeared in connection with this work, but she had her reward and was happy.

My own modest part of the task (very badly done, for I knew no German to speak of, but my coadjutors generally kept me fairly straight) deepened what had long been an almost passionate love of Old Testament history and literature; and when I moved to Dukinfield, I was supposed to be a dangerous person, on account of my having revolutionary views as to the Old Testament—instead of having no views (or knowledge) at all, which was the orthodox position amongst us in those days. John Reynolds, I think it was, impressed me to read a paper before the Manchester District Sunday-school Association on the "Study of the Bible," and in consequence of that paper came a request, which I could not well refuse, to become joint editor with Mr. Reynolds of a "Teachers' Manual," which should give guidance to the ignorant in this and other subjects.

I began, for this Manual, a series of papers on Old Testament history, following Ewald, but with an uneasy sense that he asserted a good deal more than he proved, and when I looked about amongst the other authorities open to me, I found that their idea of original research seemed to be reading Ewald, behind whom they never appeared to go.

Kuenen's Work.

Then came back to my mind those articles about the Dutch theologians. I had heard the fame of Kuenen as an independent student of the Old Testament, elsewhere, too. So, being of an adventurous turn, I determined to ignore the fact that his book was written in Dutch, of which I did not know a word, and to start reading it. I got the two portly volumes, and on inquiry discovered a tobacconist in Manchester who was a Dutch Jew, and who undertook to help me to read the book at the modest charge of one shilling an hour.

The taste of Kuenen's quality inspired me with a perfect furor for the study of Dutch theology. I found myself unable to obtain some of the Dutch books referred to in Kuenen's notes, and, finally, I wrote, in what I intended to be Dutch, to Kuenen himself, asking him to put me in the way of getting some of these books. Kuenen afterwards told me that his knowledge of English was sufficient to enable him to understand my Dutch letter, and he answered it with the most perfect graciousness, lending me his own copies of some pamphlets or articles which were out of print, and, therefore, irreplaceable had I lost them, but inaccessible to me otherwise. He put me into communication with Cheyne and other English scholars who possessed and read Dutch books, and above all he told me that, for my purpose, he thought a popular work which two younger friends of his, Oort and Hooykaas, were bringing out would be of use to me.

The Bible for Young People.

I at once ordered the two volumes of the "Bible for Young People," that had already appeared, but with the foregone conclusion that they would "economise" truth since they were written for young people, and that I should miss the frank and pure atmosphere of veracity that had taken me captive in Kuenen. I shall never forget the morning when these two volumes arrived at the Dukinfield Parsonage, and with my back to the fire I cut into them here and there to sample their qualities. The boldness, the directness, the devoutness, and the truthfulness without any tone of apology, overwhelmed me with delight and enthusiasm, and I thought that if I could live to translate that book and present it to the English public I should be ready to die.

I translated specimen chapters and went about to ministers' meetings and to private friends, making myself an intolerable nuisance, having upon me the sense of a mission. But there was one of our group (who shall be nameless) who never seemed to suffer from the chronic or acute impecuniosity which afflicted all the rest of us, and who chanced "to have £100 set aside for some such purpose" as that of the publication of this work! So, with this backing, I was enabled to get the Manchester District Sunday-school Association to take the thing in hand, and first in separate numbers, and then in volumes, the work went forward, being eventually taken up and completed by the London Sunday School Association.

It is strange to look back and see what a desperate thing we were all supposed to be doing. I remember when the first parts had appeared, meeting a friend and saying to him, "You see I have broken down my bridges." "You have, indeed," he answered gravely, "and burnt your boats, too; I do not know what will become of you." But I have noticed all through life that I have owed such prosperity as has come my way to the open defiance of fate, and almost the only things that have ever brought me money (though always indirectly), have been the very things that I expected to lead me to ruin, or which I pursued for their own sake to the neglect of all money-making projects. The "Bible for Young People" never brought me, or anyone else concerned in the venture, any money; but it brought me, and I hope others, life.

My studies in Dutch theology had filled me with the desire to visit Leiden. I wanted to consult Oort and Hooykaas on many questions connected with our work; and I wanted to see Kuenen, whose book impressed me as coming from the clearest intellect and the most tranquil soul that I had ever encountered. The Hibbert Trustees lent a gracious ear to an application which I made to them, giving me a handsome grant of money, I forget how much, to enable me to take six or eight weeks' study in Leiden.

Hooykaas.

The first of the Dutch scholars whom I visited when I arrived in Holland was Hooykaas, at that time pastor in Schiedam; and I went a long walk with two little girls, now mothers of families, to try my paces in Dutch conversation. I inquired before I left Schiedam at a bookseller's shop for a suitable illustrated book for children, and was given, I think, Van Alphen's Poems, which I duly presented to the children. The exquisiteness of this unconscious humour on my part will be duly appreciated by all Dutchmen: Englishmen must die without enjoying the joke. Van Alphen is the absolute ne plus ultra of priggish orthodox goody-goodiness, and if the whole universe had been expressly designed for the purpose of leading up to an absurdity, it could have achieved nothing greater than that present. However, the Hooykaas family received it graciously, and it was not till years afterwards that I myself discovered what I had done. No doubt, this was a type of my general behaviour, but, wrapt in thick robes of ignorance and self-complacency, I thought I was getting on beautifully; and I did actually contrive to have laborious but long and intelligible conversations with Hooykaas (at least, we each of us understood something, whether it was what the other meant or not may be a question) on the subject of our enterprise.

Kuenen.

Then I went on to Leiden, where Kuenen had secured me comfortable quarters, and I lost no time in going to call upon him. His book was large and generously printed, his handwriting was clear, magnanimous, and beautiful. What would his personal persence be? I remember, as I waited for him, seeing a Noah's Ark on the sideboard, and noting with amusement that the higher criticism could still tolerate such institutions of the past. By and by I heard a step, the door opened, and Kuenen's noble form presented itself. It was the beginning of one of the closest and most precious friendships of my life; for in Kuenen's presence all inequalities of intellect, learning, position, and age disappeared. Youth and ignorance conversed on equal terms with maturity and encyclopædic knowledge, and while receiving every moment the impression of character, and drinking in information at every pore, one was made to feel as though conversing with a friend rather than sitting at the feet of an instructor. Thank God, I have known other great and good men, far more than I deserve; but there never was but one Kuenen.

Scholten.

The great personality at Leiden, however, was, at that time, Scholten, who was the chief founder of the "modern" school of theology, of which Leiden was then, as now, the head-quarters. He had written on the history of dogmatics, on the question of Free Will (being a stout Determinist), and on the history of philosophy and religion. But his recent works had been on Gospel criticism, and I had not expected to derive much satisfaction from his teaching, for (like Miss Cobbe, was it not, who, when she was eight years old "had taken upon herself to despise Baal") I had taken upon myself to regard the Tübingen criticism as "crude." (Now, when the world professes to have come round to the same conclusion, I have abandoned it, by the way.) But Scholten's personality overmastered me. I learnt from him the inwardness of the Tendenz criticism. I sat spellbound at his feet. As a lecturer and teacher I have never known his like; his powers were said to be past their meridian, but I can imagine no more brilliant and versatile lecturer, no more commanding personality than his, as I knew it. I shall never forget an occasion on which he was following up the inquiry of the sceptic who doubts everything, questions whether the external world exists, whether God exists, and, ultimately, "does anything exist?" "Yes," said Scholten, standing there with his massive form and head, unconscious apparently of his hearers, "Yes, I exist." He meant to bring us to the consciousness of our own "ego" as the ultimate citadel which no scepticism could storm. It was Descartes' "Cogito, ergo sum." But the effect upon me was to produce the overwhelming certainty, not that I, but that he, Scholten, existed. The world had vanished, but he remained, and I was never more sure of "existence" as a reality than as I sat there and felt him.

A Noble Group.

I must be growing old. I find myself laudator temporis acti. I know! Vixere fortes not only ante, but post Agamemnona; but to me the heroic age is in the past. Troja fuit, fuimus Trojani. It was round these two great central figures, Scholten and Kuenen, that the rest grouped themselves; and what a galaxy it was! Now all are gone save one; Scholten, Kuenen, Tiele, Raauwenhoff, Hooykaas, and the rest, and the great modern movement, which threatened to take Holland by storm, has mellowed, perhaps, and gained even wider significance than it promised, as witness the Amsterdam gathering; but it seems to have lost the confidence and triumph of its youth.

The President.

Oort, our President, remains. He was the enfant terrible of those days, blurting out his extravagances (that often turned out to be inspirations after all), rash, perhaps, but full of elasticity and originality. Without the steadying influence of natural conservatism, but open-eyed fundamentally sane in judgment in every direction, free to make discoveries. Now our President is tamed, but his eye is not dimmed nor his natural force abated He was left to complete the great work on the Old Testament which his friend and brother-in-law Hooykaas planned, which his teacher Kuenen superintended, to which his colleague Kosters lent a hand. Long may this cruda viridisque senectus flourish! The tone and colour of the devoutness which was always part of his nature seems to deepen year by year; and he is a standing proof, if proof were needed, that the most trenchant criticism need not brush the bloom from the tenderest and most childlike piety.

Find your purpose and fling your life out to it; and the loftier your purpose is, the more sure you will be to make the world richer with every enrichment of yourself. Phillips Brooks.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL NOTES.

We have reprinted the main part of the programme this week, in the hope that it may be of service to members of our party in Amsterdam, as well as of interest to friends at home. The last copies of the programme which have reached us, in a smooth white cover of festive appearance, are enriched by a picture of the Hall of the Free Congregation, in the Weteringschans, where the meetings of the Council are to be held. The admirable map of Amsterdam, at the end of the programme, appears to be on a scale of about 4½ in. to a mile. Thus from the Exchange to the hall of meeting is about a mile. From the Amstel Hotel it is about the same distance.

The Netherlands Committee have also kindly sent over for the use of English members a large number of copies of a handy little guide to Amsterdam, containing a map and thirteen picture postcards showing the chief buildings of the city.

The English party, numbering in the printed list 190, are distributed for the most part in six hotels, official delegates, readers of papers, &c., being entertained by the Netherlands Committee at the Amstel Hotel, the other hotels being the American, Bible, Victoria, Het Haasje and Prinshendrik. At each of these a leader has been appointed to superintend arrangements, the names following the order of the hotels as above:—Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. Charles Fenton, the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, F. Summers, and H. S. Perris.

The official delegates of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are as follows:—

Mr. William Arthur Sharpe (President), London; Rev. Richard A. Armstrong, B.A. (Ex-President), Liverpool; Rev. W. Copeland Bowie (Secretary), Essex Hall, London; Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., Oxford; Rev. James Harwood, B.A. (Chairman, Foreign Missions), London; Mr. Ion Pritchard (Hon. Sec. Sunday School Association), London; Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., Childrey, Wantage.

District and Local Associations in Great Britain and Ireland are represented as follows:—East Cheshire Union, Rev. W. Harrison; Liverpool Association, Mr. B. P. Burroughs; London District Society, Rev. W. G. Tarrant; Manchester District Association, Rev. H. J. Rossington; Missionary Conference, Revs. T. P. Spedding and W. R. Shanks; Northumberland and Durham Association, Rev. F. Wood; Southern Unitarian Association, Mr. F. Pinnock; Yorkshire Union, Rev. E. Ceredig Jones; South-East Wales Society, Mr. John Lewis; Scottish Unitarian Association, Mr. R. Stewart; Irish Association, Mr. W. Roberts.

Of Professor Oort, the President of the Council, Mr. Wicksteed writes in his article of personal reminiscences this week, of his first visit to Holland. Dr. Oort was for some years a minister in the Dutch Reformed Church, and since 1875 has been Professor of Hebrew and Hebrew Antiquities at Leiden. The preacher at Tuesday evening's service, in the Old Walloon Church, the Rev. J. van Loenen Martinet, is editor of De Hervorming, the weekly organ of the Protestantenbond.

Formerly a minister in the Dutch Reformed Church, he resigned his post to become the editor of a Liberal daily paper, which unhappily for financial reasons came to an end. Besides being editor of the Hervorming, Mr. van Loenen Martinet is now minister of a Free Congregation at Bussum, near Amsterdam, connected with the Protestantenbond.

THERE are four other Dutchmen whose names appear on the programme, of whom we may add some notes. Dr. Cannegieter, who is also to preside over the meeting of Liberal ministers on Monday and Tuesday, is one of the Professors of Theology in the University of Utrecht, appointed, according to custom, by the Dutch Reformed Church. Dr. Bruining, who has been for a quarter of a century a minister of the Reformed Church, has recently been appointed Professor of the Philosophy of Religion in the University of Amsterdam. Dr. Cramer is Professor of Church History in the same university, and is also Professor in the Mennonite Seminary. Dr. Gooszen, to whom Dr. Fleischer refers in his article this week, is Professor of Theology at Leiden.

IT may be remembered that in early forecasts of the programme mention was made of an alternative excursion on Friday to Leiden. This does not appear in the final programme, for it has been judged better to concentrate on the one excursion to Edam and Volendam, which will be of a specially delightful character. Those who wish to see Leiden must do so independently of the official arrangements.

THE Rev. W. R. Shanks writes to commend a book "Pictures from Holland," published by the R.T.S. at 8s., and now to be had for 3s. at the larger book shops. It contains, he says, a well-written account of the general story of the Netherlands, a full description of the country, a map, and over a hundred engravings.

WE have received in pamphlet form the annual report of the National Education Association and the report of the annual meeting at which it was presented. The Association has done enormous work in its battle with the two Education Bills, and has laid all opponents of reaction under a deep debt of gratitude for its aid. That its fight has for the moment been unsuccessful by no means implies that the work has been wasted. The progressive forces throughout the country are now thoroughly alive to the gravity of the issues involved, and are possessed by the solemn determination to reverse the Government policy at the earliest opportunity, and to set our educational system once for all upon a sound and rational basis. This is due to no one cause more than to the efforts of the National Education Association, pioneered by its indefatigable secretary, Mr. A. J. Mundella. At the annual meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. Armstrong referred to Mr. Mundella as perhaps the greatest living authority on the progressive side of the education question, and readers of THE INQUIRER will be interested in the hearty expressions of appreciation of the work he has done for the cause by those taking part in the meeting, from Dr. Clifford downward.

THE GENTLE FOOT-PAD.

A HUMMING, not of bees and wayside insects, strikes upon the ear, and in a moment the motor flashes by, a thing of hot haste, burnished brass, and bad smell. It makes little of the hill that has compelled the cyclist to dismount and wheel his more modest piece of ironmongery—not altogether ungrateful, it may be, for the pause thus given to his exertions. The driver of a gig pulls his vehicle sharply into the hedgeside to avert a collision with the obstreperous car, and pulling out as sharply, all but demolishes the cyclist. Compliments are exchanged; all go upon their several ways with whole skins but ruffled tempers, and when the pedestrian looks back from the top of the hill, the road is empty, save for two youthful rustics, disporting themselves with a Tate sugar-box mounted on the wheels of a discarded perambulator.

Here, then, in divers forms, you may observe the manifestation of a deeply-rooted instinct—the passion for rapid motion. Grafted as it is in our nature, it is strange, and perhaps rather humiliating, to realise how few are the means and contrivances whereby we can gratify it. The horse (for the donkey, even when well whipped, can scarcely be called swift), the steam-engine, the cycle and the motor, make up the sum-total of the resources of which the proud man avails himself when he would outpace his humble brother who goes upon two legs. When we consider, too, what a very disagreeable thing is the last, and presumably the most perfect of these appliances, it is, perhaps, allowable to question whether it were worth going through so much to gain so little.

Haste and Petroleum!

For there is a price to be paid, heavy enough, good sooth, in mere gold and silver, but far heavier in the currency of ease and comfort. If the horse is a vain thing for safety, the cycle is a vainer, while the motor-car is vanitas vanitatum. Haste and petroleum benefit neither mind nor body; the bicycle is a poor thing across a ploughed field, and though a horse that knows his business will take you over the roughest part of Haddon Hill safely enough, he is never on all fours with the pedestrian when it comes to scaling the Langdale Pikes, quadruped though he be. Go to! a pair of boots, old but weather proof, and a stick that is come of a good tree, are the best aids to the best locomotion.

Happy and Independent afoot.

An easy mind and a cheerful spirit are his who goes his way on foot. Curis expeditis, he fares along, unscathed and unstopped, filled with that blissful sense of independence that marks the seasoned tramper. Lo! the cyclist kneels by the wayside before his machine; to judge by the muttered accents that escape his lips his mental attitude is inconsistent with the posture of adoration. And to think that a mere bramble-thorn should thus have put a period to his career! Slowly and sadly the horseman goes in search of a blacksmith; the near hind shoe is cast, and he won't be in at the death to-day. As for the motor, it is far beyond the ken of a foot passenger by this time, thrown, "with hideous ruin and combustion down," by its own driver, into the yawning ditch; or if not so thrown down held up by the policeman, a fate, if anything, even worse. When did a man's own pins play him such tricks? Their power is limited, it is true, for thirty-five miles in the day is enough for most men (save stockbrokers who walk for cups), but use them with discretion, and they will serve you honestly. Who talks of blistered heels and strained sinews? Marry, he who risks a fractured collar-bone and a broken neck. Let him cast that great lumbering beam from his own eye before he meddles with the trifling mote that may impede our vision.

Legs for Walking.

But why dwell long in argument over self-evident fact? Legs were given us whereon to walk; had Nature intended us to run upon wheels, she would have provided them, thus saving us the trouble of seeking out many and bootless inventions. No more, for there's an end of it. Let us put our best foot foremost, and perambulate.

There is walking for business, and walking for pleasure—both to be commended. With the former, however, we will make no long delay, merely remarking, as we go by, that a merry heart, such as that tramp-royal Autolycus bore beneath his jerkin, will help a man forward with great jollity even unto Bedford Row. Howbeit, the bridle-road and footpath lead to better things than the causeway, and the open hillside where no track runs at all makes the best going of any. Country-walking, then, for us.

Company or None.

Is it better to walk alone, or in company? No hard-and-fast rule can be laid down, and, indeed, our choice in the matter is only too often restricted by circumstances. For example, the schoolgirl, whose daily promenade is undertaken neither for business nor for pleasure, but for exercise solely, would probably choose to walk alone rather than as an item of the crocodile, but the facts and discipline of life forbid her to do so. On the other hand, a companion, even of the dullest, would be a great boon to an escaping convict from Siberia, but if he has neglected to provide himself with one, he must even get along as well as he can by himself. Let us trust, then, that we may be delivered from boredom at all times, whether self-inflicted, or endured at the hands of our neighbour, and that we may be permitted as often as possible to enjoy our own society or the society of others, just as we please. Perhaps most of us would agree with the poet, who wishes for a walk of a May morning--

> With one wise friend, or one
> Better than wise, being fair—

although enthusiastic trampers may object to the alternative suggested in the second line. For the daughters of Eve lay greater stress upon the atmospheric conditions than do we sons of Adam, and then they are apt to tire a good deal earlier in the day. However, for a morning stroll of eight or nine miles—child's play, my masters—such as the poet had in his mind, the fair companion certainly has claims to consideration. For an all-day tramp across country, with a tough climb up and a rough slide down, commend us to the man of wisdom who does not scorn to play the fool in season.

A Long Stretch,

"Good company makes the way seem shorter," says the Spaniard, or, at least, he is credited with that dictum by Izaak Walton. The authority is respectable, and the saying is certainly that of a slothful man who would rather ride a-donkey-back than wear shoe-leather. For who ever wished the way shorter that laced his boots of a morning for a thirty-mile round? Who ever regretted the leagues behind him that, footsore and cheerful, saw through the dusk the lighted windows of his harbour, and sniffed the chop frizzling on the gridiron against his return? Glad that he has no further to go, certainly; we cannot disregard the delights of achievement; but sorry that he has gone so far—never, not even at the worst, when after a long pilgrimage, performed neither wisely nor too well, he returns unable to eat, drink, or stand, fit for nothing but bed and blankets. Most of us have done it on occasion, but none of us ever wished the way shorter; on the contrary, in subsequent narratives we were only too ready to lengthen our journey very considerably, making our thirty-five miles fifty at the least.

Der alte Mechanicus.

Not that mileage is particularly creditable to anyone. and exaggeration such as that mentioned above is condemned of all honest men. There is a type of walker, iron-limbed, horn-hoofed, and wooden-handed, whose sole object is to cover the greatest possible distance in the least possible time, and to brag about it afterwards. For him, no slackening of pace when passing the spot where the wild raspberries grow, no halt to lean over a gate and watch the rabbits, no siesta in a heather-bush after the midday sandwich. Fifty miles of Roman road, flat as a board, and a pace of four miles an hour at a minimum are his requirements, and, as they do not interfere with ours, he is heartily welcome to them. But heaven forbid that such an one should take up his abode at the same inn as ourselves, for his conversation is to the full as remorseless as his walking.

Better than Some.

By all means then let us have a companion in our goings, having first made quite sure that we really want one. For those of us who are unhappily denied the society of human friends either wise or fair company may yet be found. There is no better comrade than a good dog—a fellow, be it understood, of gentlemanly instincts and upbringing—your rude, ungovernable animal, however well-meaning, being always a heart-breaking nuisance. But a dog of the right sort cannot be surpassed; he is invariably cheerful, willing and uncomplaining, and withal of excellent conversational powers. Indeed, his only fault is one for which we love him the better, he is apt to be just a little too humble, setting too cheap a value on himself, and never pretending to hide an erroneous belief that we are his betters.

Father Stick.

But should you be unable to keep a dog, as may well be the case in a land where the tax-collector and the Board of Agriculture reign supreme, you may still have your companion. Father Stick refuses his aid to no man, however poor, and though he cannot be said to speak, he is an admirable listener, and in himself a record of the tramps in which he has taken part. He needs no rest; he neither bores nor suffers boredom, he helps you up the steep, and cheerfully beats time to the song that you chant as you swing downhill, if it should happen that you are given to venting your feelings in that way. And there the cudgel proves his superiority to the animate companion; even a wise friend may not care for melody, while nine dogs out of ten hate it from the bottom of their hearts. But a stick has not the least objection to anything you may say or do, and therefore a good many of us prefer his society to that of all others. We may love an old coat, a pocket-knife (without which no wise man stirs abroad), even a pair of boots—but none of these things are cherished as the blackthorn, oak or ash, that has accompanied us in our tramps these many years. "I cut it in the classic woods of Hawthornden, when I did not expect always to have been a bachelor," was the Antiquary's epitaph on his lost walking-stick; the wood may be dead, but reminiscences pleasant and sad are green about it.

A Good Remembrancer.

Far away though you be from the haunts you love, take the stick in your hand, and you triumph over time and space. Once more you stand on the barren crown of Nephim, where the London pride grows among the stones; Lough Conn is spread out mapwise far below you to the east, and a tumble of black hills rolls westward to the Atlantic. You have just scrambled up the broken path that hangs above the fall of the Grey Mare's Tail as it leaps down the gorge to join the Moffatt water. Oakwood and fern and heather succeed each other upward, until at last Dunkerry Beacon looks over the vale of Porlock to where the Welsh hills show blue beyond the sea. As a matter of fact, you are safely and stuffily at home in London town, where trams and trains, and busses and bikes, and motors and monstrosities of all kinds do abound. But the stick reminds you that there are fairer scenes beyond the veil of smoke—scenes that you will revisit one of these days, with the light heart and contented spirit that are given to all honest fellows who are content to go forward upon Shanks his Mare.

ROBIN ROSCOE.

THE Garden City Pioneer Company has in view a site in Hertfordshire on which to establish the first Garden City. The purchase of about 4,000 acres is contemplated, and to enable negotiations to be completed a special fund is being raised. Of the £50,000 required for this purpose, over £40,000 have been speedily promised, and the prospectus of the Company may be expected before long, inviting investment on the part of the general public. Among the subscribers of the capital required, at the head of the list, are Mr. J. P. Thomasson, of Bolton, Mr. George Cadbury and family, Mr. Ralph Neville, K.C., Mr. H. W. Lever.

TO THE ROAD.

Cool is the wind, for the summer is waning,
Who's for the road?
Sun-flecked and soft, where the dead leaves are raining,
Who's for the road?
Knapsack and alpenstock press hand and shoulder,
Prick of the brier and roll of the boulder;
This be your lot till the season grow older.
Who's for the road?

Up and away in the hush of the morning,
Who's for the road?
Vagabond he, all conventions a-scorning,
Who's for the road?
Music of warblers so merrily singing,
Draughts from the rill from the roadside upspringing,
Nectar of grapes from the vines lowly swinging,
These on the road.

Now every house is a hut or a hovel,
Come to the road.
Mankind and moles in the dark love to grovel,
But to the road.
Throw off the loads that are bending you double;
Love is for life, only labour is trouble;
Truce to the town, whose best gift is a bubble.
Come to the road!

PAUL F. DUNBAR.
In the Christian Register.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Crediton.—At the Bowden Hill Chapel on Sunday last touching references were made to the devoted character of the late Mrs. William H. Gillard, who passed away on August 11th after a very long illness. Miss Stewart gave a most touching address on the subject of "Tears," which was received with true reverence by the congregation. In the evening the chapel was crowded. Some very beautiful white flowers adorned the reading-desk, which were given by Mr. Fred Elston. "Calvary" was sung by Mrs. J. Brickwood, of Plymouth, assisted by the choir. The services, both morning and evening, were very inspiring. Rev. Jeffery Worthington, B.A., of Cullompton, officiated at the funeral service on Monday, August 17th, when most of the congregation were present.

Liverpool (Hope-street).—After evening service on Sunday last an informal meeting of the members of the choir and friends, presided over by Mr. J. T. Bryson, took place, when the Rev. R. A. Armstrong presented on behalf of the choir a handsome flower vase and stand, a rose bowl and other glassware, to Mr. William Letcher and Miss E. A. Sparkes, who have been attached to the choir for a number of years and are about to be married. In making the presentation Mr. Armstrong offered his sincere congratulations and good wishes, to which both Miss Sparkes and Mr. Letcher responded.

London (Kentish Town). — During the vacation of the Rev. George Critchley, B.A., the services in the Free Christian Church on August 9 were conducted by the hon. secretary, Mr. A. Savage Cooper, who in the morning read a discourse of Dr. Channing on the paramount importance of a good education. On the 16th and 23rd the late hon. sec., Mr. Armytage Bakewell, conducted the services, reading sermons of Dr. Ecob of Philadelphia, on "Physical and Spiritual Health," and the Rev. Frank Walters on "The Courage of Youth," and giving discourses upon "Our Spiritual Blindness" and upon "Love," alluding to the great example of Lord Salisbury in his practical love of duty. This church, which has often been closed in August during the vacation of the minister, was thus kept open to the satisfaction of the members.

MICROSCOPES, second-hand, excellent condition, from one-third original cost. Slides, great variety, best makers, from 3s. per doz. Write for particulars, THE NEW AGE PRESS, 8, John-street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

Sweet as a Rose, where "Sanitas" goes.

"SANITAS."
BEST OF ALL
DISINFECTANTS,
AND THE ONLY ONE FIT FOR DOMESTIC USE.

"SANITAS."
FRAGRANT, NON-POISONOUS,
CLEAN AND NATURAL.

"SANITAS."
1/- Pint Bottles and 1/- Tins, Powder.
3d. Bars Soap.
Of all Chemists and Stores.

"HOW TO DISINFECT" BOOK FREE.
"Sanitas" Co., Ltd., Bethnal Green, London, E.

Contractors to H.M. Government.

HOLBECK, LEEDS.—Domestic-street Unitarian Church. Pulpit vacant. Applications invited.—Apply to the Secretary, GEO. A. REASON, Daisy-hill, Rawdon, Leeds.

ADVERTISER seeks mutual help in a scheme (self-supporting) of Rational Teaching and Living.—Address, E. OWEN, c/o 8, Manor-road, Fratton-road, Portsmouth.

THE 15TH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND THE S.E. COUNTIES will be held at Highgate on October 14th next, and, in accordance with By-Law 15, "Any member wishing to bring forward a resolution at the Annual Meeting should send me written notice of the resolution at least one month before such Annual Meeting."

FREDERIC ALLEN, Hon. Sec.
5, Holland-grove, N. Brixton, S.W.,
August 26th, 1903.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOINSON, Pier-street.

BIRTH.

HILDER.—On the 17th August, at Pisgah House, Broomhill, Sheffield, the wife of Edward Charles Hilder, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

HALL—SUDBERY.—On Thursday, August 20th, 1903, at Unity Church, Wood Green, by Rev. J. S. Mummery, Ph.D., Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., of Norwich, to Amy Mary, eldest daughter of Mr. John Sudbery, 25, Portland-road, Finsbury-park. No cards.

COHEN—COBB.—On the 18th Aug., at Highgate, by the Rev. Isidore Harris, M.A., Walter Samuel Cohen, of the Land Settlement Department, Orange River Colony, son of the late Lionel Louis Cohen, to Lucy Margaret, daughter of Henry Peyton Cobb, of Wealdstone House, Harrow Weald.

SILVER WEDDING.

HARWOOD—HOLT.—On the 28th Aug., 1878, at the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool, by the Rev. John Hamilton Thom, the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., Minister of the Chapel, to Agnes, fourth daughter of the late William Holt, of Liverpool.

DEATHS]

COLLIER.—On the 20th Aug., at 45, Sussex-square, Brighton, Henry Collier, of Walthamstow, Essex, aged 84.

WELLBELOVED.—On the 24th Aug., at Birkdale, Southport, Rev. Charles Henry Wellbeloved.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, August 30.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton. Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M.

Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Z. TOYOSAKI.

Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M and 7 P.M., Rev. F. W. STANLEY.

Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.

Deptford, Church-street, 11.15 A.M. and 6.30, Rev. A. J. MARCHANT,

Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M., Rev. GORDON COOPER, B.A.

Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.

Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. R. H. U. BLOOR.

Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. PRIESTLEY PRIME.

Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M., Mr. G. G. ARMSTRONG; and 7 P.M., Rev. R. H. GREAVES.

Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street.—Church closed during August.

Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.

Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.

Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.

Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7.0 P.M., Rev. FREDERIC ALLEN.

Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Rev. JOHN ELLIS.

Peckham, Avondale-rad, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. G. CARTER.

Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.

Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M. Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY.

Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. ERNEST AMES.

Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M. Evening service suspended until Sept. 13th.

Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M., Mr. A. PHARAOH, and 6.30 P.M., Mr. J. C. PAIN.

Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, East-hill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Dr. MUMMERY.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel. Closed till Sept. 6.

BEDFORD, Library (side room), 11.15 A.M., Rev ROWLAND HILL.

BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.

BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Church, The Hall, Lytham-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. M. DARE.

BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. H. ROSE.

BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET.

CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., Rev. J. REMINGTON WILSON, M.A.

DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.

GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Mr. E. WILKES SMITH.

HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. J. MARTEN.

LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. F. HEMING VAUGHAN, B.A.

LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. FISHER SHORT.

LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 A.M. Rev. W. L. TUCKER, M.A. No evening service.

LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. RUDOLF DAVIS, B.A.

OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. SAMUEL ELIOT, D.D., of Boston, U.S.A.

PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.

PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 11 A.M., 6.45 P.M., 3.15 P.M., P.S.A., Rev. J. A. BRINKWORTH, of Saffron Walden.

SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M., Anniversary Services, Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS.

SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.

SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.

SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church Tyler-street, 7 P.M.

TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

WINDERMERE, Albert Hall, Cross-street, 11 A.M., Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.

WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M., Rev. J. PARK DAVIES, B.A.

COLWYN BAY, North Wales, Public Hall, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. J. WRIGHT.

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH,

SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F. Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS.

NUT FOODS.

The following Nut Foods are specially suited for the hot season :—

Banana and Nut Food, 7d., 1/-, and 1/4 per Tin. A new delicious food made from ripe fresh Bananas and Nuts. Can be sliced for sandwiches, or used as cheese.

Almond Cream, 3½d., 1/-, and 1/10 per Tin. Unrivalled as an accompaniment for fresh or stewed fruit.

Malted Nuts, 2d., 6½d., and 1/- per tin. Promotes digestion of all cereal food.

Full descriptive Price List from the Manufacturer :

HUGH MAPLETON,
COLONIAL HOUSE, ARDWICK GREEN, MANCHESTER.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses. —For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

Reckitt's
PARIS BLUE.
THE BEST IS THE CHEAPEST.

Schools, etc.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN,
NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON
(Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

WAVERLEY SCHOOL, 24, HAMILTON ROAD, SHERWOOD RISE, NOTTINGHAM.

PREPARATORY TO THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
HEAD MASTER, Mr. H. T. FACON, B.A.(Lond.).
Next Term begins Wednesday, September 16th.
Prospectus on application. BOARDERS received. Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, Essex House, Campden-hill, W.

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
14 & 15, SOUTH MARINE TERRACE,
ABERYSTWYTH.

PRINCIPAL ... MRS. MARLES-THOMAS.

This School is splendidly situated in one of the healthiest parts of Wales, overlooking Cardigan Bay, and close to excellent golf links. Pupils have passed the London and Welsh Matriculation; Cambridge Higher Local; Senior and Junior Cambridge Locals, besides the usual Theoretical and Practical Music Examinations. Scholarships have also been obtained at the Welsh University Colleges.

Gymnasium, Swimming, and excellent Hockey Club.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, BISHOP'S STORTFORD.
Head Mistress, Miss ESTHER CASE, Certificated Student of Girton College, Cambridge, Classical Tripos.
Next Term begins on September 17th.

VACANCY for one Boarder, not under 12, in September. A high percentage with Public Examinations has been gained. In July eight pupils passed R.A.M. and R.C. Associated Boards (Local Schools), one aged 14 gaining distinction in Higher Division. Music or Art can be made a specialty. Excellent references.—PRINCIPALS, Bestreben High School for Girls, Brondesbury, N.W.

Situations, etc.

YOUNG LADY seeks post as GOVERNESS in school or family. English, Junior. Piano. Good violin.—Address, X. L., INQUIRER Office.

LADY (Unitarian, Homeless) seeks post of trust. Housekeeper (where servant), Nursery Governess, Companion, or Lady Help. Would travel. Excellent testimonials. NEWTON, Bryn Felin House, Uplands, Swansea.

RE-ENGAGEMENT required by middle-aged Widow, as Nurse Attendant to lady or gentleman, or entire charge of infant from birth; or offer of good home for either.—Write or apply, Nurse WINTER, 4, Cemetery-road, Mill-road, Deal.

TYPIST required for small General Copying Office. Must be well educated, and do clean, correct work; also a PUPIL to prepare for vacancy.—Write fullest particulars to Miss A. BECKS, 50, Rupert-street, Shaftesbury-avenue, W.

EXPERIENCED GOVERNESS seeks daily (any district) or resident engagement. Advanced subjects; fluent French and German; Italian; music, singing, drawing, painting. Eight years' reference. — G., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, W.C.

THOROUGH PARLOURMAID wanted, for Kent. Capable and experienced, with first-rate references. Good wages to competent servant.—Apply by letter in first instance to Mrs. RUSSELL SCOTT, Darent Hulme, Shoreham, near Sevenoaks.

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS
By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
DAILY MEDITATIONS
(Fourth Edition Revised.)
NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.
Cloth, red edges, 6d.; roan gilt, 1s.
PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.
Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

Board and Residence.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged. — Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

BOURNEMOUTH. — ARNEWOOD. En Pension. Grand position in West Cliff-road; sea views; South aspect; close to Winter Gardens, Promenade, and Pier.—Apply, MANAGERESS.

BOURNEMOUTH. — Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH, DEVONSHIRE.

A HOLIDAY RESORT FOR YOUNG LADIES OR SCHOOL-GIRLS, WITH OR WITHOUT CHAPERON.

Charming little Devonshire town. Perfect Sanitation. Sea and Moorland. Bracing air. Walks, excursions, picnics, splendid bathing. Main line G.W.R.

Terms and other particulars from THE PROPRIETOR.

BOARDING HOUSE.—THE FELL, TROUTBECK, WINDERMERE, is situated 550 feet above sea-level, and about 2½ miles from the station at Windermere. Every home comfort.

LAKE DISTRICT.—A comfortably furnished House, 3 miles from Windermere Station.—B., INQUIRER Office.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS. — The address of the Rev. H. RAWLINGS is now Peel-street, Denton, near Manchester.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK
Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS
2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
2½% repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES
Purchased and sold for customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

International Council OF Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers.

MEETINGS

. . AT . .

AMSTERDAM

September 1—4.

A SPECIAL REPORT

OF THE PROCEEDINGS

will appear in the . . .

Inquirer of Sept. 5 & 12.

ORDER EXTRA COPIES EARLY.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.
Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17 Mincing-lane, E.C.
Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.
F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.
Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.
STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

FREDK. LONG & SON,
AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,
4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, August 29, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3193. NEW SERIES, No. 297.] LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 585
ARTICLES—
Public Worship 588
Show Places 589
Churchmen and War 586
LITERATURE—
Egypt and Babylon 587
The Bible for the Practical Man 588
LEADER—
At Amsterdam 592
AMSTERDAM MEETINGS:
Chronicle of the Week 592
Presidential Address 595
Council Sermon 596
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 591
OBITUARY—
Rev. James Hall 590
Mr. James Trench 590
Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved 590
CORRESPONDENCE—
A Word of Thanks 586
Popular Services 595
POETRY—
The Humming Bee 589
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 598
ADVERTISEMENTS 599

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE publish this week the first part of a full record of the International Council meeting at Amsterdam, and also the address of the President, Professor Oort, and the sermon preached in the Old Walloon Church on the eve of the Council meeting, by the Rev. J. van Loenen Martinet.

NEXT week we shall complete the record, and intend to publish the papers by the Rev. S. A. Eliot, D.D., President of the American Unitarian Associations, and the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and in the following week (Sept. 19) the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's paper, and perhaps some others. A volume of the whole proceedings is to be subsequently issued in Holland.

THE twenty-sixth report of the Hibbert Trustees is naturally concerned chiefly with the remarkable success of the quarterly "Journal," which they have allowed to assume the name of the founder of their trust. In addition to the name, the Trustees have endowed the new venture with a substantial annual subsidy from the Case Fund for a term of five years. It is gratifying indeed to know that the first three numbers of the "Hibbert Journal" have had a total sale of more than 10,000 copies, and that there is confident hope that this sale may be maintained or even increased.

DURING the two years covered by the report, the Trustees elected one scholar, Mr. J. Ewart, of Manchester College, Oxford; and two exhibitioners, Miss G. von Petzold, of Manchester College, and the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, of Swansea, who hold their exhibitions for the purpose of studying at Berlin and Jena respectively. The Rev. Philemon Moore, in receipt two years ago of a grant for the study of Semitic languages and literature at the University of Strasburg, was subsequently elected a Fellow, his Fellowship terminating last June. With a view to the promotion of original research in Early Christian Literature, the Trustees have made two grants of £40 each to the Rev. Kirsopp Lake, of Oxford, to assist in the expense of two journeys to the Monasteries of Macedonia. They have also made various grants of books.

THE Sugar Convention came into force on Tuesday, and henceforth sugar artificially cheapened by the export bounties of foreign countries will be refused admission at our ports. Every sugar exporting country but Russia, Denmark, and Argentina has agreed, at our instigation, to offer us no more presents of this character, and the result is that henceforth we shall pay substantially more for our sugar and articles manufactured from sugar than has hitherto been the case. The bounty system is undoubtedly pernicious in those countries where it is practised, but to countries which are importers only and not producers of the articles affected it brings nothing but good, and an attempt to prevent it has exactly the same effect economically as the imposition of protective duties.

For the sake of a few sugar growers in the West Indies, who would be much more profitably employed growing fruit, we have partly cajoled and partly coerced other countries into withholding from the millions in these islands, to whom the boon means so much, the advantage of buying cheap a staple article of diet. In theory our Government is not yet committed to the principle of protection: in practice it has put the principle into operation with regard to one of the most important manufacturing interests of the country. Will it be allowed to extend the principle next year? The Argyllshire election, won by a member of one of our best known Unitarian families, seems to suggest that it will not.

THE King has once more resumed the rôle which he plays so well, of special ambassador of his countrymen among our Continental neighbours. Vienna is traditionally friendly to this country, especially since it became the seat of an autonomous government on the English model. Of Buda Pesth this is true to an even greater degree, and it may well be hoped that this ambassadorial trip to the Austrian capital may have its counterpart in the Hungarian, when the home politics of that wonderful city shall have reached calmer waters than is at present the case.

ENGLISHMEN must always feel a peculiar veneration for King Edward's aged host, for the manner in which, in direct opposition to the example of his predecessors, he has planted and tended the system of parliamentary government in his dual kingdom. It might be contended that he had in the beginning no choice in the matter, but time and again in later years the race feuds of his heterogeneous subjects have given him the opportunity, had he chosen to take it, of permanently resuming autocratic sway. When he is gone it is improbable that the Austrian Empire will survive unless as a single autocracy. The continuance of democracy, which all must hope for, must then mean disintegration, for Franz Josef is the only discoverable centripetal force within that polyglot realm.

MEANWHILE, a good understanding between Great Britain and Austria-Hungary must be of peculiar value in the rapidly intensifying crisis in near Eastern affairs. Austria is too sensible of the dangers of increased Russian influence in the Balkans to look with enthusiasm on any organic political changes there. But changes are growing inevitable, nevertheless, and if British influence be thrown, as it should be, on the side of the establishment of a régime which shall destroy the possibility of further Turkish misrule, our happy relations with the Austrian Government should go far to secure the realisation of our aims. Would that there were any signs that our invertebrate Prime Minister had any intention of bringing any pressure to bear anywhere for anything!

THE report of the Royal Commission on the conduct of the war, with the three volumes of evidence which accompany it, affords melancholy confirmation of many of the charges brought against those responsible for the conduct of affairs in that fateful summer and autumn of 1899. Into the details of our military inefficiency, this is not the place to go. We are concerned rather with the diplomacy which, while carrying on negotiations that never ought to had led to war, made military preparations just sufficient to convince our opponents that war was intended, but entirely inadequate to the maintenance of our position when war actually came.

THE outlook in South Africa is darkening steadily. Sir Gordon Sprigg is no longer able to maintain an unstable majority in the Cape Legislature by his middle course between the policy of the Ascendancy party and the demands of the British and Dutch Africanders. Supplies have been refused, and instead of resigning in favour of an Africander Government, he has advised a prorogation till the pending date of expiration of the natural life of the present Parliament and a dissolution. This means that supplies will once more have to be obtained without Parliamentary sanction. It means also that the next elections must be held on a register attenuated by wholesale disfranchisements, alleged by the Africanders to extend far beyond the lists of actual rebels. A Parliament so elected, should it return an Ascendancy majority, will not command the allegiance of the Africanders, and Cape Colony must once more cease to enjoy self-government in fact if not in name. Meanwhile, Johannesburg is under the heel of the capitalist, and disaffection is widespread among the poverty-stricken Boers on the veldt, who believe—with very good reason, to judge by Miss Hobhouse's startling letters published in the Manchester Guardian and the Daily News—that the promises of compensation for homes destroyed and goods commandeered during the war are being deliberately broken.

Apropos of recent articles in THE INQUIRER on Assisi and M. Sabatier's appeal for the poor of that town, a correspondent, a member of the C.O.S., sends us the following lines, translated by D. G. Rossetti from a longer poem attributed to St. Francis. They may not be generally known, and suggest most beautifully the spirit of the higher charity which is too often forgotten:—

CANTICA.

Our Lord Christ: of Order.

Set Love in order, thou that lovest ME.
Never was virtue out of order found;
And though I fill thy heart desirously,
By my own virtue I must keep my ground;
When to my love thou dost bring Charity,
Even she must come with order girt and gown'd,
Look how the trees are bound
To order bearing fruit;
And one by one compute
In all things earthly order's grace or gain.

All earthly things I had the making of
Were numbered and were measured then by ME.
And each was ordered to its end by Love,
Each kept thro' order clean for ministry.
Charity, most of all, when known enough,
Is of her very nature orderly.
Lo, now! what heat in thee,
Soul, can have bred this rout?
Thou putt'st all order out.
Even this love's heat must be its curb and rein.

WE never know a great character until something congenial to it has grown up within ourselves. W. E. Channing.

IT is not only to those whose spiritual windows are of the same shape as yours that you are neighbour.

George Macdonald.

A WORD OF THANKS.

SIR,—I wish to ask for a little space in your paper in which to place an expression of sincere and hearty thanks for the innumerable kindnesses which Mrs. Crooker and I have received during our visit to the British Isles. It was some fifteen weeks ago that we landed at Liverpool. We were at once met by the president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Rev. Richard A. Armstrong, who gave us a most cordial greeting. He and his people made us forget that we were in a foreign land and far from home. The congregation at Hope-street Church, where I had the honour to preach, were as friendly as though I had long been their honoured minister. Everywhere at the Whitsuntide anniversaries in London, we found ourselves the recipients of the most generous hospitality and the warmest appreciation. What began there has continued to the present moment—congregations eager to listen to all that we have had to say; beautiful homes opened to us everywhere with unbounded cordiality; wherever we have gone friends to give us every possible attention. We have, indeed, been made to feel that we were living in the household of a common faith, where young and old were constantly striving in gracious rivalry to make our ways veritable paths of pleasantness. Our overflowing sense of gratitude prompts us to name the many kind friends who have honoured us by their thoughtful services, but the list would be so long that it would overburden your columns. So that I will simply ask that everyone accept these words as a special expression of thanks from us personally, and also from us as representatives of the American Unitarian Association.

In these weeks that have seemed so short, for they have been so enjoyable, we have been guests in nearly fifty homes in England, Ireland, and Scotland; and we have come to feel thoroughly domesticated. We have together occupied sixteen pulpits and spoken in all over fifty times! For these opportunities we gladly give thanks to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, whose kind and efficient services to us have been constant; a man of superb qualities of leadership, of whom the Unitarians of Great Britain and Ireland may well be proud. In our journeyings we have seen many interesting things, both old and new, but the most interesting have been the Unitarian churches. We shall carry away many pleasant memories, but best of all for our own work are the valuable lessons that we have learned. What has impressed us most deeply has been the loyalty and earnestness of these Unitarian congregations, and the untiring devotion and the noble public services of their ministers. You are certainly working much harder here than we are in America.

And now, as we bid farewell to the many friends who have done so much for us, let me assure you that our grateful appreciation is beyond expression. But allow me, in behalf of Mrs. Crooker and myself, to extend our best wishes to you all with the urgent invitation that you come some day to us in America.—Most truly,

JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER.

London, September 1, 1903.

CHURCHMEN AND WAR.

IN the promotion of the following petition, the Rev. W. F. Cobb is acting as secretary, and members of the Church of England are invited to address postcards to him at St. Ethelburga's Church, Bishopsgate-street, E.C., authorising him to add their signatures to the petition:—

A Petition to the Archbishops and Bishops of the Provinces of Canterbury and York.

We, the undersigned, desire, as faithful ministers, or members of the Church of England, to approach your lordships in connection with a subject which is not only of grave importance in itself, but seems to call for special notice from the Church at the present moment. We refer to the relation of the Christian religion to war.

We remember that the Encyclical Letter of the Lambeth Conference of 1897 contained the following declaration:—

"There can be no question that the influence of the Christian Church can do more for this [peace] than any other that can be named. Without denying that there are just wars, and that we cannot prevent their recurrence entirely, yet we are convinced that there are other and better ways of settling the quarrels of nations than by fighting. War is a horrible evil, followed usually by consequences worse than itself. Arbitration in place of war saves the honour of the nations concerned, and yet determines the question at issue with completeness. War brutalises even while it gives opportunities for the finest heroism. Arbitration leaves behind it a generous sense of passions restrained and justice sought for. The Church of Christ can never have any doubt for which of the two means of determining national quarrels it ought to strive."

In view of the above declaration we would humbly ask your lordships to give it practical effect by urging the clergy to press upon their flocks, as occasion requires, and specially on the Sunday before Christmas Day—the day which commemorates the birth of the Prince of Peace—the solemn duty laid upon Christian nations to live peaceably with each other. We cannot but believe that the united prayer which would follow such a general statement of our Christian principles would bring a rich blessing from the Father on our beloved Church.

W. BARKER, M.A., Rector of Marylebone.
W. F. COBB, D.D., Rector of St. Ethelburga's.
E. L. HICKS, M.A., Canon of Manchester and formerly Fellow of C.C.C.
H. SCOTT HOLLAND, M.A., Canon of St. Paul's.
G. W. KITCHIN, D.D., F.S.A., Dean of Durham.
R. S. DE C. LAFFAN, M.A., Rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook.
A. B. O. WILBERFORCE, M.A., Archdeacon of Westminster.

IN matters spiritual an element of infinity must be present; notions enter which cannot be defined; men may use the same words in stating their views, but whether these words convey the same conceptions to them all, no one can possibly say. In things spiritual, therefore, no one answer completely excludes all other answers, because we never get a perfect solution at all; we only get approximations.—Henry Latham.

Do not think that self-reverence and self-conquest will make you weak or sad; nay, the suppression of evil will be to you a forceful spring of good. Religion is no haggard or stern monitress waving you from enjoyment; she is a strong angel leading you to noble joy. The Bible is not a book of repressions and prohibitions; it is a book of kindling inspiration.—F. W. Farrar.

EGYPT AND BABYLON.

SAYCE ON ANCIENT CONCEPTIONS OF THE DIVINE.*

"THE Religions of Ancient Egypt and Babylonia" is the title under which Professor Sayce issues his Gifford Lectures on the ancient Egyptian and Babylonian conceptions of the Divine. The volume contains twenty lectures, the first ten being devoted to Egypt, and the second ten to Babylonia. Here are the fruits of long and laborious years. In the cuneiform texts, Professor Sayce, as everyone knows, was an early and brilliant pioneer, and on many points in the latter half of his volume he can only repeat with additional confirmations the views put forward tentatively in the Hibbert Lectures, which served sixteen years ago as a base for so much further research. His winter sojourns in Egypt have displayed to his singularly active and fertile mind the entire panorama of religions in temple and tomb beside the Nile. Many a delightful touch of personal observation vivifies these pages. In the background are broad conceptions of religious development; here and there an incidental caution is wisely uttered against crude inferences, as in the matter of "eating" the gods; and on thorny subjects there is a happy absence of the bitter polemical tone which disfigures so much of German discussion. The theories of the "Golden Bough," for example, about Osiris or the Sakæa simply fall to the ground in the light of the historical facts.

A Strange Omission.

And yet it must be said, with a certain sense of disappointment where so much is given, that the volume leaves the student unsatisfied. At least, it does not fulfil the expectations which its title holds out. Professor Sayce warns his readers that he is not going to treat his subject historically. We do not, therefore, look for a delineation of the rise and fall of particular cults, though many interesting glimpses of these incidents are proffered. Nor are we surprised that he does not display the later phases, for instance, of the Osirian faith when it begins to propagate its ideas in the days of the Roman Empire, or, per contra, exhibit the scepticism which came over many minds concerning the whole subject of a future life. These are episodes which may naturally be ignored. The defect of the book for the general student is that the main theme, the "conception of the divine," never comes sufficiently clearly into view. Every reader of the Hibbert Lectures of the late Sir Le Page Renouf, remembers the remarkable discussion of the Egyptian term for God (nuter). The theme is passed over by his successor with a single reference, p. 127; and of the corresponding Mesopotamian term ilu, there is not a word. What were its connections, what its meaning? Why could the ancient Babylonians form a feminine abstract word for deity, which their Hebrew cousins in Canaan never devised? Much is said, and rightly, about the ka and the ba, the zi and the lil, and their relations to the earlier animistic interpretations of human nature. But of the light which language throws on the higher faith no glimpses are vouchsafed to us.

Significant Affinities.

We are disposed to lay some stress on this, because Professor Sayce again and again shows himself fully alive to the philosophical interest of the inner problems of the Egyptian religion. That religion, he tells us, owed many of its leading figures to Babylonia. Not only were deities like Ptah and Hathor (=Istar) of Mesopotamian orgin; even Osiris (Asar) is now identified with Asari, son of Ea, "the prince who does good to man" (pp. 164, 300, 325). Of the return process, by which the Egyptian Horus became Khar and Khur in Babylonia, or Anubis reappears as Anupu, we must not stop to speak (cf. p. 79). These affinities and connections are of the greatest historical significance; there must have been close intercourse to make such interchanges of divine forms possible. But behind them are ulterior questions belonging to the main subject of the book which are constantly approached, but never adequately discussed. Every student knows the tendency in Mesopotamian theology to group the gods in sets of three, such as Anu, Bel, and Ea, corresponding to three great divisions of the universe, or Istar (the evening star), Sin (the moon), and Samas (the sun).

Unified Trinities.

Such triads also present themselves in Egyptian theology, but they are bound much more closely together. Their origin in Mesopotamia seems due to various causes, among which the amalgamation of the cults of separate sanctuaries must be credited with a leading share. The historic prominence of ancient centres of worship is alleged by Professor Sayce, (p. 336), as the chief reason which prevented the rise of anything like positive monotheism in Babylonia. Not even Assur, reigning without a consort in solitary glory, nor Marduk, with whom the god of the Babylonian pantheon might be in turn identified, ever became a true centre of unity. But similar processes went on in Egypt, yet with different results. This can hardly be set down simply to diversities of political situation under which ancient rivalries lost their power. New metaphysical questions present themselves. Profound philosophical ideas appear in the texts at a very early date, implying reflection concerning the relation of the One and the Many, and the persistence of the same divine energy through various forms. Here, too, are groups of three, and they are united in a peculiar way by ideas of generation. That idea, is not, of course, wanting in Babylonian theology. But it occurs in Egypt under the figure of a perpetual process in a manner unknown in Mesopotamia. A formula on the sarcophagus of Seti I. (14th cent. B.C.), runs thus: "I am a Son proceeding from his Father; I am a Father proceeding from his Son." The physical basis of such conceptions may be seen in the relations of Tum, Ra, and Harmakhis—different forms of the sun-god—which Professor Sayce does not hesitate to describe as constituting a "trinity" of "three persons in one God" (p. 89).

Unexplained Developments.

But the higher theology tended to become more abstract. This is apparent even in the famous Pyramid texts made known by the genius of Maspero; and we cannot help regretting that Professor Sayce did not think it worth while to expound more carefully a philosophical mode of thought to the influence of which on Christian theology he again and again refers. The long and impressive passage quoted from Maspero (pp. 244–6) sums up a movement which raises the Egyptian "conception of the divine" far above the Mesopotamian. The more clearly their common historical roots are displayed, the more interesting does the higher development beside the Nile become: What were its causes? For a fuller treatment of this topic the literary discussions (part I., viii., part II., vii., viii.) might have made way: interesting as they are, the materials can easily be found elsewhere. The student of ideas wants to know how far there is any definite evidence of modes of thought which may have suggested to Origen, for instance, his well-known conception of the "eternal generation" of the Son.

Some Curious Mistakes.

If Egyptian theology is important in the general history of religion for its bearing on Christian thought, Mesopotamian religion is significant for the study of the early faith of Israel. The second part of this book is full of illustrations more familiar to the student than to the general reader, who finds here points of contact in temple and ritual, festivals and tithe, the great bronze sea, or the worshipper's gift (qorban), which will make his Old Testament speak to him afresh. But Professor Sayce ought really sometimes to consult his Revised Version. That would save him from talking any more about the "scape-goat," or actually calling it Azazel, as in the strange sentence (p. 467): "The gazelle, indeed, is named, but it is a scape-goat which is driven into the desert like the Hebrew Azazel." Moreover, if he occasionally referred to the original, he would learn that "Lord of hosts" is not a title of Yahweh (p. 487), and in that respect Yahweh cannot be compared with the Babylonian moon-god.

The Origin of "Yahweh."

As to the occurrence of the Hebrew divine name in the cuneiform texts, experts, as is well known, take different views. Professor Sayce mentions with just pride that he was the first to point out its presence in composition (Yahum-ilu = Joel) in a document in the age of Hammurabi, and he leans to Hommel's identification of it with a title of the Babylonian moon-god (p. 484). Zimmern, on the other hand, affirms (Schrader's Keilinschriften, 3rd edition, 1903, p. 468) that the elements supposed to represent the divine name in these texts occur elsewhere without the determinative of deity, and may be explained adjectivally or verbally. In other cases the name

* "The Religions of Ancient Egypt and Babylonia: The Ancient Egyptian and Babylonian Conception of the Divine." By A. H. Sayce, M.A., LL.D., Professor of Assyriology in the University of Oxford. (T. & T. Clark. 8s. net.)

Yahweh, he adds, is a foreign designation, and cannot be derived from Babylonian sources. If Professor Sayce and Hommel are correct, the theory favoured by Tiele and other scholars which ascribed the sacred name to a Kenite source, no doubt falls to the ground. But what also becomes of a much older view, the supposed Mosaic record of its supernatural revelation?

Other Exceptionable Statements.

One might take exception to some other remarks, such as that the "ideas" of Plato were the last development of the Egyptian doctrine of the Ka, which seems to imply that there was a positive genetic connection between them; or that "the 'Parables of Buddhagosha' (misprinted for Buddhaghosa) have had a wider influence than all the other volumes of the Buddist Canon"—no work of that name is known, we believe, in ancient Buddhist history; the Canon was closed hundreds of years before Buddhaghosa wrote his commentaries in the fifth century of our era; and the Jātaka stories comprised in his commentary on the Dhamma-pada, to which Professor Sayce probably refers, can hardly be said to outbalance in importance the whole of the great collections of Buddhist teaching and rule. These are trifles in the midst of the wide learning and the constructive skill which pervade this volume. Is it too much to hope that this devoted and indefatigable scholar may give us a further instalment of selected translations, bearing especially on those philosophical ideas in which he sees some of the antecedents of early Christian theology?

J. E. C.

BIBLE FOR THE PRACTICAL MAN.*

THE worst enemy of the Rev. J. Haydn Williams will never deny his courage; his severest critic will be constrained to allow him the possession of a certain shrewdness and natural ability. Add to these years of study and experience, and we shall be inclined favourably to consider a book sent forth not to make profit but to do good.

It consists of extracts from most of the books of the Bible, arranged not with any reference to the subjects treated, or the date of the writers, but simply in the order of the books as they are placed in the common editions of the Bible. That one can open the book almost at random and find a piece worth reading might almost be taken for granted. The reader will sometimes be newly struck with the abundance of wise and worthy sayings that can thus be culled from Israel's prophets and sages.

But it is impossible to notice the book without hoping that its readers may find it less than satisfactory. For what practical man is he who shall be satisfied with a few magnificent sayings out of Job, but no plot of the story, no connected argument, no drama either in heaven or earth? What man is he who has not time to read of St. Paul, but snatches time enough to read the book of Esther in considerable detail, while he passes over the whole book of Daniel with the exception of two short verses?

We do not deny that this selection abounds with good reading. But as he would know more of Shakespeare who should read one single play with some sensible annotations (say Julius Cæsar, edited by Verity) than he who should learn "Dodd's Beauties" off by heart; so the practical man who cannot afford time to read the whole Bible, had better read some one part of it thoroughly, than content himself with fragmentary utterances. It is not, however, always a question of what people had better do; it remains to ask what they will do. There may, for aught we know, be practical men who prefers their Bible readings in this form.

THE HUMMING BEE.

CHIEF of summer sounds, tiny trump of doom,
Chasing low spirits to the realms of gloom,
With thy first welcome dash through the glad air,
All mortal things a common glory share.
At thy one low swift organ note, the flowers
Thrill to their depths and bask in honeyed hours;
With thee come all delights and hearts are stirred,
Opening their treasures at thy mystic word.
Nought is as late it was, but all we greet—
The buzz of cries and voices now is sweet,
Noises transfigured into happy sounds,
Passing through summer's shining spacious bounds.
Sweet summer sounds akin to silence, trees
Tinkling their leaves for the playful prattling breeze,
The lazy chirp of birds, the call of kine—
Bubbles of sound from life's heart gladening wine.
Thou wakenest with thy comfortable hum
A thousand, thousand happy thoughts that come
And go like thee, with honey-weighted wings,
Yet may not loiter long 'midst sweetest things.
Ah! well for us in our life's garden fair,
That so our thoughts flit lightly everywhere,
And lost a moment in each past event,
Emerge with sweetness—busy and content.

E. L. H. THOMAS.

WE are not Puritan enough. We excuse when we ought to reproach ourselves. Are we waiting for God to bring into judgment our compromises and conformities and insincerities—waiting for the refiner's fire and for the fuller's soap, bowing the head like a bulrush, instead of breaking every yoke? only sorry enough for our sins to confess, but not sorry enough to forsake them?—Rufus Ellis.

GOD is the principle which underlies all this business of human living. The methods of living are manifold. The principle of life is one. The man who lives in the methods loses the freedom and the unity of life. The man who lives in the principle, in loving, grateful, obedient communion with God, grows free with a divine liberty, and is a true brother of all the working children of God throughout the ages and throughout the world.—Phillips Brooks.

PUBLIC WORSHIP.

TRUE AND FALSE IDEALS OF ITS MEANING AND END.*

BY THE REV. J. H. CROOKER, D.D.

MODERN worship in its best estate, stripped of fear and selfishness, the parents of superstition, is not sacrificial offering nor intercessory pleading, but the glad, spontaneous outpouring of human hearts in expression of thanks and in yearning for communion with God. It is not a transgressor's plea for acquittal at a distant throne, but the personal and domestic gratitude of a child in the divine family of God, the devout aspiration to be at peace with the paternal Love and share in the blessings of the Father's house.

In acting as the leader of congregational worship, the minister of to-day is in no sense engaged in a vicarious, mediatorial, or intercessory office. He does not perform worship as the substitute of his people; he is their helper in their devotions. And these devotions are not the efforts of fear to appease the wrath of Heaven; they are the spontaneous expressions of affection. He does not stand between God and men, distributing the divine favours to those who do his bidding; he gives expression to common hopes and trusts, that are the natural gestures of love and gratitude and humility. He does not act as general attorney for a lot of criminals who are seeking royal clemency; he is the public interpreter of private feelings, uttering in fit phrase the great emotions that throng the silences of the breasts of devout men and women.

The First Essentials.

A man may stand in the pulpit; and yet he may not really lead the worship of the people before him. He can do this only as he is himself an actual worshipper. He must even be more than worshipful: the reverence, trust, and yearning to which he gives expression must represent the congregation. His thoughts and feelings must be in touch wth the minds and hearts of the company present. To be a leader of congregational worship he must be in perfect sympathy with the lives for which he speaks.

But more than this: the minister cannot lead in worship unless there is a worshipful congregation willing to be led. He cannot represent a devotion which does not exist. He cannot give public expression to private reverence, if the individuals present have no reverent emotions. The men and women in the pews must be at worship: full of religious sentiment, and responsive to the leadership of the spirit. A congregation touched with the sense of awe and mystery, stirred by common impulses into a spontaneous sentiment of devotion, anxious to have its flaming desire expressed: this co-operation of the people is necessary to make public worship a vital and impressive reality.

"Common Prayer."

Congregational worship implies something greater and grander than any temple service ever performed, no matter how spacious the architecture, artistic the litany, or gorgeous the ceremonials. In

* From a paper read at Essex Hall at the Ministers' Meeting in Whit-week, June 4, 1903.

* "The Bible for the Practical Man, consisting of Golden Words of Life, &c." By F. H. WILLIAMS, of Flowergate Old Chapel, Whitby. (London, Philip Green, and from the Compiler, 1s. 6d.)

the temple, we find worship dramatised with wonderful art and made æsthetically effective; but the people are more or less mere spectators. Congregational worship, on the other hand, starts from a different interpretation of the universe; it proceeds by personal and spiritual processes to give expression to a different quality of religious life. Those present are not spectators, but participants; not beggars for heavenly favours but seekers for the heavenly life. The worship is not an artistic drama, but a living efflorescence of the human spirit. It is not a performance but an experience, richer, deeper, more ethical, more personal than any other form of religious service.

But to reach this "dear togetherness" in divine things; to have congregational worship in all its beauty, power, and glory; to experience the palpable presence of the Infinite impinging on the finite, pulpit and pew must glow alike with wonder, trust, and love. Deep devotion must fill the place, as a corporate life into which all are baptized and of which all partake: a vital sense of the supreme majesty of God, and a profound realisation of the sublime meaning of human life. Then we have "common prayer," in which he who leads and they who are led are one in a spiritual communion, which sets all in a large place, and opens an outlook upon life of boundless sweep and innumerable splendours.

The Supreme Rite.

Worship reaches deeper into the life and sweeps a wider circle of human interests than any other part of the church service or ministerial office. It satisfies the constant and precious longings of the soul for communion and companionship. The homesick heart finds in adoration and aspiration the peace that passeth understanding. In the warm and serene atmosphere of devotion the discord and disquietude vanish; the wearied spirit finds rest; the storms of passion are stilled; the wide horizon opens; the great memories of life's infinite mercies spread themselves like clouds of glory over all the landscape of our life; out of the sweet music of wonder and trust and hope come the joy that regenerates and the strength that gladdens.

Worship is a moral tonic that far surpasses scientific investigation or theological disquisition. It brings man face to face, not with physical processes nor with metaphysical enigmas, but with the Lord of life who is Spirit, with the Judge of the heart who is Justice, and with the Creator who is Holiness. For my companion in great danger and temptation give me a man with a commanding reverence.

Some Misconceptions.

There are thoughtless people who refer lightly to the worship of the church as an "introductory service." Introductory to what? Shall communion with God serve only as introduction to a discussion of Baptism or Apostolic Succession? Shall reverence for the Most High merely prepare us to debate Calvinism or the theory of single tax? Shall the holy mood of devotion be simply the preface to a half-hour of homiletical rhetoric? If introductory to anything it is to companionship with the Lord God Almighty, in whom we live, move, and have our being! Worship has an end in itself: no makeshift to occupy the time while people assemble; no fringe to adorn a homily; no vestibule into the temple; it is itself the temple. While in no sense merely preparatory to the sermon, it is by the warmth which it brings that we are made plastic to the preacher's word of entreaty and rebuke; it is the spirit of God that it breathes through the soul which fills the words of the sermon, like sails, so that they move us across the great and wide sea of life!

Some people sneeringly remark: Why go to church to hear a minister discuss problems of philosophy about which he knows less than we know? The remark reveals a colossal conceit; a lamentable ignorance; a pitiful misunderstanding of the church itself; an unfortunate spiritual poverty sorrowful to contemplate. Such persons are not even religiously alive: their minds may be active in a little corner, but their souls are dead. Their eyes have never been opened to the splendours of the inner heavens; their ears have never been unstopped to hear above the secular discords of the earth the divine harmonies They are without God in the world; if they had discovered Him, they would know that the Church stands for a great deal more than "the problems of philosophy": it stands for the immeasurable joys and indispensable experiences of the supreme life which only worship bestows.

The True End of Church-Going.

It is a fact that more persons, the world over, come to church to have a worn and wretched heart revived and cheered than to have an inquisitive mind instructed. More come to be chastened than to be indoctrinated. More come to be filled with motive power than to be loaded with creeds. More come to forsake sin and escape sorrow than to learn about Moses and Socrates. The text may be forgotten; but the ecstasy of devotion will sing itself through many days. The point of the sermon may be missed; but the penitence prompted will long shape many a tender act. The argument of the preacher may not convince the understanding; but the heart made actually to feel the Divine Presence will henceforth beat in harmony with nobler ideals of life.

The immense importance of public worship, especially in a season of religious uncertainty and theological transition, is a truth that needs special attention. Man remains a religious being, though he may reject the creed of his ancestors and close the Bible of his mother. He may change his theology, as he does his coat, but the hunger of the soul is constant. He may cease to be a Calvinist or a Trinitarian, he may become a sceptic or an agnostic, but he is still a worshipper. His interest in the discussions of Augustine and Luther, in the sermons of Edwards and Wesley, may die, but, however far he may wander from home, the majestic tones of the Te Deum or the plaintive cry, "Love Divine, all love excelling"—will sweep through his soul like the creative breath of spring. Science may change all our ideas of the blooming rosebush; but the appreciation of its beauty remains. And that, after all, is one of the best things in life. So, too, science may reconstruct all our theories of the universe, or even make some doubtful of the personality of God, but the beauty of holiness remains; and the yearning for spiritual peace demands satisfaction.

[In an early issue we hope to reproduce further passages from Dr. Crooker's address.]

SHOW PLACES.

THE sight of extreme wealth begets in some of us very much the same feeling of sadness as the sight of extreme poverty. We know at such times why it was that, when the queen had seen the house that Solomon had built, "there was no more spirit in her," and why Solon, beholding the treasures of the Lydian king, gave way to those gloomy reflections which Herodotus records. Solomon and Crœsus were owners of Show Places, and the queen and the wise man were touched with the melancholy which has seized us also in the houses of the great.

The sense of disproportion is of itself depressing. Accumulated wealth, heaped up by gusts and freaks of fortune, is like the uneven snow when it lies in heavy drifts on one side, in bare patches on the other. Inequality of distribution may not be economically wrong, but, artistically, it is a mistake. Greatness, to be felt as greatness, must not be overwhelmingly grand.

"'Homes' of the Great!"

The unwonted publicity is also disturbing. An Englishman's home is his castle, unless it happens to be a real castle; then the veil of privacy is drawn aside. Here are exposed a cradle in which noble innocence smiled, a bed in which royalty slept, a looking-glass before which beauty arrayed itself, a suit of armour in which chivalry received its death-wound and died. Why should we gaze upon these sanctities?

A Show Place, moreover, to be worth showing, must show the ravages of time. It is part of its glory that it is crumbling away. The faded tapestry will not bear a touch, the tints are flying from the portraits on the walls. We, too, have our relics of antiquity, but they are memorials, not monuments; they do not meet us at every turn, to remind us of the perishableness of things. Why does the proud owner of marble halls so often cramp himself up in a shooting-box, or a yacht, or a foreign hotel? Why is he more at home when not at home? Is it that the ancestral seems to him to be always bordering upon the sepulchral?

Museum or Mausoleum?

Great houses, again, make plainer to the eye the vast difference that may lie between possession and enjoyment. We look mournfully enough at our own poor shelves, knowing that we have more books than we shall ever read, but, at least, we know that we have them. What must be the sensation of one who owns things in masses, and cannot say off-hand of a book, or a coin, or an engraving, whether he possesses it or not? There is little to choose between being in charge of a mausoleum, and being the keeper of a museum.

And yet, philosophise as we may, a Show Place in the neighbourhood is something that we must see—is, in fact, what we came to see. We flow in from all sides by road and rail, singly and in twos and threes, and now and then in coach-loads, with clatter of four horses, and tootings as of ancient horn. For all our bravery at the outset, we wait round the entrance in a shame-faced way. When our small personalities are sufficiently discernible to be dealt with as a group, Mercury leads us to the door, and commits us to the care of Hebe within. Neither Mercury nor Hebe can quite conceal disdain. Whatever their own humbler rank among the immortals may be, they are Olympians, and they know it.

Unprofitable Sightseeing.

We, on our side, are quite conscious that we are earth-born intruders. We are going to do that which we are careful not to do, even in the houses of our dearest friends—to peer and pry, to stare and scrutinise. If we could shake off this guilty feeling of intrusiveness, and claim and recover our lost liberties and mingled selves, how enchanted we should be! Voices from the past would speak to us; the light of other days would break upon us; master-pieces of art would enthal us; and historic forms would move us like figures in a shrine. Who, wandering and lingering, musing and meditating, would not be touched with native pride in the stately homes which have played a stately part in days gone by? But we are hurried along like a crowd of impassive ghosts, and the voice of our leader reaches us as the voice of one chanting to the dead. There is also the disquieting thought of the obolus at the end, for Mercury is the god of gain, and Hebe stands by the door with open palm. At last we breathe a sigh of relief, and—saddest thing of all—we depart without sense of favour, and, therefore, without sense of gratitude; Corydon strikes a match on the door-post, and Amaryllis leaves a confectioner's bag on the threshold.

Excursions to the "Dukeries!" Who will much longer be content to be a duke? For my part, I am more than ever pleased with that ode which Horace sent off to a duke of his day. The humble alone, he says, are free; the poet on his little farm has many opportunities of happiness, and particularly this advantage, that, unlike his rich patron, he can snap his fingers at the public.

E. P. B.

ALL through the Gospel we mark how men cling to the letter, and how Christ with tender hand extricates the spirit from it, and tells his hearers that it is this which gives the letter its worth. A law such as that of Moses has its place in the schooling of a race at a certain epoch of national life; but a code or a creed that cannot be expanded must at last be outgrown. If, however, a Divine and living spirit be enshrined in a church, it may direct its development, and transform the outward tenement as inward need requires. —Henry Latham ("Pastor Pastorum.").

BY right discipline we can increase our strength.—John Ruskin.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. JAMES HALL.

After a ministry extending over twenty years, thirteen of which were spent in Crumlin, the Rev. James Hall entered on the higher life on August 28, at the age of 47 years. Mr. Hall had, prior to settling in Crumlin, ministered to our congregations in Glenarm, co. Antrim, and Kidderminster. He was a native of Belfast, where he came under the influence of the Rev. Alexander Gordon. With his aid he qualified for admission to the course under the Home Missionary Board, which he entered in 1880.

For some years Mr. Hall suffered from bronchial weakness, which rendered his life at times truly laborious. After the meetings of the National Triennial Conference at Liverpool, in April last, the weather at times having been bitterly cold, the malady increased, and early in June he ceased to preach, growing gradually weaker. Mr. Hall leaves a widow and six children.

"Generous hearted, with single aim, and hopeful almost to a fault," writes a ministerial colleague, "Mr. Hall could not foresee failure in any of his undertakings. Necessity was his opportunity; possible non-success never dimmed his vision. Many a time has he been to the bedside of those whose sickness was less serious than his own."

He was laid in his grave on Monday last in the burying ground attached to the Crumlin Meeting House, many friends of different denominations following the remains and attending the service in the church, which was conducted by the Revs. Alfred Turner, of Templepatrick, and W. S. Smith, of Antrim, that at the manse having previously been taken by the Revs. Thos. Dunkerley, B.A., of Comber, and R. J. Orr, M.A., of Belfast, and that subsequently at the grave by the Rev. F. Thomas, of Cairncastle.

MR. TRENCH, OF NORTHAMPTON.

THE Kettering-road Church, Northampton, has sustained a sad loss in the death of Mr. James Trench, which took place at his home on Monday week. Mr. Trench, who was eighty years old, had been treasurer of the church for a great number of years, and at one time was also treasurer of the Sunday-schools. He was a close friend of the late Sir Philip Mansfield, with whom he worked devoutly for the welfare of the congregation, being present at service only eight days before his death.

Mr. Trench's good works were very far from being confined to his own household of faith. He went to Northampton from Wellingborough as a very young man, and throughout the years which followed he took a keen, practical interest in all movements for the uplifting of the lot of his fellow-townsmen. Success in the staple trade of the town enabled him to retire at fifty, and to devote thenceforward the bulk of his time to good works. Only his intimate friends, and those who immediately benefited, know of the extent and helpfulness of his private charities. He was an invaluable member of the old Town Improvement Commission, but could never be persuaded to join the later Town Council or other public bodies. He was, however, a Governor of the Northampton General Hospital, a founder of the Poor Children's Christmas Dinner Fund, and took a warm interest in the encouragement of swimming and other athletic exercises.

At the widely-attended funeral, yesterday week, the Rev. Arthur Harvie, in his address in the chapel, said they had much cause for thankfulness in the life that was closed—the life of a man on whose truth they could rely, whose utter sincerity no one could doubt, one who stood as firm as a rock amidst much doubt and conflict, one who was found faithful when others fled away; a true friend to those who had been worthy of friendship, and even to those who had not, a friend ready to sympathise, and a friend ever willing to help. Mr. Trench (added Mr. Harvie) was a true citizen, one who took a living interest in the affairs of his town, a man above all suspicion of unworthiness in his dealings, a citizen whose memory would be a treasured possession to all who knew him.

THE REV. C. H. WELLBELOVED.

A BRIEF account of the life of the late Mr. Wellbeloved appeared in our issue last week. We have since received a letter from a member of his bereaved congregation at Southport emphasising a trait which all who heard him know to have been eminently characteristic—his "recognition of the duty of the minister to deal fearlessly with the social questions of the day."

"He never hesitated," our correspondent truly says, "to impress upon the congregation his conception of civic duty, based on the highest moral grounds, while he endeavoured at the same time to avoid the stirring up of political party strife. His outspoken expressions of opinion may have occasionally offended some of his hearers, but all have respected the conscientious and high-minded motives which prompted his words."

Our correspondent also sends us an "appreciation" of Mr. Wellbeloved contributed by a member of his congregation to the Southport Guardian, from which we reproduce the following passages:—

The quality which perhaps chiefly impressed a stranger was a fine manliness of character; and probably the highest eulogy he would himself have desired, was that in the best sense of the word he had endeavoured to be a man. In others he looked for and demanded that which was so conspicuous in himself—absolute sincerity and frankness. He never wore his heart on his sleeve; yet no one who knew him ever questioned the warmth of the feelings which lay behind the hearty grip of his hand shake, and the bright glance of his frank blue eyes.

For those belonging to other folds and faiths he had a wide-minded charity, but his hatred of insincerity caused him occasionally to condemn in severe terms those who, having outgrown the faiths of their earlier years, had not the moral courage to avow their altered convictions. In all his sermons there underlay the appeal to reach up to, and live up to, the highest moral and religious ideals. "Your life is the thing; whatever be your creed."

The lateness of the decision [to join the ministry] had one great compensating advantage. His experiences as an engineer—the profession he had at first adopted—gave him an insight into business life, which imparted to his sermons and outlook upon life generally a strongly practical complexion, which was ever one of the chief virtues of his pulpit ministrations.

Of his illness and death the following touching account is given:—

For eight months or more the mysterious disorder which had so unaccountably seized him, had been the cause of an ever increasing anxiety on the part of his family and congregation alike. The end came—and a most beautiful end it was—in the early hours of Monday, the darkness of unconsciousness which had settled down upon him some days earlier, lifting at the last for a few minutes, just long enough to gratify his round-standing family with a peaceful and happy smile of recognition.

The cremation at Anfield was preceded by a service at Portland-street Chapel at which the Rev. Charles Hargrove delivered an address.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A HIGHLAND HOME.

CLOSE to a beautiful lake, which is surrounded by mountains, stands a little white cottage. The honeysuckles climb over it in summer, and there is a little garden full of flowers and vegetables, and a number of fowls and chickens crowd round on the grass before the door. Here lived a father and mother and eight children. The children had a long walk to go to school, but they trudged there in all weathers. On Saturdays they did not go at all, and then the elder ones helped their mother at home and in the garden.

There was a small hut on the shore of the lake, where the oars of a boat and such things were kept; but when we peeped in at a square hole which served for a window, we saw a small table made of a piece of slate, raised on stones, little seats and chairs made of chips of wood raised on pebbles, and bits of broken china set in rows along the planks of the shed walls, some stones for a chimney-piece, some bits of wood and red rag for a fire; but there were no dolls! So we wrote to London for two dolls; and in a few days a smart little girl and boy were sitting beside the table, on the little seats. We did not see the children discover the little inhabitants, but they were taken away into the house; and the mother said the children were quarrelling over them, so she had put them away for a time.

Poor Jessie.

On Saturdays, and in the summer holidays, the children used to come and weed in our garden; first Jessie and Johnnie came; and when the hay was cut they used to help to make hay. Then they stayed and had their dinner and tea in our kitchen, and that was a great treat, and they went home very proud of their earnings, for they were very poor. But they were always very neat and clean and very nicely behaved children, and worked very industriously. Sometimes they gathered fruit for us for the jam-making. When Jessie and Johnnie grew big, and left home to go to work, Mary and Robert came; and all the children in their turn, down to little Duncan.

But after a time poor Jessie fell ill with rheumatic fever. A long time she was ill, and though, at last, she recovered, she was very delicate. The doctor said she wanted plenty of good food, so she used to come three days a week to our home, to dine in the kitchen. She grew stronger, and went to service, but after a time she again fell ill with rheumatic fever. She was again laid up for many weeks, but recovered once more.

A Patient Invalid.

Poor girl! she suffered very much, but bore it all most patiently. When she was better she again went to service; but she was far from strong; and after a time her old enemy attacked her again; and this time she did not recover, but remained a great invalid and sufferer. Her legs grew so stiff at the joints that she could not bend them. At times she felt better, and then she used to get about the cottage and out on the green outside on crutches, but she could not sit down, and always had to lie or stand. But she was always bright and cheerful; and she used to read, and knit, and mend the clothes, and do everything possible to help in the home. When long nights of pain kept her wide awake, she often had to stay in bed in the day, as she was exhausted.

Some friends gave her a reclining chair, which could be wheeled about out of doors, and often she was seen lying out in the sunshine, with her book, and her little cat or kitten beside her in her chair, and when we came past her she would raise herself on her elbow and smile brightly at us, glad to have a little talk. Often someone wheeled her in her chair along the road by the lake, and perhaps left her in a sunny or shady spot for a time. Once when I came back to her I asked her if she had been reading. "No," she said, "it was so beautiful, and the little birds came so near, and two little squirrels, and I was watching them." So she had her pleasures.

"I'll be Better Soon."

Sometimes, when she was feeling better, I found her on her feet, cleaning the windows, or washing up the tea things, or mixing the meal for the fowls; she could get a yard or two on her feet, but only by crossing them and wriggling along. But she never complained, and when she was suffering most she used to say, "Oh, I'll be better in a few days. I often take these turns, and then I'm better after."

The father and mother and Jessie were quite alone now, for all the other children were out in the world; one was a coachman, one a mason, and two sons serving in shops; and the three other girls were servants. And now the father began to fail; he partly lost the use of his legs, and he could not speak plainly; and the good mother had her two invalids to look after, as well as everything else to do in and about the house. She walked a mile each way every morning to fetch some milk and to sell her eggs, and she was constantly seen by the lake doing the washing for the family, with a big black pot over a fire on the shore. She fetched the peat in, carrying great loads on her back in a sack, or great boughs from the wood. But everything in the cottage was kept perfectly neat, in spite of all she had to do.

Where there is No More Pain.

Well, last autumn when we went back to London we went to say good-bye to these friends; and Jessie was very ill. She looked very ill indeed, and I wondered as I left her whether I should see her again. A fortnight after we heard that she had passed away, after much suffering. We still miss her sadly, as we pass the little cottage and do not see her out in her chair; but the memory of her is never sad, as she was so bright and good and cheerful. She was thirty-five when she died.

Just five weeks later another funeral passed to the little churchyard where Jessie had been laid in November; and that was her youngest sister, Christina, who had been taken ill and died in Glasgow. How sad it was for the poor parents; but how brave and good they were! They love to talk of their two dear daughters to the friends who also loved them. And Mary has come to be at home with them now, and help and cheer them, and on the two green graves in the churchyard are some red daisy plants, sent by an aunt who was fond of them; and a little granite stone is soon to mark the place where they are laid. And in remembering Jessie, with her patient, gentle face, we think how wonderful must be to her the new free life with no weakness and pain to bear any more.

GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

GREAT souls have wills, feeble ones have only wishes. Chinese Proverb.

Judge not thy fellow-man till thou art similarly situated. Talmud.

When you have once learned to honour anything love is not very far off.

George Macdonald.

THERE ought to be divine tenderness enough in our lives to convert the most sceptical, to inspire the most obstinate man to divine service, and to make robust the will of the most timid woman.

J. Ll. Jones.

THE world is enlarged for us not by new objects, but by finding more affinities and potencies in those we have.

R. W. Emerson.

RELIGION is the perfection of wisdom, practice the best instructor, thanksgiving the sweetest recreation.

Bishop Horne.

WASHINGTON left behind him, as one of the greatest treasures of his country, the example of a stainless life—of a great, honest, pure, and noble character—a model for his nation to form themselves by in all time to come. Smiles.

TRY to care about something in this vast world besides the gratification of small, selfish desires. Look on other lives besides your own. See what their troubles are, and how they are borne.

George Eliot.

EXPECT to escape, know that you can escape from the consequences of having been wicked, only by being good. Crave the most perfect mercy. Ask for the new life as the only real release from death. So only can your religion glow with enthusiasm and open into endless hope.

Phillips Brooks.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom, or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are:—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 5, 1903.

AT AMSTERDAM.

IN the Netherlands, the country of heroic memories, the home of civil and religious freedom, it was to be expected that the meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers would awaken a large amount of interest, and that members of the Council, coming together from many lands, would receive a very warm welcome. That has indeed been the case. Nothing could exceed the kindness of the Netherlands Committee and other friends in Amsterdam, and in point of numbers, and in the interest and value of the papers read, the meetings have undoubtedly been a great success. Close upon a thousand people must have taken part in the proceedings during the week, and of these considerably more than a quarter were visitors from other lands.

It has been a special pleasure to many that the Council met under the genial presidency of Professor OORT, of whom Mr. WICKSTEED wrote so happily in last week's INQUIRER. Both he and Mr. HUGENHOLTZ, chairman of the Reception Committee, and minister of the Free Congregation, by whose hospitality the Council had so convenient and fine a place of meeting, showed remarkable international capacity in the readiness with which they spoke all the current languages, and could welcome the representatives of each in turn with tactful and gracious words. Dutch, English, French, and German were all equally at home in the brotherly communion of the week, and if the representatives of Hungary, India, and Japan had to be content with the use of English speech, their own nationality was none the less heartily welcomed in the unity of the spirit which prevailed. We must leave our record to speak for itself this week, commending the President's address and the sermon here published and the papers to follow in succeeding weeks to the earnest attention of our readers.

LIBERAL THINKERS AND WORKERS.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL AT AMSTERDAM.

CHRONICLE OF THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 30.

THE actual meetings of the Council did not begin until Tuesday, but much had gone before in preparation for the great gathering, and already on Friday of last week twenty or more of the English visitors had arrived, while others were on the way, taking the opportunity of seeing other Dutch and Belgian cities, or even coming by way of Germany.

Sunday was a delightful summer's day, not so hot as it became later in the week, and Amsterdam was to be seen at its best. That best is full of fascination; a city like no other, though they call it the Venice of the North, within reach of the breath of the sea, full of brightness, with its many picturesque streets, its quaint and often gaily coloured houses, but above all the broad Amstel and the circling canals, the Grachten, spanned by innumerable bridges, and shaded often (as in the noble Heeren Gracht), with most beautiful avenues of trees. Some of the chief streets were unfortunately in confusion, through the laying down of electric tram lines, but this did not seriously interfere with the pleasure of the visitors, or spoil their impression of the manifold graces of a delightful city.

The Hall of the Free Congregation.

On Sunday morning this chronicler attended service in the Hall of the Free Congregation, where the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz ministers, and where the meetings of the Council were held. The Hall is a large building standing in the Weteringschans, close by the Rijks-Museum, the theatre and the beautiful Vondel Park. It was opened in May, 1880, two and a half years after the founding of the Free Congregation (Vrije Gemeente) by the brothers Hugenholtz. A memorial tablet within the building records the death of the elder brother, Dr. Philip R. Hugenholtz in 1889, and his portrait, with that of A. D. Loman, another deceased and highly honoured member of the society, is in the series which fills the windows on both sides of the hall, below the gallery. The series was completed only last week, by the addition of the portraits of Emerson and Carlyle, the others being Socrates and M. Aurelius, Moses and Christ, Paul and Augustine, Dante and à Kempis, Catherine of Siena and Juliana von Stolberg, Luther and Zwingli, Spinoza and Kant, Lessing and Goethe, each window having two portraits, coupled as in this list.

Mr. Hugenholtz was away on Sunday. He had been much occupied, as chairman of the Amsterdam Reception Committee, and sought rest by preaching away from home. His place in the pulpit of the Free Congregation was taken by Professor Groenewegen, of the Remonstrant Seminary at Leiden, who has been a very active member and treasurer of the Netherlands Committee of the Council.

The hall will accommodate about 2,000 people, and a congregation of some five or six hundred were assembled on Sunday morning. It gave one a shock on entering, to see men sitting with their hats on, as if waiting for a concert-hall entertainment, and to hear conversation pretty general if subdued. The organ voluntary did not silence this, but all was quiet, and there was reverent attention, when the service began.

Dr. Groenewegen's Sermon.

Dr. Groenewegen entered the Hall from a door close by the pulpit, and began the service with a few words of earnest prayer, after which some verses of a hymn were sung. They were sung, the great congregation with a predominance of men's voices heartily taking up the strain. Then Dr. Groenewegen at once began his sermon, in the middle of which and at the close, verses of two more hymns were sung. After this the Benediction, and that was the whole service, which lasted a little more than an hour. The hymn-book of the Protestantenbond was used.

The sermon, which began with a reference to the great interest of the coming meetings of the International Council, was from the text:—"We are God's fellow workers," and dwelt with direct force and the eloquence of an earnest spirit on the great truths of the Divine love, mercy, and holiness, and the true life for man to be found in the service of a practical faithfulness and a sharing in that Divine Spirit.

MONDAY, AUGUST 31.

The committee-room and library of the Free Congregation were open on Monday for the use of the International Council. Professor Eerdmans, Secretary of the Netherlands Committee, arrived early from Leiden, Mr. Hugenholtz, the vice-president, and other members of the committee were also there, to give information to early comers among the visitors, and superintend the final arrangements. In the library there were tables both of Dutch and English liberal religious literature, and various papers and pamphlets for distribution.

Amsterdam was gay with flags, for it was the Queen's birthday, and in the evening there was a very charming procession of illuminated boats on the Amstel, and a fine display of fireworks. The streets were crowded by the people in high carnival until late at night, and this was the welcome which the main body of English visitors received, when their train arrived from Flushing at about half-past eleven.

Meeting of Liberal Ministers.

On Monday evening the Dutch Liberal Ministers held the first session of their annual meeting (Vergadering van Moderne Theologen), to which members of the International Council were cordially invited, in the "Gebouw van den Werkenden Stand," a hall dedicated to popular uses, facing one of the busy Grachten, in the Kloveniersburgwal. Here the Tuesday evening's reception was also held. To one unacquainted with the homely custom of the country it was somewhat surprising to find that during the whole course of the ministers' meeting, while the President gave his opening address and a paper was read and discussed, members sat comfortably smoking, and waiters brought round coffee and beer where they were required. There were some 260 ministers present and several visitors.

The chair was taken by Professor Cannegieter, of Utrecht, who in his presidential address dealt with the distinction, which must always be clearly maintained and remembered, between any movement in religion and the historical name attached to it. We must guard, he said, against being misled by a name, which can never express the whole spiritual contents of the movement to which it is attached. This was illustrated by the instances of Christianity, Reformation, Protestantism, and the "Modern" movement. The essence of Liberal Protestantism was declared to be a genuine personal faith in the spiritual life with God, liberality in the depths of a heart seeking God. To be truly "modern," Dr. Cannegieter said, implied that head and heart alike should be free, free before God. In the conviction that freedom and religion must go together, the Moderns were at one with the International Council. Not denial, but definite assurance of faith united the liberals of every race and clime; this it was which gave to the international meeting its great significance, for denial is barren, but assured faith bears fruit, and is a constant source of strength. Their chief care must be not for "a faith," but for Faith. They should not hanker after a new formula, but in the free spirit maintain a genuine religious life of personal conviction.

At the opening of his address, having recalled the memory of ministers lost by death in the course of the year, Dr. Cannegieter, who, for the rest, spoke in his own language, addressed a few words of courteous welcome in English to the members of the International Council present as visitors.

At the conclusion, a loyal telegram of congratulation and good wishes was sent to the Queen of Holland on the occasion of her birthday.

The paper of the evening, subsequently discussed, was by the Rev. P. Feenstra, a Mennonite minister, and dealt with the question, familiar in our own circles years ago, of the right of Liberals to the Christian name, and the steps to be taken to vindicate its use. Mr. Feenstra urged a closer union among those Liberals who highly prized the Christian name, and the adoption of a Christian confession of faith.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 1.

On Tuesday morning the second session of the Liberal Ministers' meeting was held, and was even more largely attended than the first, many more visitors being present. A message of thanks from the Queen for the ministers' birthday greeting was received. Two papers were read and discussed during the morning, the first by Dr. C. H. Ris Lambers, on Neo-Calvinism, the second by the president of the Protestantenbond, Dr. J. van den Bergh, of Zwolle, on the increasing attachment among "Moderns" to church fellowship. His plea was that liberals in all religious bodies should come out and form one united fellowship of Free Churches, separate from the old creed-bound conditions, rather than attempt any fresh organisation within the old churches.

Sight-seeing in Amsterdam.

Tuesday morning was also a busy time at the office of the International Council, in the committee room of the hall of the Free Congregation, where the sale of tickets for the week's excursions was vigorously carried on, while members, the greater number of whom had arrived on the previous evening, thronged the reading room or exchanged greetings in the approaches to the hall. During the day parties were organised, under the guidance of local friends, for sight-seeing in the city, while many others, by the help of the admirable map at the end of the programme, found their own way about, to the Rijks-Museum, the churches, and elsewhere.

The Religious Service.

In the evening, at seven o'clock, service was held in the Old Walloon Church (the church of the French Protestants) in the Oudezijds Achterburgwal, kindly placed by the authorities at the disposal of the International Council. The church, impressive in its simplicity, was filled by a great congregation.

The pulpit is in the centre of the building, overshadowed by a huge sounding board. The chief organ at one end of the church accompanied the hymns which the congregation sang, while the choir occupied a gallery at the other end, with a smaller instrument which accompanied their separate singing.

The service was conducted by the Rev. J. van Loenen Martinet, of Bussum, the editor of the Hervorming, who preached in Dutch, and with great impressiveness, the sermon, of which an English translation, revised from the copy distributed in the church, appears in our present issue; but the printed word cannot give a real impression of the preacher's eloquence, which the testimony of several speakers at the subsequent reception showed was deeply appreciated.

The service was, like the church, impressive in its simplicity. After the organ voluntary it opened with a hymn beautifully rendered by the choir, and a prayer of earnest aspiration. The preacher then read 1 Cor. xiii., and entered at once on the first part of his sermon. In the midst he paused, as appears to be the general custom, for the congregation to sing the verse of a hymn, and then took up his theme again. At the conclusion the choir sang a very beautiful French hymn of benediction, the hymn habitually used at the close of service in the Walloon churches. After this the minister repeated the Lord's Prayer and the congregation sang a final hymn. The benediction familiar to us in our English version, "The Lord bless us and keep us, the Lord lift up the light of His countenance upon us and give us peace," brought the service to a close.

Reception of Delegates.

It will be seen from the reference in Mr. van Loenen Martinet's sermon that no official welcome was given to the members of the Council (as had been at one time anticipated) by the Burgomaster of Amsterdam, but after the service a very cordial welcome was offered by the members of the Netherlands Committee, represented by Dr. Oort, the president of the Council, and Mr. Hugenholtz, the chairman of the reception committee.

This took place in the Hall, where the ministers' meeting had been held, the Gebouw van den Werkenden Stand, which is not far from the church. The hall was crowded, and hospitable refreshments were handed round by the waiters as the meeting proceeded.

Dr. Oort presided, and Mr. Hugenholtz, speaking with great readiness in English, French, and German by turns, introduced and welcomed the official delegates from America, England, France, Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, Denmark, Hungary, New Zealand, India, and Japan, a representative of each group making reply.

Mr. HUGENHOLTZ first offered a word of the warmest welcome to all friends, with mingled feelings, as he said, of joy and fear. It was a great pleasure to welcome brethren and friends from all parts of the world, yet remembering the splendid reception given to the Congress in London two years ago, he feared they could not come up to that. But England was a grand nation and Holland a little country, and yet the greatness of their history had been recognised, their love of freedom and the democratic spirit, of which they were proud. Those who were gathered there, who reverenced the teaching of Jesus, would not despise the widow's mite they offered.

America.

Turning then to the official delegates, to whom an individual welcome was to be given, they gave the first place, Mr. Hugenholtz said, to America, to their friends who came from Boston, the cradle of the International Council. They welcomed Dr. S. A. Eliot, the President of the American Unitarian Association; Dr. J. H. Crooker, the eloquent preacher, who with his wife, brought to them the message of American Idealism; the Rev. C. W. Wendte, their secretary, who tried to combine the practical energy of Theodore Parker with the idealism of Emerson; and Mr. Edwin Mead, the enthusiastic apostle of the Peace movement.

The Rev. S. A. ELIOT, D.D., in acknowledging the welcome, said that with great pleasure he brought to them the affectionate salutations of their American fellow-workers: The debt of America to Holland was already far greater than they could ever pay, and now they were drawn together by new bonds of affection and goodwill. The founders of the American commonwealth, men like Brewster and Miles Standish, were trained in that country. First among the nations Dutch cannon saluted the flag of the new Republic, and Amsterdam bankers furnished the first loan to the new government. It was an American Unitarian, Benjamin Franklin, who said, "In love of liberty and brave defence of liberty, Holland has been our great example;" and it was another American Unitarian, J.

L. Motley, who, in his History, had been the first to make them adequately feel the debt they owed to the Netherlands, the home of a free press, free schools and, not least, a free church. Toleration in religion never had a better definition than that of William the Silent: "I charge you that you shall not interfere with any man's conscience so long as he does no injury to another." And John of Nassau, brother of the great William, gave expression to their ideal when he said, "Churches and schools, books, libraries and printing-presses are of more value to the State than all the armies, arsenals, and alliances you can imagine." The motto of the country, Eendracht maaht macht, they might well take for a watchword. As on the sand dunes the ditch-grass was planted and with its knotted roots bound the loose particles together, let them plant seeds of unity, brotherhood, sympathy, co-operation, to bind together their free churches, of independent organisation and different nationality, and make them strong to stand together in defence of pure religion and perfect liberty.

England.

The delegates of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe (president), the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie (secretary), Mr. Ion Pritchard (hon. secretary of the S.S.A.), the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, J. E. Carpenter, J. Harwood, and P. H. Wicksteed, next received a very cordial welcome.

Mr. W. A. SHARPE, in acknowledging the welcome, said that they felt very deeply the way in which they had been received. He also spoke of the deep impression made by the sermon of that evening, which would have been eloquent to him, even if he had not had the English translation before him; he had felt for the first time the beauty of the Dutch language, in its softer tones almost as sweet as Italian. In that country there was nothing to prevent them from seeing the whole wide expanse of the heavens, and so it was a noble thought that with them liberty was as broad as their magnificent skies.

France.

Turning to the French delegates, Mr. Hugenholtz said they that deeply regretted the absence of the Rev. J. E. Roberty, of Paris, but they rejoiced to welcome Professor Jean Réville and M. A. Bourrier, of Sèvres, editor of the Chrétien Français, formerly a priest in the Roman Church, who had dared to claim his liberty.

M. RÉVILLE, whose father was for many years the honoured minister of the Walloon Church in Rotterdam, received an enthusiastic welcome, and was deeply moved. He brought the salutations and good wishes of the liberal Protestants of France. He recalled the memories of early days, and his close association with the Walloon Church, which had endured so much for liberty. The sermon of that evening, so full of the power of faith and love, had spoken to him in that venerable building with special force, and they had reason to be very grateful to Mr. van Loenen Martinet. He concluded with ardent words of aspiration and loyalty to the great principles of a free religious life.

Germany.

The German delegates to be welcomed were Professor Otto Pfleiderer, D.D., of Berlin, Dr. C. Schieler, of the Free Religious Society of Danzig, Mr. K. Andresen, of Blankenese, and Dr. Th. Gerold, of Strassburg, representing the Liberal Protestant Society of Elsass-Lothringen.

Professor PFLEIDERER, who acknowledged the welcome, regretted that Germany was not more largely represented in the Congress, and said that they who were present could not claim to represent any body that had delegated them, and they must speak simply for themselves. In Germany, at the present moment, there was not a great deal of sympathy with a free theology. As now, "Catholic was trumps," there was reaction in church matters, and a romantic leaning to authority. In this matter political and social influences were largely at work. The fear of anarchy and socialism made men cling nervously to every kind of old authority. But the German people would not always forget the great days of their classical writers and thinkers; a better day would dawn for liberal religion, and meanwhile they must hold fast to freedom, and earnestness in a truly inward religious life. He was happy to be in that company, where freedom in religion received its due rights. He also had been deeply moved by the sermon. Everywhere they, as liberals, were few in number, and could not hope that it would soon be different; yet it was no exaggeration to say that they had a special mission in the present day, to show that with the utmost freedom of thought there could be genuine religion, and to guard against the dangers of unfaith and materialism. Let them not be discouraged, but press onward, and continue to work and hope. They must work, not only through criticism, but in positive construction, welcoming all the new light that came to them. from whatever quarter, and not simply within the borders of their own Bible. What could be gained by the study of other religions of the world they in Holland well knew, and he recalled the honoured name of Tiele. So they must work, to broaden faith, and help to build the great temple of the living God.

Other Countries.

The following delegates from other countries were then welcomed: Belgium, the Rev. J. Hocart, of Brussels; Switzerland, the Revs. Professor E. Montet, D.D., Geneva, and G. Schönholzer, of Zürich; Denmark, Mrs. Sass and Miss M. B. Westonholtz; Hungary, the Rev. N. Jozan, of Budapest; New Zealand, Miss Ella Macky, of Auckland; India, Mr. V. R. Shinde and Mr. G. R. Madgarkar, of Bombay; Japan, Mr. Z. Toyosaki.

In giving the welcome, Mr. Hügenholtz expressed regret at the absence of Professor Lindberg, who was to have represented Sweden. Of Mr. Schönholzer he spoke as a true friend of the Boers, and as representing Zürich, sacred to them from the memory of Heinrich Lang. Mr. Schönholzer in his response said that of the 3,000,000 of his people, three-fifths were Protestants and more than half of these were liberals. He represented the Swiss Union for Free Christianity, and brought the greetings of that society. Mr. Jozan in his reply told of the 71,000 Unitarians in Transylvania and of the thousand members in his church at Budapest. He brought greetings from their bishop and a letter from the consistory of their church.

At the conclusion of these greetings, Dr. Oort offered a welcome to the representatives of Dutch churches and societies, as follows: Remonstrant Church, Rev. H. P. Schim van der Loeff, and Professor Groenewegen, of Leiden; Mennonite Society, Rev. P. Feenstra; Haagsch Genootschap, Professor Cannegieter; Teyler's Theological Society, Professor S. Cramer and Dr. Elhorst; the Dutch Church in London, the Rev. S. Baart de la Faille; the Dutch Church in St. Petersburg, the Rev. F. C. O. Pantekock. Dr. Oort expressed great regret at the absence of Mrs. Humphry Ward and Dr. Kalthoff, of Bremen, and other friends, whom they had hoped to welcome.

After the reception a considerable number of members accepted the invitation of the students of Amsterdam University to go over to their club in the Pembrand Plein, where they were entertained in the friendliest manner with songs of all nations and other things. The time on Wednesday morning at which some reverend members of the Council reached their hotel we will not reveal.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 2.

Wednesday was the hardest day's work of the week, a blazing summer day, and the whole morning and afternoon devoted to the hearing of papers.

Promptly at ten o'clock the president, Professor Oort, took the chair, in the Hall of the Free Congregation, and delivered his opening address. This we are happy to be able to publish in full, in an English translation, this week.

Then followed an interesting and eloquent report, presented on behalf of the Committee by the secretary, the Rev C. W. Wendte, from which we shall hope subsequently to publish the passages of greatest public interest. Among the references to the losses sustained since the last meeting of the Council, was one to the late Ernest Fontanès of Paris, who was among the honoured guests in London two years ago. On Mr. Wendte's suggestion, a vote of deepest sympathy with Mme. Fontanès was passed, the audience rising in silence to signify their assent.

The Papers.

After the report four papers in succession were read, the first in English by Professor J. Estlin Carpenter, on "The Place of Christianity among the Religions of the World," which we propose to publish in THE INQUIRER of September 19; the second, in French, by Professor Jean Réville, on "Religion and the Modern Conception of the Order of Nature"; the third by Dr. S. A. Eliot, on "Liberal Religion in America," which is to appear in next week's INQUIRER; and the fourth in Dutch by Professor Cannegieter, on "Personality and Religion." Of this and other of the papers we must give some further account next week.

After lunch came another full session, opened by Professor Cranmer, of Amsterdam, who took the place on the programme vacated by the absence of Professor Lindberg, and courageously read a paper in English, on "Do liberal religious believers want to be organised as a church?"

The Rev. R. A. Armstrong followed with a paper on "The Conception of God as 'The Soul of all Souls,'" which is to appear with Dr. Eliot's paper next week. The third paper was in Dutch, by Dr. Bruining, of Amsterdam, on "The Aggressive Character of Liberal Religious Faith," affirming that such faith, to survive, must vigorously assert itself. Three other papers, Mr. V. R. Shinde speaking for India, the Rev. J. Hocart for Belgium, and Dr. Schieler for Germany, completed the afternoon's programme; but of these and of the papers which occupied Thursday and Friday mornings we must reserve our account for next week, as also of the Wednesday evening performance (in Dutch) of the Merchant of Venice, and the Thursday and Friday excursions to Haarlem and Volendam respectively.

Dr. Oort announced in the course of Wednesday, that the Netherlands Committee is preparing to issue a volume of the proceedings of this year's Council, similar to that published in London after the first meeting.

POPULAR SERVICES.

SIR,—The Rev. J. Page Hopps being now at liberty for propagandist work, it was felt that his great gifts as a popular and spiritual preacher should be made use of in London during the coming autumn.

Services have consequently been arranged for during October and November, to be taken by him and others at the Greenwich Theatre in the South, and the Grand Theatre, Islington, in the North of London.

For most of us it is only such occasions as these which give any wide opportunity of helping to spread the conception of religion which is so precious to ourselves, and of letting others hear of Rational Thought as no enemy to Faith, but rather as the truest and surest approach to the things of the Spirit.

The Greenwich services will begin on Oct. 11, and continue during the four following Sundays; those at Islington will follow from Nov. 8 throughout the rest of the month.

Helpers will be wanted:—

1. To help in the choir.
2. To act as stewards on Sunday evenings.
3. And, above all, during the previous week helpers will be required to canvass the neighbourhood.

All willing to help in any way are requested to communicate either with:—

Mr. GEORGE CALLOW, Fern Villa, Morley-road, Lewisham, for the South;

Mr. ALFRED WILSON, 2, Ella-road, Crouch Hill, N., for the North;

Or with myself at 18, Gardnor Mansions, Church-row, Hampstead.

At least fifty canvassers will be wanted on the week-nights previous to the first service at each place, and all, whether they have previously written or not, will be welcomed on the afternoon and evening of Wednesday, Oct. 7, and following days at 446, New Cross-road, Greenwich, S.E.; or Wednesday, Nov. 4, at the schools, Unity Church, Upper-street, Islington, from five o'clock onwards.

JOSEPH H. WICKSTEED.

PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

PROFESSOR OORT ON THE PRICE OF OUR LIBERTY.*

HIGHLY-ESTEEMED co-members of our Congress, "Behold how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" So the poet of Psalm 133 sang, and we feel the truth of his word. If even the literal dwelling together with those with whom we are united by the ties of blood and community of interest is pleasant, we taste a higher pleasure when, in the joys and sorrows that life brings us and the difficulties with which we have to struggle, we can enjoy the abiding fellowship of those with whom we are of one mind and one spiritual kindred. Whosoever is deprived of this feels oftentimes lonely even amidst a crowd of his fellow-men, whilst even a temporary dwelling together with those with whom as regards our highest interests we are at one, and whose thoughts and conceptions, in essentials, we share, brings us refreshment and fuller life.

Our Common Life in God.

We, liberal religious thinkers and workers, are brethren. First and foremost we are companions in our love of God—far too feeble, alas! but yet sincere. We bow down, and would fain bow with ever deepening reverence, before the Most High, whose majesty is revealed in both the material and the spiritual world, whose greatness dazzles and transports us the more as we penetrate deeper and deeper into the mysteries of this wonderful world, which surrounds us, and of which we ourselves are a part. But while we thus sink into nothingness before a glory for which we have no name, we yet know ourselves in our inward life to be akin to God, we think His thoughts after Him, we strive to judge as we think He judges, yea, mysterious and passing wonderful as it must be, we try to realise His mind, the love or hate He cherishes, what He feels, how He is rejoiced or grieved; and we converse with Him, the Infinite, as it were with a familiar friend, speaking with Him face to face, with the trust and quiet confidence of children. Yet at the same time, we feel ourselves held as with an iron hand; God calls us to work unwearying, demands our devotion at heavy cost, insists on the sacrificing of delight, even the most winsome, claims purity of life and the strictest performance of duty, spurs us to the most arduous exertion of all our powers, and offers us the inducement of the highest bliss—the blessedness of seeing Him, the incomparably exalted One, and holding communion with Him.

To feel something of this, though it be but intermittently, to try to quicken it in our hearts and express it, if possible, in words, is common to us with the devout of many countries and ages, with all who have known anything of the glory, holiness, and love of God. But we as liberal thinkers and workers, form a group of a special kind in their midst.

Distinction of Liberal Religion.

This it is that distinguishes us: we recognise no external revelation as having come either to us or to any other. When we would give an account of our belief in God, would declare what is our destiny, our vocation, we do not point to a book, or to any human being whatever, but with the fullest conviction we search our own heart, our own reason. Fellow-men have helped and still help us; reverently we speak the names of heroes of the faith, of ancient and of recent times, gratefully we acknowledge that there have been and still are those who have seen the divine before we saw it, who have pointed it out to us, saying: Behold! and now we see it too. But we must see it for ourselves; neither word nor example of others binds us; nor do we acknowledge their leadership, if our own reason and our own hearts bear other witness. We trust our own powers of learning to know God, and believe that all men must be trained to this spiritual freedom and independence.

Difficulties of the Position.

To be religious in this sense is no easy task. That we are in a minority almost everywhere, does not grieve us so much because it sometimes involves social neglect and a subordinate place in the ecclesiastical world. No doubt we are annoyed and even pained when we have to suffer personally, or when we see that the highest interests of our fellow-men are injured by the fact that our numbers are so inferior to those of the dominant schools in church and state. But what is far more painful is that the smallness of our numbers puts our personal faith to so hard a test. And this, undoubtedly, is the case. Never, perhaps, do we run a greater danger of being weak and conscious of our weakness, than when active in that sphere of high conceptions and pure emotions, wherein thought must ultimately admit its impotence and wherein our sensual nature often quenches the voice of the noblest and purest impulses and experiences. Therefore, in no other connection do we feel a deeper need of the support of others.

It sounds very fine to say we will not have any spiritual life that rests on hearsay, but, on the contrary, will see God for ourselves, and commune with Him, and feel His nearness; but we are not always in the mood which this requires, and, perhaps, cannot always be so. There are times when we feel God's presence, when our eye is clear, our hearts are uplifted, our will is strong, but these are only the heights of our existence, and oftentimes we sojourn in the plain, where our outlook is limited and the air is sultry. When our mood is commonplace, when commonplace things take possession of us, and sometimes our inward life is dimmed, then we believe in God simply on the authority of our own past experiences. This may be better than believing on the authority of others, but none the less the truth at such season is an external thing to us.

Trials of Faith.

It is worth much to have thought for ourselves and to keep on thinking upon the highest themes of life, and thereby to win sound, deep, fruitful, and approximately true solutions of the problems they present—in any case solutions that we ourselves have found; for it is only what we ourselves have thought out, and more or less lived out, that is our own, and that increases our wealth. But the enigmas that encompass us are many and hard of solution. To see the hand of God in material and spiritual Nature, that moves by fixed, inevitable laws, to believe in His omnipotence and wisdom as we contemplate a world where sin and misery perpetually celebrate their triumphs, and the good appears so weak, to believe in His love who will not leave one of the little ones to perish, and to whom every human soul has infinite worth, while we know that thousands and thousands are languishing and perishing in body and in soul—inexplicable prodigality of human lives and human souls, like the waste of spring, that brings forth numberless blossoms, that never come to maturity, and numberless insects to live but for a moment—in face of all this to hold fast to the love of God on the strength of our own conviction and our own insight, that is hard indeed.

* Translated from the Dutch, as delivered in the Hall of the Free Congregation, Weteringschans, on Wednesday morning, September 2.

Glorious it is to have the courage to say: "I am resolved to make out for myself what is good or what is evil, what I am to do and what to leave undone; no priest dictates it to me, no book teaches it to me. But though there are people who confidently declare that they know quite well what is good and what is evil, we for our part must often mournfully confess that we do not know. If it were enough to sketch in broad outline the characteristic differences between a good and a wicked man, so far our knowledge would reach; but when we have to decide on specific occasions what is good, nay, what is best, when to speak and when to keep silence, when to say no, which course to follow out of two or more that we might choose, then we feel how difficult, nay, how impossible it is to decide what is really best, and it is hard to be told: You must find it out for yourself! The loftier our flight, the greater our danger. We know the fate of Icarus, and time and time again we feel our poverty, our littleness, our loneliness:

The Younger Generation:

All this, I believe, presses more heavily on those who have never known the bond of a creed, Church, or authoritative tradition, than on those who have grown up under these influences, more heavily on the young than on the old. We elder ones spent our childhood and youth under the rule of authoritative doctrines, practices, and precepts. We may have departed far from them; refused to follow the guides of our younger years and declared their authority illegitimate, but this guidance, this instruction, this spiritual discipline we have had, and, to a greater extent than we are aware, we are influenced by it all. If this training has stamped certain prejudices upon us, it has also, beyond doubt, given us wholesome impressions and habits. Whereas the younger generations, growing up amidst liberal surroundings, have been told to think for themselves before they could think at all; not to lean on others, before even they had got their own feet. They have been nourished on Lessing's famous saying: Had I to choose between a knowledge of truth and the restless search for truth, without the chance of ever finding it, I would choose the latter—and they have repeated it enthusiastically, without realising that no human being can live by what he has still to seek, but only by what he has found. Hence, oftentimes, great perplexity. This younger generation often has a hard time, and when we elders witness their sweeping doubts, bold negations, and amazing assertions, we do not always realise, that the painful element in the state of mind they reveal is the great price they have to pay for their bringing up in the atmosphere of freedom. It is no wonder that in their impatience some of them throw themselves into the arms of an orthodox creed or Church; without light themselves, they think the only way is to walk by the light of others.

Yet Stand Fast.

But this we must not, we will not, we cannot do. However hard it may be to see, to think, to know and to decide for ourselves, yet with all this full in view we cry: A day in thy forecourts is better than a thousand elsewhere; I had rather stand on the threshold of the house of my God—seeing Him from afar, though convulsed at times with doubting, than find my home in the tabernacles of an ecclesiastical orthodoxy. In the long run it is not good to dwell there. Others may find peace there, but we have tasted of the tree of knowledge, and must take all the risks of liberty, however lonely we may be, however seldom we meet with sympathisers.

The Delight of Fellowship.

Yes, it is relatively seldom that we meet those of one mind with us. And it is good to dwell together, though it be only for a season; it comforts and strengthens us to know that brethren and sisters elsewhere have to meet the same difficulties, to fight the same fight, and to encounter the same dangers as we; for we are so ready to think that our troubles are unique, and it is salutary to know that these difficulties are unavoidable, that they belong to our standpoint and our tendencies of thought, and that we must meet and surmount them.

How it helps us when we can strengthen others! Bearing their burdens, our own become lighter and we are more strong to bear them. And best of all is it to witness the strength of faith in others, to see that in their measure they possess that courage and that gladness which we desire for ourselves. Something of all this may be imparted to us by books and periodicals. Which of us would underrate the blessings of the printing press? But side by side with this, how precious to see and to hear each other!

Welcome then to you who are to address us, sharing with us the fruits of your thought and your experience. But welcome also to you who are to listen and to give to the speakers the support of your interest and sympathy. Your very presence contributes to the harvest of our Congress. May we, all of us, be the better for our public meetings and our intercourse with one another.

I now declare the second Congress of liberal religious thinkers and workers open.

COUNCIL SERMON.

SOME NEEDS AND DANGERS OF THE LIBERAL MOVEMENT.*

BY THE REV. J. VAN LOENEN MARTINET.

Lesson: 1 Corinthians xiii.

WHILST gratefully appreciating the privilege of addressing you from this place on the eve of our Congress, I want, above all, to tell you how greatly we Dutch liberal religious thinkers rejoice that it was decided to hold the second International Congress in this country.

Would it not be like misplaced modesty on our part to overlook the fact that the scientific and religious life of Holland has been of some importance to the cause of liberal religion generally? We have been so often and so kindly assured how greatly this was appreciated, that it would be, to say the least of it, uncourteous to act as if we did not believe it.

Besides, we should feel it an injustice on our part to the grateful memory of eminent fellow-countrymen to whom we liberal religious thinkers owe so much for our training and our life. And, therefore, as a homage also to them we have joyfully hailed the decision of the previous Congress to meet here.

The Gain of Intercourse.

But equally so because we realise the great advantages this our meeting may bring us.

Whatever opinions the great Powers may hold as to free trade, to a small country like ours it appears to be of the highest material interest to open its frontiers as wide as possible to the imports of the whole world. But equally great is the need to open its gates wide for the exchange of spiritual goods. And though by reading of each other and each others' writings, we may, to a certain extent, keep up this exchange, yet book and newspaper become much more intelligible and impressive after we have heard each others' words, seen each others' faces, and listened, as it were, to the beatings of each others' hearts. Belief in one another, like all other belief, must come through hearing, and even more through seeing one another, and the sympathetic touch of fellow-feeling.

Orthodox Aloofness.

We may not assure those who have come to us from across the frontiers, or from beyond the seas, that they would be equally welcome to the Dutch nation as a whole. They ought to be aware of this, that, as everywhere else, so here liberal religious thinkers are a minority. This has been so always, and everywhere, in Holland with the rest, for all the glory we may have in our liberal institutions. What is called an official reception by the Magistrates of Holland's capital is not tendered to our Congress. This would be different, should we meet as naturalists, or as linguists or oculists, or for whatever other purpose it might be; perhaps even if we should ask for hospitality in this good city of ours as an Evangelical Alliance. Our Magistrates, however, with almost painful scrupulousness, do maintain a certain measure of neutrality. We understand, we appreciate it, and at any rate acquiesce in it. But also our Christian circles generally (who does not know it ?) do not look with favour on the meeting of our Congress. That is in the nature of things, because of their different principals ; besides, the time is not opportune. We have a Government which calls itself "Christian" par excellence, and the result in the spiritual atmosphere, even of those who are not of one mind with the Government, seems to be what our meteorologists would call a depression. The Christianity here referred to is that which cannot be broad-minded, as we understand it ; and besides, this Christianity looks upon our liberal religion as directly connected with the economic-political disturbances of the first months of this year. : : :

* Preached in the Old Walloon Church, Amsterdam, on Tuesday evening, Sept. 1.

No Ground for Timidity.

But some of you perhaps are saying : Why remind us of all this ?

For two reasons.

First : ever since we were children the name of Jesus has awakened in us the most sacred emotion. We may have outgrown certain Christian doctrines, still our religious life has its roots in Christianity and owes to it its nourishment and stability. And if there are those who make an exclusive claim upon the Christian name, to shut us out from the Christian circle, that we regard as a mistake or arrogance on their part, and our protest against it is, "We also are of Christ." And if anyone should think, "What is in a name ?" our answer is : We too have a feeling for what we owe to our origin, a tradition that we hold in honour.

And secondly : there is a faith that alternately wakens our envy, on account of its unshakableness, and fills us with aversion on account of its narrowness ; by the boldness of its attitude and the decisiveness of its verdicts, branding others as heretics, it too often succeeds in cowing and laming them, and many with fatal weakness allow themselves to be driven by it into a corner.

Let it not be so with us, brethren. Should there be any such timid ones among us—have we not come together to instruct, improve, and strengthen one another ; to deepen our spiritual insight, to clear up and broaden our views as liberal religious thinkers ; and with becoming modesty, even with the shame, perhaps, that should be ours, to encourage in one another a higher ideal of life, awakened and quickened in us by the word of God, until, indestructible in itself, it shall have become to us the inviolable law of our lives, as well as the source of imperturbable strength and inextinguishable joy ?

Faith, Hope, Love, are Ours.

For us also abide Faith, Hope, Love, these three.

Faith, howsoever its conceptions may be modified by influences not due to any wilfulness of ours.

Hope, in whatever different shapes it may go before us on the way that God leads us.

Love, however various may be the manifestations and applications, which different times and circumstances demand.

These three, the sum of what are to us the highest possessions of our life.

"But now abideth Faith, Hope, Love, these three,"—and of these Love is pointed out as the greatest, the Love to which the sublime hymn in 1 Cor. xiii. is consecrated.

Should we have to assume that the same pen wrote those other words : "Whosoever shall preach unto you any gospel other than that which we preached unto you, let him be anathema"—words which during a succession of centuries have called forth such a tremendous echo—then we should have to find the solution of what appears a painful contradiction in the profoundest depths of the author's mind. This, however, is a question which does not concern us now.

Neither do we linger over that other point, that the writer commends Love as the greatest gift of the Holy Spirit, even above what he calls the gift of speaking with tongues, and the gift of prophecy. Did we do so, we should have to deal circumstantially with the spiritual life and its characteristics as found in the Corinthian community.

"Now that I am Become a Man."

You will not, I trust, consider it too arbitrary on my part if I emphasise that remaining of faith, hope, and love, and in immediate connection with those other words : "when I was a child, I spake as a child, I felt as a child, I thought as a child, now that I have become a man, I have put away childish things."

When I was a child . . . . A child feels at one with the world about him, and takes it joyously and simply as it appears to his ingenuousness. And a great change is worked in him, when, growing up into manhood, he becomes aware of his separate personality, set over against the surrounding world, and as a rational, moral, spiritual being contemplates the world with an analytic and critical understanding, making his demands, after the manner of such personality.

Human history, as a whole, tells of this ; and what mankind has experienced in the progress of the ages, repeats itself to a certain extent within the short span of each individual life. Now it would be strange, if religious life should occupy a quite separate place in our existence, were it to remain untouched by these changes. The history of religion, however, and our own personal religious experience also, furnish proofs of this growing up from childhood into manhood.

Growth and its Consequences.

During this process there is that which comes to nothing and that which remains. Take your own life, for instance—you who now desire to penetrate to the centre of the universe, to search out its very essence, and how it is put together, who seek perhaps some standing ground outside the world, whence to move it from its centre—you are still conscious of being the same personality that in childhood picked the flowers and chased the butterflies in sunny meadows. Wonderful mystery of our consciousness of self, still a mystery to all science !

Now there are periods in the history of mankind, when the consciousness of this change "from child to man" becomes clear, and questions arise that demand a decisive answer.

If I am not mistaken, such a period of religious and moral life dawned on the older men amongst us, and the younger are still in the midst of it.

There is that which passes away and must pass away, and there is that which remains. To see this clearly and to account clearly for it, does not this prove us to be liberals ? The joyful recognition of what remains, the grateful acceptance of it, the warm appropriation of it do not these stamp us as religious ?

Even Dr. van Oosterzee, though a spokesman of our orthodox party, freely acknowledged the apologetic tendency of the Modern Theology in his day ; he recognised its desire to maintain and to protect religion and its claims. The cry raised by the zealots amongst the watchmen in Zion must have been loud indeed to make us grateful even for such an acknowledgment and appreciation.

Dangers of the Change.

The liberal religious party generally, accepting this testimony, ought, however, not to be blind to the dangers connected with this tendency.

Whoever defends what is dear to him, may do it at the cost of what ought to be precious above all else.

There is difference of nationality, of ecclesiastical tradition, of personal characteristics, there is great variety among us, as a matter of course leading to difference of interpretation in religious matters. There are those for whom things have disappeared which others cannot do without. Some have put away what others keep with true and careful affection. History and knowledge of the world have had with some a greater, with others a lesser, influence on the conceptions of faith, and lead us often into different paths. In this there is nothing really strange or disquieting. All that is required is that each one shall determine for himself what can permanently bear the test of genuine piety and truth. But for all of us, liberal religious thinkers, remains Faith, as belonging to that part of our being, wherefrom the soul of man looks out towards the unseen world, the world which does not come under the dominion of sense-perception, however we may describe or name it. Communion with this world is a source of consolation, strength and peace, the touch of it is felt as a redeeming, reconciling, sanctifying Power. Thus, amid all changes, the soul is brought to dwell in the kingdom which cannot be shaken, in the Eternal City, in the Father's House.

Hope Always Vindicated.

Hope remains, but here also we have to put away childish things.

Among the sermons of Frederick Robertson, of Brighton, which my elder brethren know, and which are commended to those of a younger generation, there is one on "The Illusiveness of Life," in which he points out that, amidst all the delusions and disappointments of life, hope, which reaches out to the City, "whose builder and maker is God," always vindicates its right to be.

This is realised in a different and higher sense than human expectation has pictured. If I may be allowed to mention our own limited experience in this respect, is there not an instance of this in the ecclesiastical and religious conditions of our country?

The expectations we entertained some thirty or forty years ago as to the prospects of liberal religious principles in the Dutch Reformed Church, appear to have grown more hopeless every day. It seems more and more likely that the words of Hooykaas Herderschee shall come true, that in this instance also the grain of wheat must fall into the earth and die in order to bear fruit.

The Growing Seed.

Notice the springing up of the seed of liberal principles in the fields of orthodoxy. Their fruit shall ripen, the harvest will come in due time.

Notice, how among those whom we have thought to win for the church, and who, on the contrary, keep aloof from what is generally called positive religion, a longing is revealed for things superior to sensual pleasures, intellectual self-gratification, and æsthetic refinement, a rustling of awakening life.

For all the endeavours of faith, hope remains, making us disregard ourselves, our party and party-feelings, to fix our eyes upon the mountain of the Lord and the heights shining in the eternal light.

Our persons, our party and party-feelings, what are they?

Like the waves on the beach they are, when the tide is coming in. Foaming and splashing in the surge, each wave comes separately in breaking upon the shore, retreats; rolling backward, to all appearances not gaining any ground. But at the same time, filling creeks and inlets, majestically and silently rises the level of the sea.

Love, Full-Grown.

So abideth Hope, and Love abideth.

Yes, and this also has to put away many childish things. Necessarily it must outgrow everything that would identify it with merely sensuous sympathy, tenderheartedness without moral strength, charity that overlooks the claims of justice, regarding it as superfluous. Its ideal surpasses even that suggested in the parable of the King who bequeathed to his followers the naked, the hungry and the thirsty, that in these they might clothe and feed, and quench the thirst of himself (Matt. xxv.). And if you remind me that the picture of Love in 1 Cor. xiii. and the compassionate love of Christ in the Gospels, towers far above it, yes, truly, there it is the full-grown messenger of heaven. And as this love takes up its abode in human hearts, it brings with it a delicate tact and tenderness and charitable sympathy, a personal devotion and readiness for sacrifice. But at the same time it will open the eyes to all that is taught by modern science concerning man and society, all that experience shows us of the close connection between social needs and the spiritual life in all its compass. And it will embody itself also in the laws and institutions of the state, in the ordering of society, fulfilling the word of Christ to his disciples: "The works that I do shall ye do also; and greater works than these shall ye do."

The Supreme Need.

"But now abideth Faith, Hope, Love, these three," being the sum of what are for us the highest possessions of our life.

As such they must be acknowledged by us, accepted as a rule of life and secured as our independent possession in spite of the hostile powers in and around us. When they have become ours by the prayerful appropriation of a pious soul, the brave grasp of a determined spirit, the manly refusal of all that could hurt or deprive us of them, soon—O gift of Divine Grace!—they will be to us the crown of our lives.

We must have personal possession of these things, if we are to be ready according to our opportunities to make them known and to share them with others, if we are to bear witness to their worth in face of the temptations and the frensy of sensual pleasures, in the midst of the sins and the sore needs of society. For ourselves also it is necessary, that we may withdraw our own poor souls from the hindrances of temporal things, and set them free from all that prevents their rising up to God, who seeks, and calls, and draws us to Himself.

And its Attendant Danger.

Do you say that among us this consciousness is too much lacking, that barrenness and dulness reign in our midst? Do you complain that the people is desolate, because there is no prophetic vision, that argument has taken the place of inspiring testimony, and with a handful of philosophy gathered by the way, and offered for religion, gives the people stones instead of bread?

We hear the complaint, and who does not understand it?

But if there are those amongst us, who would separate themselves as children of the light from those whom they do not indeed regard as children of darkness, but yet as deprived of the Light, I implore you, Brethren, have a care what you do. Let history be to us the school which God Himself opens to us. Take care that, in shutting out Jan Rap,* whom you despise on account of his bragging impudence, you do not draw in Tartuffe, whose hypocrisy you loathe. Your cry for prophets might produce such as shall become wind, because, though they speak your word, the Word is not in them (Jer. v. 13). Intellectualism is to you a dry barren plain. Mind that you are not seduced by the luxuries of the mystic garden. You do not intend to buy the favour of the people, yet at the same time do you equally abstain from trying to win them at the cost of what, in all critical times, is the supreme need—the inviolable love of truth, and unclouded purity of heart before God?

One Body.

Now, Brethren, there are diversities of gifts; and the heart of man shall not say to his reason: I have no need of thee. Nor shall the will of man say to his feelings: I have no need of thee. The whole man must grow up to maturity and stand as a hero, in the power of the Lord, putting away childish things, not looking back with childish longing to what can only belong to childhood.

Finally, there is a sacred longing that owes its existence to the passion for sacred things, but may be turned into an unhallowed passion, if it does not learn to "wait for the Lord." "So is the kingdom of God as if a man should cast seed upon the earth and should sleep." We must be content to sleep, whilst God in the quiet night passes over the fields and causes the seed to spring up.

"When I was a child."

What is the characteristic charm of childhood? Is it not that the child looks round with big, wondering eyes upon the great world spread out before him, ready to receive its manifold impressions?

Ah, yes, and in the child there is that which ought never to perish in us.

Whether fame or insignificance be ours, whether we be rich or poor in knowledge, with mental or practical capacity, may we ever keep the childlike soul, that looks with eager longing into the secrets of God's wonderful world, always open to receive its manifold impressions.

Heavenly Father, do away with all that is little, untruthful, and sinful in us, and make us wholly Thy children. Amen.

In the Rev. F. C. Fleischer's article on "Religious Liberalism and the Dutch Protestant Churches" last week, speaking (on p. 578) of the Protestantenbond, it is said that this society unites "about 1,900 liberals of every denomination for the promotion of free religious thought and life." The number is wrong, and should have been 19,000.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Blackpool (North Shore).—Last Sunday the Rev. S. A. Steinthal preached the choir sermons morning and evening to large congregations. Anthems were given by the choir, and solos by Miss Bluck and Messrs. J. E. W. Dugdale and C. Pollard. Messrs. Ashworth and Hartley also contributed solos on the obse and 'cello. A children's service was held in the schoolroom in the afternoon, when the Rev. A. Cobden-Smith conducted the devotional part, and the Rev. S. A. Steinthal gave a delightful address to the children.

Scarborough.—The anniversary services of the Westborough Unitarian Church were conducted on Sunday by the Rev. John Page Hopps. Mr. Hopps preached in the morning on "The duty of the Church to teach," from the text "Thy people are destroyed for lack of knowledge" (Hosea iv. 6). He said a wider and truer knowledge of God and the harmonies of His natural and spiritual laws will bring about the removal of sin and consequent misery, which were caused by ignorance of and conflict with these laws. The duty of all Churches was to foster this wider and truer knowledge. In the evening, taking "King Jesus" as the subject of his discourse, the preacher contrasted the kingdom of Jesus and the kingdom of Cæsar as representing the ideals of self-surrender and self-assertion respectively; and, applying the old facts to modern conditions of commercial and social intercourse, pleaded vehemently that we should fight strenuously for the kingdom of Jesus. There were large congregations at both services, the number of attenders in the evening (when extra seating accommodation had to be provided) being the largest since the Rev. Stopford Brooke preached in the church on a week evening some years ago.

HOLBECK, LEEDS.—Domestic-street Unitarian Church. Pulpit vacant. Applications invited.—Apply to the Secretary, GEO. A. REASON, Daisy-hill, Rawdon, Leeds.

* Jan Rap = a scoffer. Vide P. A. de Genestet. "Lay Poems," X.

Board and Residence.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged.—Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

BOURNEMOUTH. — ARNEWOOD. En Pension. Grand position in West Cliff-road; sea views; South aspect; close to Winter Gardens, Promenade, and Pier.—Apply, MANAGERESS.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH, DEVONSHIRE.

A HOLIDAY RESORT FOR YOUNG LADIES OR SCHOOL-GIRLS, WITH OR WITHOUT CHAPERON.

Charming little Devonshire town. Perfect Sanitation. Sea and Moorland. Bracing air. Walks, excursions, picnics, splendid bathing. Main line G.W.R.

Terms and other particulars from THE PROPRIETOR.

NEWQUAY, CORNWALL.—Hazell Mount, Bay View Terrace. Sea and country view. APARTMENTS.—Mrs. VICKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2½% repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES

Purchased and sold for customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

BIRTH.

COOK.—On the 28th August, at 112, Addison Gardens, W., the wife of Herbert Cook, of a son.

MARRIAGES.

CARTER—GREEN.—On August 29th, Herbert Spencer, second son of William Carter, of Parkstone, Dorset, to Hilda Louise, only daughter of Samuel Love Green, of Sanderstead, Surrey.

VAUGHAN — TOULMIN SMITH. — On the 1st September, at Manchester College, Oxford, by Rev. Joseph Wain, Rev. Frank Heming Vaughan, of Hull, only son of E. K. Vaughan, of Bristol, to Alice Olga, only daughter of Arthur Toulmin Smith, of Moscow.

SILVER WEDDING.

FENTON—HUMPHRIES.—On the 3rd September, 1878, at the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Wootton Bassett, Charles Fenton, of the India Office, Whitehall, eldest son of Simeon Fenton, of Bury St. Edmunds, to Lena, second daughter of the late Jacob Humphries, of Wootton Bassett.

DEATH.

THOMAS.—On Sept. 1st, at his residence, Ivor House, Bristol, Herbert Thomas, J.P., in the 84th year of his age. No flowers, by request.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, September 6.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton. Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M., Mr. E. BRIDGER ATHAWES, "Prayer."

Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.

Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M and 7 P.M., Rev. F. W. STANLEY.

Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. V. MILLS.

Deptford, Church-street, 11.15 A.M. and 6.30, Rev. A. J. MARCHANT,

Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M., Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON, M.A.

Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.

Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. R. H. U. BLOOR.

Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. COLLINS ODGERS, M.A.

Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. R. H. GREAVES.

Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. F. B. MOTT.

Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.

Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.

Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.

Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7.0 P.M., Rev. FREDERIC ALLEN.

Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Rev. JOHN ELLIS.

Peckham, Avondale-rad, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. G. CARTER.

Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.

Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M.

Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.

Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M. Evening service suspended until Sept. 13th.

Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M., Mr. W. J. HAWKINS, and 6.30 P.M., Mr. J. T. SALT.

Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, East-hill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. A. THORNHILL, B.A.

Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Dr. MUMMERY.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. McDOWELL.

BEDFORD, Library (side room). Vacation.

BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.

BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Church, The Hall, Lytham-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. M. DARE.

BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. H. ROSE.

BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET.

CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., Rev. J. REMINGTON WILSON, M.A.

DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.

GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. GARDNER PRESTON.

HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. J. MARTEN.

LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS.

LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. ERNEST PARRY.

LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. J. JUPP.

LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. PHILEMON MOORE, M.A.

PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.

PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 P.M., Mr. THOMES BOND.

SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M.

SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.

SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.

SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church Tyler-street, 7 P.M.

TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

WINDERMERE, Albert Hall, Cross-street, 11 A.M., Rev. J. A. PEARSON.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.

WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M., Mr. J. ISLAN JONES, B.A.

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH,

SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F. Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS.

SOUTH-PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.—Sept. 6, at 11.15 A.M. DR. KARL LEUTZNER. "The essentials of Literature."

NUT FOODS.

The following Nut Foods are specially suited for the hot season:—

Banana and Nut Food, 7d., 1/-, and 1/4 per Tin. A new delicious food made from ripe fresh Bananas and Nuts. Can be sliced for sandwiches, or used as cheese.

Almond Cream, 3½d., 1/-, and 1/10 per Tin. Unrivalled as an accompaniment for fresh or stewed fruit.

Malted Nuts, 2d., 6½d., and 1/- per tin. Promotes digestion of all cereal food.

Full descriptive Price List from the Manufacturer:

HUGH MAPLETON,
COLONIAL HOUSE, ARDWICK GREEN, MANCHESTER.

FREDK. LONG & SON,

AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,

4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

ST. JACOBS OIL

..CURES..

Rheumatism Backache Feetache
Neuralgia Headache All Bodily Aches.

Price 1/1½ and 2/6, of all Chemists.

CONQUERS PAIN.

Schools, etc.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN,
NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON
(Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, BISHOP'S STORTFORD.
Head Mistress, Miss ESTHER CASE, Certificated Student of Girton College, Cambridge, Classical Tripos.
Next Term begins on September 17th.

VACANCY for one Boarder, not under 12, in September. A high percentage with Public Examinations has been gained. In July eight pupils passed R.A.M. and R.C. Associated Boards (Local Schools), one aged 14 gaining distinction in Higher Division. Music or Art can be made a speciality. Excellent references.—PRINCIPALS, Bestreben High School for Girls, Brondesbury, N.W.

LIDGETT PARK SCHOOL for GIRLS.
North Park Avenue, Roundhay, LEEDS.

Principals, Miss SHUTE, B.A., and Miss BLOK (Training College, Leyden).

House healthily situated. Boarders taken.

CHANNING HOUSE, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N.
HIGH SCHOOL for GIRLS
and UNITARIAN BOARDING SCHOOL.
("Recognised" by the Board of Education.)
COMMITTEE OF MANAGEMENT.

F. J. NETTLEFOLD, Esq.
Mrs. BLAKE ODGERS.
F. PRESTON, Esq.
W. A. SHARPE, Esq.
Mrs. W. A. SHARPE.
HAROLD WADE, Esq.
Mrs. WILLIAM WOODING.

Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A. Honours Lond., Head Mistress.

BOARDERS' FEES:
Fifty Guineas a year, and Seat in Chapel One Guinea. Music, Six Guineas extra: or £17 17s. a term: with Music, £19 19s.
Ministers' Daughters £10 13s. 6d. a term, or with Music, £12 5s.

Outside Sanatorium, Laundry at Home, Electric Light. Good Playground and Garden. Tennis, Hockey (in field hired near School).
Opportunities afforded for Sight-seeing, Concerts, &c.

The Terms include Board, Lodging, necessary Laundry, all class lessons up to London Matriculation, Drawing, Class-singing, Physical Drill, Divinity.

Extras.—Music, Shorthand, Type-writing, Dancing, Gymnastics, Cooking.

Day Scholars, 3 to 5 Guineas a term; Music 1½ Guineas extra. Kindergarten, 2 to 2½ Guineas a term.

Next Term begins Sept. 16th.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

"The College adheres to its original principle of freely imparting theological knowledge without insisting upon the adoption of particular theological doctrines."

PRINCIPAL:
REV. J. DRUMMOND, M.A., LL.D., D.Lit.

For particulars as to Lectures and Bursaries for Students for the Ministry, apply to the Principal, or to one of the undersigned:—

Secretaries { H. ENFIELD DOWSON, Gee Cross, near Manchester. / A. H. WORTHINGTON, 1, St. James-square, Manchester.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOHNSON, Pier-street.

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS
By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

DAILY MEDITATIONS
(Fourth Edition Revised.)

NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.
Cloth, red edges, 6d.; roan gilt, 1s.
PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.
Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

"THE MILL HILL PULPIT."

VOL. XI., No. 12.—"THE NEW POPE."
A Sermon by
Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A. (Leeds).
Price 1d.—A new Volume commences with the October number. One copy of each monthly issue posted to any address for 1s. 6d. per annum. A complete catalogue of the last 11 years printed numbers sent free.—CHAS. STAINER, 82, Ravenswood-terrace, Hyde Park, Leeds.

POPULAR SERVICES FOR THE PEOPLE.

CARLTON THEATRE, GREENWICH, S.E.
Sundays, Oct. 11, 18, 25, and Nov. 1.
GRAND THEATRE, ISLINGTON, N.
Sundays Nov. 8, 15, 22, and 29.

HELPERS WANTED.
Stewards, Canvassers, Members of Choirs, &c.
Please write to
Mr. GEO. CALLOW, Fern Villa, Morley-road, Lewisham.
Mr. A. WILSON, 2, Ella-road, Crouch-hill, N., or
Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, 18, Gardnor-Mansions, Church-row, Hampstead, N.W.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY, ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.
Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17 Mincing-lane, E.C.
Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.
F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.
Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.
STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

MR. JOHN HARWOOD is prepared to give DRAMATIC RECITALS of two hours' duration to Societies connected with our own Churches and Schools, upon exceptional terms. Selections from Dickens's "Christmas Carol," "Cricket on the Hearth" (original adaptations), Shakspere, Colman, Sheridan, and other Authors; also a novel "Lecture," entitled "The Art of Public Recitation: its Humours and Difficulties—a Leaf from my own Experience," followed by one hour of illustrative Recitals.
Address, Fair View, Pendleton, Manchester.

Situations, etc.

WANTED, a well-educated Young Lady, as Companion to an elderly lady. Unitarian. 20 to 25. Good reader.—Address Mrs. B., Thorn Lea, Bolton.

YOUNG LADY seeks post as Maid to elderly lady. Unitarian. Nursing experience. Massage.—M., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, W.C.

TYPIST required for small General Copying Office. Must be well educated, and do clean, correct work; also a PUPIL to prepare for vacancy.—Write fullest particulars to Miss A. BECKS, 50, Rupert-street, Shaftesbury-avenue, W.

EXPERIENCED GOVERNESS seeks daily (any district) or resident engagement. Advanced subjects; fluent French and German; Italian; music, singing, drawing, painting. Eight years' reference.—G., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, W.C.

AS ORGANIST.—A Minister's Daughter, having had many years' experience, requires a position as above.—Address, Organist, INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, W.C.

COMPANION, Nurse-Attendant. Superior woman; capable, active. Middle age. Assist light duties. Good reference. Salary £16.—C., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, W.C.

WANTED, by Lady Artist, Home in family, partial board on very moderate terms, in return for Evening Lessons in Painting and French. S.W. district preferred.—M. F. H., 7, Roehampton-street, Vauxhall-bridge-road.

GOVERNESS, Resident, seeks re-engagement. Certificated English, Drawing, Sciences, French, Music, Drill. Or as Secretary, Companion.—ELLINGHAM, Thorpe St. Andrew, Norwich.

LADY offers her services for light duties of any kind, in return for board, lodging and laundry. French, German (Paris 5 years).—N. M., 28, Alexandra-road, Southport.

CHAPEL-KEEPER and Wife Wanted to undertake all usual duties, including considerable cleaning; must be strong, obliging, and of thoroughly good character. Previous experience desirable, but not essential. Wages 30s. a week.—Address (giving references and full particulars), H. J. R. HERFORD, 1, Frognal-gardens, Hampstead, N.W, CULLOMPTON, Thursday, Sept. 17th.—Bazaar, at Parish Rooms, in Aid of Fund for Chapel Improvements and New Organ. To be opened at 2 P.M., by P. J. WORSLEY, Esq., B.A., J.P. Friends cordially invited.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses.—For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

MICROSCOPES, second-hand, excellent condition, from one-third original cost. Slides, great variety, best makers, from 3s. per doz. Write for particulars, THE NEW AGE PRESS, 8, John-street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

ADVERTISER seeks mutual help in a scheme (self-supporting) of Rational Teaching and Living.—Address, E. OWEN, c/o 88, Manor-road, Fratton-road, Portsmouth.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, Sept. 5 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3194. NEW SERIES, No. 298.] LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 601
ARTICLES—
Passive Resistance 602
The Dom of Dantzig 605
LITERATURE—
Articles in the Reviews 602
Wordsworth 603
Goldwin Smith's Essay on Jesus 604
LEADER—
In One Spirit: Friends and Fellow Workers 608
AMSTERDAM MEETINGS:
The Chronicle Concluded 608
Dr. Eliot's Paper 612
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 607
OBITUARY—
Mr. Herbert Thomas 606
CORRESPONDENCE—
Bible for the Practical Man 603
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 614
ADVERTISEMENTS 615

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE completed record of the International Council meeting at Amsterdam will be found in our present issue, together with Dr. S. A. Eliot's paper on "Liberal Religion in America." Next week we mean to publish Mr. Carpenter's paper on "The Place of Christianity among the Religions of the World"; in the following week, Mr. Wicksteed's on "The Revived Interest in Mediæval Religion," and Mr. Armstrong's on "The Conception of God as the 'Soul of all Souls.'"

WHEN one thinks of all the labour that must have gone to perfecting the arrangements for the meeting of the Council in Amsterdam, and of the abundant and most generous kindness of our hosts, words of thanks seem very poor. But our friends must have felt how deep was the appreciation of all that they did, and of the spirit of their welcome. At Haarlem Mr. Wicksteed spoke words of deep feeling on behalf of the English visitors, and at the closing session Mr. Carpenter, as former president, spoke for all the members of the Council from other countries. We cannot attempt here any further words, but ask to be associated with all that they expressed. The English visitors owe a special debt of gratitude to Mr. Ion Pritchard, who, with Mr. Bowie, generously devoted so much time and care to making the way easy and pleasant for them.

THE proceedings of the International Council were fully noticed by the leading papers in the Netherlands from day to day while the meetings lasted. Het Vaderland, Het Nieuws van den Dag and the Nieuwe Rotterdamsche Courant in particular, had good reports and articles of intelligent appreciation. The Courant of Friday week reprinted from the Hervorming a Dutch translation of Mr. Wicksteed's article, "My First Visit to Holland," which appeared in THE INQUIRER of Aug. 29, and has given much pleasure to our Dutch friends. The Hervorming of Aug. 29 had a special supplement devoted to an account of the chief representatives of the International Council and readers of papers, giving portraits and biographical notes of twenty-five men. The supplement, which can be had separately for 10 cents, forms a pleasant souvenir of the Amsterdam meetings.

DR. RENDAL HARRIS, who, with his wife, has returned from a visit to Armenia, has felt obliged, with great regret, to decline the appointment to the professorship of New Testament and Early Christian Literature in the University of Leiden, just vacated by Professor van Manen. Dr. Rendal Harris is pledged to other work in connection with Mr. George Cadbury's new foundation at Birmingham.

THE Trade Union Congress has met at Leicester this week in circumstances which give a peculiar interest to its deliberations. Political excitement is growing steadily throughout the country in view of the coming general election and the momentous issues then to be fought out, and the Trade Congress represents a great and influential body of electoral opinion. The efforts of the Labour leaders have signally failed to obtain from the present Parliament such a change in the law as shall restore to them the right of effectual collective bargaining, of which they were robbed by the recent decisions in the Law Courts. This alone would be likely to secure a large turnover of labour votes from the side of the Government to the side of its opponents. And to this must be added the popular discontent with the Government's education policy, the coquetting of its members with Protectionism, and the recent revelations of the gross mismanagement of the war—in all of which labour has its own very direct and vital concern.

BUT having decided that they are against the Government, the workers are faced with the problem how best to give practical effect to their hostility. It is scarcely to be wondered at that after recent betrayals by well-clothed demagogues, the demand should be raised for the larger representation of the industrial classes by members of their own order. Such a demand is the natural outcome of democratic institutions, and wise people will accept it with the best grace they may, relying upon the lead which must, in the long run, inevitably be conceded, even under the purest democracy, to intellect and education, whether clothed in broadcloth or in fustian. The chief concern of all who desire the exclusion of sacerdotalism from our public educational system, the defeat of the attack on the people's food, and a return to a foreign policy which does not bring shame upon our name, must be that the new movement may be so guided as to secure a minimum of waste through sectional differences among the forces now being mobilised to secure these changes.

"WHILE at present it is impossible to obtain any precise figures, at the revolutionary headquarters it is estimated that between 30,000 and 40,000 Bulgarian men, women, and children have perished by the Turkish sword [in the Monastir vilayet alone], while at least as many more of those who fled from their villages to escape the massacres are now slowly dying of hunger. Official circles [in Sofia] regard these figures as rather under than over estimated, and incline to the belief that the number of the massacred will exceed 50,000. The Turks are described as being apparently determined to exterminate the entire Bulgarian population of the vilayet."

SUCH is the appalling news with which this week Reuter's agent at Sofia lifts at last the veil which has for so long hung over the doings of the Turk in the vilayet of Monastir. Where the Turkish soldiers have met the armed insurgents the latter appear on the whole to have had the best of it, and the revolt has spread through, practically, the whole of Turkey in Europe outside the capital. But the insurgents are no match, in actual numbers, for the 350,000 soldiers and Bashi-Bazouks, and it is when they have passed on, in their strategy, to raise fresh districts, that the Turks have fallen upon the defenceless non-combatants left in their wake and have taken their revenge by proxy. This is apparently what has happened in Monastir, and no doubt with their overwhelming preponderance in numbers the Turks count upon its happening in other districts as well as they wear the insurgents down—if they are allowed to do so.

AND what has Christian Europe done to prevent or to parry this outbreak of Eastern barbarism? Nothing at all. On the contrary, by its coward's policy of "limiting the area of disturbance," it has directly contributed to the success of the Turkish plan of campaign. With frontiers marching with the frontiers of Macedonia is Bulgaria, peopled by the same race as the victims of this awful massacre. It is believed by competent observers that the well-trained and well-equipped army of Bulgaria, in conjunction with the seasoned insurgent forces in Macedonia, would be more than a match for the undisciplined rabble which goes by the name of an army in Turkey. Yet the whole weight of European diplomacy has been brought to bear to veto any movement on Bulgaria's part to come to the rescue of her kinsmen. This is what passes nowadays for a wise and prudent diplomacy. Yet what would be said of a strong man who, seeing a brigand falling upon a woman and her child, devoted his energies in the crisis solely to the task of holding back a bystander who, more courageous, if weaker, than himself, desired to go to their rescue?

THE disgrace of the Powers in thus acting as ringkeeper to the Turk is deep beyond words. To have left Bulgaria a free hand would have been some small mitigation of their criminality. But the one and only righteous course was and is to intervene in Macedonia, as they intervened in Bulgaria, in Greece, in Crete, and to have made the last of the European provinces independent of Moslem rule, in fact if not in name. That such a step will be taken in the end is still, we suppose, a virtual certainty. Whether, when that time comes, there will be any Bulgarians left for the foreshadowed Christian governor to rule over is another matter. The Powers have withheld their hand in order to see whether the Sultan could "restore order" without their help. It may be presumed that order now reigns in Monastir at least. Are they content to see the experiment continued and completed in the remaining vilayets?

THERE can be very few people indeed who will not rejoice at the defeat of Lord Penrhyn's peculiarly mean persecution of Mr. William John Parry, of Bethesda. In the course of his long struggle as leader and adviser of the quarrymen in their dispute with Lord Penrhyn, Mr. Parry made use of language concerning his opponent for which, rightly, no doubt, from the legal point of view, at any rate, he was mulcted in damages by a London jury. Not contented, however, with so far vindicating his character as a just and humane employer, Lord Penrhyn, with the aid of his riches, has pursued his demand for the payment of damages and costs from his ill-endowed opponent, even to the point of securing his bankruptcy and consequent disqualification for the offices of trust he holds among his neighbours. Even when it became evident that with a little time the whole of the money would be forthcoming time was refused; and it was "only by the splendid rally of the friends and admirers of Mr. Parry and the quarrymen, all over the country, that the adjudication of bankruptcy was prevented at the last moment. Lord Penrhyn has certainly not added lustre by his action to the cause of his order which he believes himself to be defending.

PASSIVE RESISTANCE.

MR. ARMSTRONG touches upon the thorny question of resistance to the education rate in his September issue of "Sermons for the Day." He says:—

My own strong natural bent would have been to join the band of passive resistants to the levying of rates for sectarian teaching at the public cost. Among the resistants are multitudes of men whom I honour with all my heart. There are multitudes of them to the nobility and purity of the motives of whom I would unhesitatingly pledge my word. I should feel it an honour to stand by their side.

For my own part, it is true, I have not been able to see my duty as they have seen theirs; and my conscience did not bid me refuse the rate, but rather bid me resist the strong temptation to refuse it. Yet I know that multitudes have refused it by clear and conscientious judgment.

But I feel, none the less, that every man who took that step was bound first of all rigorously to test his conscience, and to make quite sure within his heart that sectarian animosity, aversion to the sacerdotal hierarchy, a certain temper of self-assertion had laid no deflecting bias on his judgment.

For my part, if I felt it right to join the movement, I should have felt it necessary first of all to reason faithfully with myself, and see whether Nonconformist intolerance or political resentment might not secretly be imparting colour to my scruples.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

AN excellent number of The Contemporary Review opens with an article by Professor Dicey addressed "To Unionists and Imperialists," in which the writer seeks to show that "the new fiscal policy does not make for 'Imperialism,'" a term he apparently means to imply the closer cohesion of the states of the Empire. The task is not a difficult one, but no one following the present controversy can regard it as superfluous. Mr. J. A. Hobson, writing in his cogent way on "The Inner Meaning of Protectionism," declares that "the Imperialist policy of political expansion and its natural ally, the Protectionist policy of commercial contraction, are both enemies of international morality, in that they destroy the free self-expansion and intercourse of nations."

Mrs. Crawford writes entertainingly of her "Recollections of M. Thiers," and there is an article compiled from notes left by the late Sir Charles Gavin Duffy by his daughter on "The Real Carlyle." Its aim, of course, is to correct the warped conception of Carlyle's character created by the merciless dissections of Froude.

Human, not Superhuman.

He was the greatest intellect of his age. His life was given unsparingly to work which he intended to benefit mankind. He fostered the best principles of the best men of his generation by his teaching of duty; and, per contra, the human clay of which he was made, showed itself sometimes in a too bitter and unforgiving temper. But to complain of this is it not to complain that he was human, not superhuman?

Dr. Woods Hutchinson writes refreshingly on "Play as an Education." "Play," he says, "is simply the voluntary rehearsal and practising, under parental protection, of the actions and accomplishments upon which, later, existence itself will depend." Obviously, therefore, it is a thing to be encouraged from the educational point of view.

Dr. Hutchinson is, naturally, an admirer of "the wonderful though fitful genius of Froebel" and his Kindergarten:

My only criticism of the system is that it has become a system, almost a cult, a religious ceremonial, and that, enormous advance as it is, it does not go far enough. It does not trust nature quite sufficiently yet. It is a little inclined to load the natural play of the child with certain "instructive" elements, especially moral and mathematical (the square, the cube, the circle and their esoteric implications), far in advance of his grasp. And surely a real "child garden" should be in the open air! Modify it in these three aspects, and it would be ideal.

"Real" Playgrounds.

Then follows a delightful description of what the author would regard as constituting "real playgrounds," the first essential being that they should be "places where children could race and tear and scuffle as hard as ever they liked, without breaking or spoiling the looks of anything—where they might even 'make a mess,' within any reasonable limits, without reproof."

The Nineteenth Century and After opens with three articles from varying standpoints on "The Great Fiscal Problem," by Lord Avebury, Mr. Lionel Phillips, and Mr. W. H. Mallock. There is also an article on "The Native Labour Question," by Mr. Edgar P. Rathbone, Inspector of Mines under Mr. Krüger's Government. Its tone may be gathered from the assertion that, with a very few exceptions, the native has never been educated to a higher level of intelligence than that of a white child, and that, like a child, he is happier if, instead of being pampered and humoured through misplaced sentimentality, he is "submitted to strict discipline, accompanied by equally strict but just and humane treatment."

The American Deluge.

Miss Frances Albert Daughty writes interestingly on "The Small Family and American Society." She represents the small families of the American educated class as a tendency dictated by the desire to give the best educational equipment to their offspring, and so enable them to maintain their influence over the hordes of uneducated immigrants and their descendants, by which, numerically, they are in danger of being swamped.

Mrs. W. Kemp-Welch has some quaint extracts from the "Bestiaries" of mediæval Europe—the Christian allegories based on grotesque accounts of the supposed remarkable habits of the lion, the eagle, the whale, and their kindred.

The Monthly Review has secured "A View of the Fiscal Controversy" from no less a personage than the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach. There is an illustrated paper by Mr. H. Valentine Geere on "The American Excavations at Nippur." The Rev. C. R. Shaw-Stewart writes mystically on "The New Creation," on the text that "power is to be found in ideas rather than in things"; and Mr. Edward H. Hutton discourses on Walter Pater.

THE best prayer at the beginning of a day is, that we may not lose its moments.—John Ruskin.

WORDSWORTH.

A NEW STUDY FROM THE PEN OF PROFESSOR RALEIGH.*

THE cloud-mists gather often about the heights of Wetherlam and the Old Man of Coniston these August days, and rain falls in the vale of Esthwaite, when farmer and tourist would be grateful for the sun. But to be here, in a lowly cottage, with this volume, and an ancient copy of the "Prelude," and a few other books, is to be happily circumstanced, though one may regret the promise, made in a weak moment, to write a review.

To many who have loved Wordsworth long and reverenced him much, this latest study of him will be a great joy; to some who have hardly "found" him hitherto, it may prove a revelation. It is one of life's most glad surprises to have put into one's hand a fresh and luminous criticism of a poet who, for more than thirty years, has been dear to the heart as the coming of spring is dear—sweet and serious and restoring as the dawn of day can be. It is doubtless fortunate to come, as the present writer has come, from the reading of Professor Raleigh's "Milton," to the reading of his "Wordsworth." For he was assured then that the criticism would be strenuous, that the appreciation, if such there were, would be enlightened and sincere, that neither praise nor blame would be prejudiced or unavailing.

"To Understand and Not to Judge."

But the main purpose of this new study of a poet whose work has been so often and so variously appraised is, the Introduction tells us, not so much to judge as to understand. That part of criticism which seeks to discern between things excellent and things not so, to approve and to condemn, has been done, in behalf of Wordsworth.

> His cause is judged. His position is secure He has taken his rank high among the greatest. The finest part of his work has been separated from the inferior bulk, so that new readers of his poetry may make straight for the noblest numbers, without wasting time in reading what the poet, less happy than they, wasted time in writing. Is there anything worth doing, it may be asked, that yet remains to be done? No doubt, for the rougher purposes of justice, the cause is judged. But there will always remain a certain curious minority of the human race whose desire is not so much to judge a poet as to understand him. (P. 2.)

Questionable Statements.

The statement that the best of Wordsworth's poetry has been separated from the less inspired may be open to question. The great things of the "Prelude" and of the "Excursion" have not been thus dealt with, except as each reader has disengaged them for himself. And if we must have "selections," as in these times it seems we must, a little volume containing all the finer passages of those two long poems might help much to bring Wordsworth nearer to many who will not attempt them as a whole. His lovers might be grieved; but their sorrow would be others' gain.

Nor is it quite true to say that in writing so much that is of poorer quality, the poet was "wasting time." His own happiness, in all that he wrote during the last forty years of his life, may be sufficient apology. The great inspirations being upon him no more, or only at rare intervals, through those years, there was for him, perhaps, no better way in which to spend that long and innocent leisure than in plodding peacefully where once he soared in rapture or in dread. It is but the old man's privilege of walking the level plains when it is no longer possible to scale the heights. Let us not grudge him that sweet and self-sufficing joy, or call it "wasting time." Whether he was wise to publish all those unimpassioned musings is a different question. Only a very few of us are glad to possess, or able to read, all that Wordsworth wrote!

Insight and Sympathy.

But Professor Raleigh's effort is to understand and to interpret, and in such wise that we may know Wordsworth at his best, and hear the voice that sang when he was most illumined and inspired. That he has nobly succeeded in this will hardly be questioned by any serious mind. A strong penetrative insight and a vital sympathy with the spirit and temper of Wordsworth's life have enabled him to grasp much of the secret, and reveal much of the truth, of the poet's greater message to mankind.

> The history of the appreciation of any great poet exhibits itself, like the history of religion, in a series of revivals. From time to time, one man here and another there reads the classic page sincerely and simply, neglecting the commentators, and finds in it novelty and power. He puts aside the critical books. . . . and attempts to enter into closer sympathy of mind and heart with the first author. A new meaning shines for him in the old threadbare texts, and he begins to understand that a poet is not a purveyor to established tastes but a shaping and compelling force, a light thrown on the dark places of changeful human experience.

The Critic's Equipment.

> There are, no doubt, easier ways of reading than this. By the discrimination of a trained taste the most striking beauties of a volume of poems may be selected, and by the aid of a wide comparative learning they may be illustrated and annotated. But much of this work can be done by one who is half asleep, deaf to the music and impervious to the influence of the poet himself. Something of the freshness of emotion that went to the first making of the poem, something of the excitement, the glee, the passion, must be shared by the intending critic; if he is to understand what the poet meant, he must feel as the poet felt. (P. 225–6.)

This passage occurs near the close of Professor Raleigh's volume, and we may claim for him that he has approached his subject in the spirit of enlightened sympathy and fellowship of heart so well commended thus.

Perhaps the most striking and original chapter in the book is the one headed "Poetic Diction." Wordsworth's sincerity, his resolution to face the facts and be true to the reality of things, his refusal to let the glamour of imagination or sentiment hide the sterner aspects of nature and of human life, his courage and faith in presence of the dark inscrutable happenings and events of time, his acceptance of the world as given us here, with "man suffering amid awful forms," his confidence of joy in the ultimate good of all vital experience—all this Professor Raleigh brings home to his reader with singular force and freshness of illustration.

The Real Wordsworth.

To those—if indeed there be such still—who take Wordsworth as an easy-going optimist, the poet of daisies, lambkins and waterfalls, leisurely enjoying himself amid beautiful scenery, the Wordsworth of this volume, with his eye on the fact, and his heart braced for the endurance of fate's most stern realities, may seem an unfamiliar presence. Let them read Professor Raleigh's pages, and then turn to the greater poems, from the study of which the conclusion is reached:

> To feel deeply and sanely and wisely in the presence of things seen is what he teaches; but first, to see them. He had found deliverance for himself by opening his eyes on the world after a nightmare of dark, confused mental agitation, and he believed in truth as few men believe in it. His determination to look steadily on life made him intolerant of the myriad delusions "as thick as the motes that people the sunbeam," which intercept the eye and focus it on some nearer object than the face of truth. Hs does injustice to himself by describing the poet as one who throws "a certain colouring of the imagination" over common incidents and situations. The working of his own imagination, so long as it remained pure and strong, is ill compared to painting or to any light but the whitest. (P. 107.)

"The Light that Never Was."

In illustration of this passion for truth in Wordsworth, several of the shorter poems are mentioned or quoted, but a special interest attache to the interpretations given, in this connection, of the "Elegiac Stanzas, suggested by a picture of Peele Castle." The poem was composed at a time when the poet was mastering one of the great sorrows of his life—the death of a greatly beloved brother, who was drowned at sea. Professor Raleigh finds here a more just expounding of Wordsworth's poetic creed than is given in the famous prose preface to the "Lyrical Ballads." But he does so by an interpretation of one stanza, which will compel most lovers of Wordsworth to read the whole poem again with some amazement.

> The gleam,
> The light that never was, on sea or land,
> The consecration and the Poet's dream, does not mean the glow of inspiration, the vision of diviner things, which gives to the poet his power of insight and of song. It means the unreal and illusive light which, in weaker moments, and when desiring to evade the dark and stern realities of life, the soul casts upon them; it is the glamour of make-believe, and the false "colouring of imagination," such as the poet himself, before he had suffered, might have employed to maintain his spirit in cheerfulness and hope. But now he will not "add the gleam, the light that never was, on sea or land," to any object or event; he will face and endure the darkest and the worst life has to offer, and yet retain his faith and fortitude and patient cheer.

"Calm and Almost Terrible Strength."

The happiness that is to be pitied is blind happiness, which nourishes itself on its own false fancies. The happiness that is to be coveted is the happiness of fearless vision, "and frequent sights of what is to be borne." And it is by the daylight of truth, not by "the light that never was, on sea or land," that the poet desires to look upon the things of earth. He is strong enough to bear it and can face a life-long grief without flinching:

*"Wordsworth." By Walter Raleigh. (Edward Arnold. 6s.)

> This, which I know, I speak with mind serene.

The greatness of Wordsworth's best work derives from this calm and almost terrible strength. (P. 109.)

This may suffice as an example of Professor Raleigh's power of fresh and vigorous criticism. It may also serve to indicate what is probably the most valuable contribution towards a fuller understanding of Wordsworth which this study of him offers. For it is quite seriously claimed for him here that he possessed, in high access of power, the temper and spirit of the man of science, the courage and the humility without which truth cannot be discerned, or the real consolations of life discovered. And these qualities, which are manifest in his greatest poems, give a certain "inspired simplicity to his style," and make the consolations which he offers profound and abiding, when we can receive them.

"Rejoicing in Truth."

"To accept all truth of experience, yet to cherish rather than to deaden the human feelings that attend on the knowledge of such truth—to believe in them, too—is a feat not to be compassed save by the highest courage and the profoundest humility. It was a new courage and a new humility that Wordsworth introduced into the poetic treatment of Nature and of Man. And it was also a new joy; for just because he dared to the uttermost, and in his heart asks for nothing but what he is to have, his joy in the pleasures that come his way is pure and gay and whole-hearted, without a drop of bitterness in it. (P. 110.)

The great chapters on "Nature" and "Humanity" give fuller illustration of this ideal of Wordsworth as the poet who "rejoices in the presence of truth as our visible friend and hourly companion."

The defence of the poet against Mr. John Morley's criticism of some of the Nature lyrics is worthy of much consideration, and also the claim that "no one who is not capable of great happiness can be a highly moral being." The unity of man and nature, of the moral law and the law of the material world, is strongly enforced; it should be possible to work strenuously for righteousness and yet rejoice in the great life of things with an exultant heart. "To love and to be strong, this is the fulfilling of the law for beast and man."

One curious mistake on page 158 must be pointed out. In referring to the midnight mountain journey, described in the last book of the "Prelude," Professor Raleigh speaks of it as occurring "in the Lake country." Wordsworth tells us it was an excursion from "Bethgelert's huts" "to see the sun rise from the top of Snowdon."

Boyhood Thoughts.

We may be tempted to dispute some of Professor Raleigh's statements as to Wordsworth's boyhood. "There was nothing Wordworthian, so to say, about the boy Wordsworth." "The 'Prelude' is the story of the process whereby, out of the ordinary vague stuff of human nature, under the stress of fate, there was moulded a poet." Lines from the first and second books of that poem recur to the memory which do not accord with this judgment:

> Thus oft amid those fits of vulgar joy
> Which, through all seasons, on a child's pursuits
> Are prompt attendants, 'mid the giddy bliss
> Which, like a tempest, works along the blood
> And is forgotten; even then I felt
> Gleams like the flashing of a shield; the earth
> And common face of nature spoke to me
> Rememberable things.
>
> Oh, then, the calm
> And dead still water lay upon my mind
> Even with a weight of pleasure, and the sky,
> Never before so beautiful, sank down
> Into my heart, and held me like a dream!

Scarcely an Ordinary Boyhood.

The boy who felt thus was hardly compact of the "ordinary vague stuff of human nature." And we know what he has said in prose concerning the visionary moods which sometimes came over him as a boy, when he would have to grasp some solid object to bring him back "from the abyss of idealism," into which he seemed to be plunged. But Professor Raleigh is perfectly right in claiming for Wordsworth a healthy, robust, and natural boyhood—that he was not "the marvellous boy of popular biography," or "the talented little gentleman" some look for in the child who is to become the man of genius. Wordsworth was a boy with other boys, but he was also something more.

Let us be grateful to Professor Raleigh for his beautiful and powerful presentment of the life and work of a great English poet. Reading it here, a second time, in presence of hills and waters and green valleys which that poet loved so well, and reading once more some of the great lines which, amid these scenes, he murmured to himself with joy, one feels that the words with which this volume ends are simply and nobly true:

> Here was a poet who faced the fact, and against whom the fact did not prevail. To know him is to learn courage; to walk with him is to feel the visitings of a larger, purer air, and the peace of an unfathomable sky.

W. J. J.

GOLDWIN SMITH'S ESSAY ON JESUS*

"THE Founder of Christendom" is the title of a brief essay just given to the world by Professor Goldwin Smith. Before ever reading the book itself one is inclined to regret its extreme brevity. The writer is one whose learning and literary power have long been recognised; and if he had chosen to write a goodly volume on the character of Christ or the story of Christianity, he would have been sure of a great number of respectful hearers in England, in the United States, and the colonies. A shade of disappointment passes over the face when we notice that one of the greatest problems that thinking men ever had to consider is dealt with in a space which would hardly hold two average sermons, Enough of preliminary regret. The little book itself consists of a lucid and unrhetorical summary of the facts of the Gospel history from a rationalistic point of view. It is a sort of primer of Christian origins. The sources of our knowledge are briefly indicated. Then the question of the personal character of Jesus, of his environments, is discussed, the considerations that led him to become a teacher, his actions, his miracles, his doctrine, the modifications and qualifications of that doctrine by his followers, his trial and death, his abiding influence.

A Useful Text-book.

For the teacher of a Bible-class who knew his New Testament, and who had already struggled with the problems that such a study suggests, this would make an excellent text-book for a series of lessons. Almost every reader would wish to express something or other rather differently. For instance, the question is raised, what moved Jesus to leave his workshop and go forth to preach? We should have answered at once, in accordance with the indications in Mark, sympathy with the work of John, a resolve that the imprisonment of John should not be the end of his mission. Here, John is indeed referred to, but the crisis caused by his imprisonment is not thrown into relief.

Again, "The Jew could not see a brother in the uncircumcised. . . . Circumcision remained an insurmountable bar. By an effort, which we can now hardly measure, Jesus threw down that bar, making the Gentile the brother of the Jew." The throwing down of the bar may have been a logical and practical necessity after the work of Jesus, but surely it was the author of the Galatian and Roman epistles who threw down the bar.

"My Mother and My Brethren."

A different turn could be given to the "harsh language" used by Jesus of his mother and brethren from what we find on page 35. Was not the language pathetic rather than harsh? "These men, the sons of Zebedee and Peter, have to be mothers and brothers to me; my own mother and brothers have no sympathy with me."

What is said of the limitations of the revelation of Jesus seems to be essentially just. But wherefore the doubt expressed in the last sentence of the book? Or is it not a doubt but a gently ironical indication of the pretentiousness of science, especially as set forth by those whose spirit is not really scientific but dogmatic? We commend the book to the thoughtful reader. J. R.

The Mill Hill Pulpit for September contains Mr. Hargrove's sermon on "The New Pope," preached on the day of the coronation of Pope Pius X. With the October number begins a new volume (Vol. 12), and in our advertising columns will be found an invitation for new subscribers. Mr. Charles Stainer, the hon. secretary, points out the good service which friends may do to the cause of liberal religion by securing an increase in the circulation of the series.

WE have received a useful sixpenny reprint of Darwin's "Origin of Species," published by Messrs. Watts & Co. for the Nationalist Press Association. With it comes a less edifying production by W. S. Godfrey, (4d. net.) — "Theism Found Wanting

* "The Founder of Christendom." By Goldwin Smith. London: Philip Green. 1s. 6d. net.

THE DOM OF DANTZIG.

A GREAT LUTHERAN CATHEDRAL AND ITS CONTENTS.

IN the very heart of the old Hanse town Dantzig rises her noble St. Marien Kirche, usually and by no means unduly dignified with the title of the Dom, or Cathedral. In very early days, when this was an open spot amid fields, a St. Mary's Church had occupied the site, but after the foundation of the new part of the town by the Teutonic knights, the little fane no longer contented them; it was razed to the ground, and in 1343 their Grand Master laid in the already consecrated earth the first stone of a new edifice more meet for knightly devotions. Though but a simple narrow building, less in size than the nave of the present one, it satisfied them for about fifty years, till some more ambitious spirit conceived the idea of enlarging their temple, giving it the sacred form of the cross, and adding to it a lofty tower. This involved the labour of many years, for those were slow working days and the material employed did not favour speed. Inch by inch almost, the fabric grew, for no ponderous stones, no masses of masonry are here, but all formed "from the red earth like Adam," the patient labourers had to pile brick on brick until the aggregated atoms matured into the gigantic proportions we now behold. At length, in 1502, after 160 years of intermittent toil, the last little modicum of burnt clay was brought forth with shoutings, and the long work happily ended.

A Tremendous Achievement.

And what had been achieved in the course of this century and a half? An edifice which claims to be the largest Protestant Church in the world, saving only our own St. Paul's; and which only three Roman Catholic fanes take precedence of in point of size, viz., St. Peter's at Rome, and the cathedrals of Seville and Milan. The nave is 333 feet long by 111 wide; the transept 218 feet long by 125 wide; and within its spacious area nearly half the population of the city might worship together were they so inclined, there being accommodation for the more than Spurgeonistical vast congregation of 24,760 persons. This number, however, in modern days divides itself in about the same proportion as the Freyschutz bullets, for if the 760 may be "true" to their cathedral, the 24,000 may usually be reckoned on as "going askew," so far as not to find their way into its doors during the hours of divine service. Yet the Dantzigers, though making but limited use of it for devotional purposes, are by no means insensible to its claims as a specimen of architecture, speaking of it with pride as one of the giant churches of Europe, and looking up at it occasionally with a sort of affectionate reverence as they thread the narrow passage which divides it from the houses that hem it in on all sides, and which forms the chief channel of communication between several principal streets.

Exterior View.

There is an impressive air of grandeur about the venerable exterior, for the dark hue of the material harmonises with the ponderous character of the architecture; the plain bare walls rise in lofty simplicity, strengthened by massive buttresses, but unadorned by a single ornament; and the central tower rears itself aloft, neither shooting at its summit into pinnacles nor tapering steeple like, but only slightly compressed as it ascends, to terminate suddenly in a blunt, abrupt roof, as though sturdily determined not to prejudice its stability by risking further elevation. There is a stamp of subdued seriousness and gravity throughout well befitting its stern founders, those warrior-monks to whom devotion was but a phase of worship, and who made repression in all things the business of life. The only part where fancy seems to have been allowed any play is on the roof of the nave, where a cluster of fantastic little turrets appear as though sporting at the foot of the grim old tower, which seems to look down with calm superiority on their childish levity.

A Noble Interior.

The five portals, each abutting on a different street, are so similar that it cannot be said there is any principal entrance. On opening one, a low arched wooden door on a level, with the ground, with a small defaced group of kneeling figures above it, we step down upon the floor of the church. The first glance of the interior is certainly very imposing, though the charm lies still in grandeur rather than in grace. No clustering shafts aspiring to aerial heights, no marigold windows, elegant tracery, or carved corbels and capitals are here, but all is stern, solemn, and massive. The vaulted roof rests on two rows of plain but very lofty octagonal pillars, united by equilateral arches, and elevated between the last pair, nearest the altar, towers a colossal black crucifix almost filling the whole width of the nave. All around are long narrow windows reaching nearly to the roof, glazed with small white panes, except six of the thirty-seven, including the largest behind the altar, which measures sixty-four feet by twenty-two feet, which were enriched with pictorial subjects in colour by the art-loving monarch Friedrich Wilhelm IV.

Decorative Barbarisms.

Poor as must be the effect of whitewash, it yet does not comport altogether ill with the plain style of the building, but alas! how is the grand simplicity of the architect's plan set at nought by the paltry attempts at decoration, which profane every part near the ground. The pillars for nearly a third of their height and the lower part of the walls are actually wrapped round with canvas, theatrically painted in sham folds to represent green drapery, and finished off by a row of small medallions depicting scenes from Scripture, which begin very fundamentally with "chaos," figured by a black disc with a yellow spot in the centre to indicate the germ of creation.

Another barbarism is the pulpit, not unsightly in itself, but an incongruous patch wholly out of keeping with the rest of the building. Erected in 1762 at a cost of 10,000 thalers, it is in the style of Louis XV., one of the pillars having been selected from its plain compeers to be converted into a flower-wreathed, profusely gilded Corinthian column, while the body of the pulpit, also richly carved and gilt, swells out from it in graceful curves. This intrusive piece of modern dandyism is companioned by the large costly font enclosed by a kind of railing of miniature Corinthian columns all executed in brass.

A Wondrous Piece of Carving.

Around the walls are ranged thirty small chapels, in which embellishments banished from the body of the edifice have taken refuge. One boasts a very ancient Byzantine painting, another its beautiful wood carvings; its neighbour, an elaborate metal work screen. Yet another enshrines a veritable masterpiece—a dying Christ upon the cross, carved in wood with such marvellously truthful effect that it almost seems as if art had really wrought the miracle the priest pretends to, and the thrilled spectator stands awe-struck as in a "real presence." A faint tinge of colour, so far from detracting from the exquisite chiselling or giving the idea of a painted puppet, only aids the illusion, and the placid muscles, the languid limbs, the expression of mingled suffering and resignation in that drooping face, "where love and sorrow meet," are all rendered with accuracy so life-like, and so death-like too, that it is hard to believe anything so like human flesh and blood can actually be but a mere wooden image.

No wonder that to such a work the oft-repeated legend should have become attached, that it was no offspring of imagination, but that the excited artist really nailed his model to a cross and watched his dying throes in the agony of actual crucifixion to reproduce them with his chisel; or that the figure should have been attributed to Michel Angelo. It is, in fact, the production of an artist whose name has not been transmitted to posterity, but a very similar carving at Rome is said to be by the same hand.

Other Treasures.

Another art-treasure is a large painting of the Last Judgment, known as "The Dom picture," and ascribed by some to Van Eyck, by others to Memling. Tradition asserts that it was painted in Holland for the Pope, but on its way to Rome was seized by pirates, then recaptured by a Dantzig vessel, and thus brought here and presented to the Cathedral. In 1807 it was carried off by the French to Paris, but brought back in 1816.

Science, too, has a trophy in the Dom, or, at least, the relics of one, in the remains of a mighty piece of mediæval mechanism, a clock, which in its day must have outrivalled even the famous one at Strasburg in its varied display of astronomical phenomena and performing figures; but it has long ceased to work. Nor are supernatural marvels lacking. In one chapel a stone secured by a chain is said to have been once a real eatable loaf of bread, which was instantaneously thus petrified as a judgment on the uncharitable owner for having refused a morsel of it to a hungry beggar; while a shrivelled mummied arm has the tale appended to it that it had been fatally raised against a father. The parricide remained undiscovered while the murderer lived, but after his burial offended Heaven caused the guilty limb to protrude from the tomb, when it was cut off and preserved here as a warning to future generations.

The Library.

This chapel also contains what is of less apocryphal value, viz., the Cathedral Library founded in 1413, and by subsequent legacies much augmented, then for many years utterly neglected and forgotten. At length, in 1789, a preacher was appointed to the Dom, who, as a scholar, knew the worth of these disregarded stores, so forthwith set about cleansing them from the accumulated dust of centuries, and then, arranging and cataloguing them, let the learned world know what treasures were here enshrined. Above 700 MSS. on paper and parchment, sixty books printed in the fifteenth century, several hundred volumes of later but still ancient date, and a large collection of musical antiquities form a part of this little mine of literary wealth, now open to the exploration of the studious, and doubtless by them much appreciated. E. G. BAYLE BERNARD.

HOUSING!

THE Midland Railway Company has opened a new hotel in Manchester, huge, palatial, grand in the modern colloquial sense. It cost over a million pounds, and contains very nearly every material thing the heart can desire, or can get it at short notice by means of electricity and human messengers. There are suites of apartments for those who wish to avoid all the trouble of housekeeping or of managing servants. It would seem that the hotel guests might get all their physical needs—except healthy life—satisfied without leaving the building. Shopping, amusement, bathing, hair-dressing, and much besides—more than enough. At the opening reception on Saturday last, it is reported that 8,000 invited guests were present.

* * *

FOR two years past a citizens' committee, including many experts, has been actively preparing a report on the conditions of life, and especially the housing and surroundings of the poorer classes of Manchester. The dwellings of the working classes are, it seems, not palatial, and some remarkable descriptions of existing conditions and suggestions towards better things may be anticipated in the book which is about to be issued. The investigations of Mr. Booth in London and Mr. Rowntree in York have led the way, and, while following in many respects an original line of suggestions, the Manchester book will be on similar lines of scientific inquiry.

MRS. T. HILL, who has taken an active part in chapel and Sunday-school work at Nantwich for more than thirty years, has been appointed by the County Council the lady representative for Nantwich on the Administrative Sub-Committee for the Nantwich Union area under the new Education Act.

BIBLE FOR THE PRACTICAL MAN.

SIR,—As I know how to be thankful for small mercies I can value your reviewer's comments on my "Bible for the Practical Man," with the comfortable assurance that if he had himself attempted the work, on the principles he suggests, he would have soon discovered that he would have to alter the caption to "Beauties of the Bible," or "Choice Extracts from the Bible," or some other generic title.

My object was an ethical one, and, firmly believing that the Bible as a whole is the most over-valued book in the world, I rigidly excluded all that encourages an unwholesome belief in the supernatural, and everything that does not bear, in an intelligible human way, on the conduct of life.

The Book of Esther, in the portion I have given, is a human document of remarkable dramatic power (as Racine saw); while those portions of the writings of Paul that I excluded are tainted with his diseased imagination, and his most mischievous theories of salvation, the second coming of an impossible Messiah, and (what he described as especially his Gospel) the resurrection of the body. It is to me amazing that such a persistently minute attention should still be given to his writings. I regret spending ten shillings on The Hibbert Journal because so much space is occupied by questions of no moment, such as "Did Paul write Romans?" &c., &c. A few poor old Dryasdusts may find some pleasure in these arid regions, but (as your reviewer of Washington Moon's "Bishop's English" says) "busy men want to get on to something more useful."

The Book of Job has so much in it that is obscure, and provocative of vain controversy, that a "practical man" will be glad to possess the string of pearls I have collected from it, and be content to leave the rest to the discussions of editors who have nothing better to occupy their practical energies.

Dodd's "Beauties of Shakespeare" would be a far better book for a busy practical man, who wants an all-round view of Shakespeare's many-sided mind, than any single play, even "edited by Verity." The latter is for the specialist, the minute critic, and not "the practical man" for whom I was working.

It is so easy to patronise the patient toiler as possessing "a certain shrewdness and natural ability," and to "Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer, And, without sneering, teach the rest to sneer."

I doubt if your reviewer read the Preface to my book. If he did his comments are for the most part unjust, because every writer or compiler should be judged according to his own avowed purpose.

With a smiling bow to my "worst enemy" and my "severest critic,"

FRANCIS HAYDN WILLIAMS.

Whitby, September 7.

In another letter Mr. Williams states that he has fifty copies of his book which a friend has enabled him to send to Sunday-school teachers who apply for them at the price of the fourpenny postage only.

THEY are never alone that are accompanied with noble thoughts.—Sir Philip Sidney.

OBITUARY.

MR. HERBERT THOMAS.

To the deep regret of all who knew him, we have to record the death of Mr. Herbert Thomas, J.P., which took place at his residence, Ivor House, Durham Park, Bristol, on Tuesday, September 1.

His departure leaves Mr. Charles Thomas, J.P., the sole survivor of four brothers, whose names are held in honourable regard among their fellow-citizens, his brothers, Mr. Christopher J. Thomas, J.P., and Mr. Thomas Thomas, having predeceased him.

Sprung of a worthy Welsh stock, they settled in Bristol, and built up a business which soon took, and still holds, the highest rank among the honourable and successful industries of the city. Entering the family of the late Rev. Dr. Lant Carpenter by marriage with his daughter, Miss Anna Carpenter, he ever counted it as a privilege to lend his loyal and unbounded aid to the good works with which her sister, Miss Mary Carpenter, must be for ever associated. Left to deplore the death of a wife "mourned with no common sorrow," he was subsequently united in marriage to the eldest daughter of the late Mr. J. Jenkins, of Llangattock, who shared to the full his aims and efforts for the educational and social progress of his fellow-citizens.

As a Public Man:

For half a century he contributed to the advancement of the community around him. Public honours he never sought, lavishly as they were offered him; but he chose, rather, the quiet path of useful labour for the general good. The secret of his influence lay in the patent fact that he had no selfish end to gain, acting as he ever did with a view only to the good of others about him.

With the local history of education his interests were most closely interwoven. It was, indeed, in this direction that he first aided Miss Carpenter in her efforts for the establishment of Ragged Schools and Reformatories. He was a member of the first School Board formed in Bristol in 1871, and he brought to bear upon its action the same broad and healthy spirit with which he had helped to direct the Lewin's Mead British and Industrial Schools. Until his death he remained the faithful treasurer of the Stoke's Croft Endowed School, which is attached to Lewin's Mead Chapel, and, by virtue of his chairmanship of the Bristol Municipal Charity Trustees, he shared in the control of the Bristol Grammar School, of Queen Elizabeth's Hospital, and of the Red Maids' School.

But it was on the Magistrates' Bench that the influence of his character was most markedly put forth; more especially, perhaps, in his adjudications as chairman of the licensing magistrates. As a just man, he did indeed walk in his integrity, for teetotallers and licensed victuallers alike respected the justice of his decisions.

At Lewin's Mead.

Closer and tenderer associations bound him to his religious home at Lewin's Mead. The same wise influence and support were directed to the interests of the religious principles on which he rested. In the light of his memory the well-known name of "Liberal Christian" shines with a gracious meaning. His hand and his heart were open both to Dissenter and to Churchman, to Protestant and to Catholic. But his liberality never sprang from indifference to the great questions which exercise the religious world.

He held, and expressed, his own deep thoughts with an inflexible tenacity and consistency. To every matter that concerned the welfare of both the congregation and its ministers he brought the most patient consideration, and the wisest and kindest counsel and aid. With a life filled with claims and responsibilities he was found for thirty years at the superintendent's desk in the Sunday-school, which was happy beneath the guidance of his quiet spirit.

In his home he was ever accessible for advice and help; and his clear and sympathetic insight would speedily disentangle every confusing question, and set the issue in its true light. But the deepest knowledge of his nature was reserved for those who sought him in trouble or in sorrow; for then it was that men learned what a depth of tender and thoughtful feeling lay below that calm bearing; and they left his presence carrying with them a fresh courage into their duties or their trials.

His Fellow-Citizens' Tribute.

The funeral took place on Friday, Sept. 4, at Arnos Vale Cemetery, a large and strikingly representative gathering bearing testimony, both by attendance at Lewin's Mead Chapel and subsequently at the grave-side, to their regard for his life and work. The Lord Mayor of Bristol (Sir R. H. Symes) was present, supported by magistrates, aldermen, town councillors, and numbers of men esteemed among their fellow-citizens.

The service was read by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., who also preached the memorial sermon on the Sunday morning following, when the devotional service was conducted by the Rev. Professor J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., of Oxford, whom absence on the Continent had unavoidably prevented from participating in the funeral service itself.

A service of remembrance was also held in the Colston Hall on the afternoon of Sunday, Sept. 6, the address being delivered by Mr. Blatchford. Some 3,000 citizens were present to pay, as reported in the columns of a local newspaper, "their last tribute of respect to this just magistrate, this upright citizen, this firm but amiable man, who has left behind him a name in the city annals which will not readily pass into oblivion."

DR. GUINNESS ROGERS' autobiography is shortly to be published by Messrs. James Clarke & Co., in demy octavo, with portrait and illustrations, at 7s. 6d.

IT is in length of patience and endurance and forbearance that so much of what is good in man and womankind is shown.—Arthur Helps.

THE truth of nature is a part of the truth of God; to him who does not search it out, darkness, as it is to him who does, infinity.—John Ruskin.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"THIS WORLD IS FULL OF MESSAGES."

IN the city of Antwerp there stands a grand cathedral, with a tower that rises far above the narrow streets and tiny houses at its foot. In the tower is a peal of bells; and every few minutes they ring out some find old hymn tune which sounds far and wide over the city.

People go in and out of their dwellings and about their daily work, and children at school and play can all, if they listen, hear the music of the bells. Some of them watch for it, and good thoughts and holy memories connected with the hymn tunes enter into their souls and make their lives happier and better for those messages which the bells bring in this way to them. But others hurry along the streets and never seem to hush their laughter or their talk when the bells begin to ring. For the fact is, they are so used to them that they have ceased to hear them.

We Must Keep Our Ears Open.

A great writer once said, "This world is full of messages." If we think about this saying we shall see how true it is. But, like the people in the cathedral city, who cease to listen to the bells they have always been used to hear, if we are not quick to watch for the messages that come to us, we shall lose many good helps and influences that are waiting for us in the rich world in which we live.

Now, what are these messages? There are so many kinds to talk about that they would fill many "Children's Columns." There are all the sights and sounds of nature, the fields, and trees and flowers, the birds' songs, the sunshine, and the clouds with their shadows, which make the earth so fair. These all lie round us, and are all like messages from God, which call on us to remember Him in this beautiful world which He has made for our home.

Then, there are messages out of the past from history—memories, examples, warnings—stories of the good and bad deeds that have been done in the past, and good and bad lives that have been lived. And I am going in another column to tell those of you who like to read them some stories of a wonderful old city as examples of the way in which messages come to us out of the past.

Messages through Books.

But just now let us think of the messages out of the present—of the influences that touch our natures out of the life we are living now—all the influences that are going on around us. Think how many they are, the books we have to read, the pictures we can see, the lessons we learn at school, the words that friends and companions say to us, that we perhaps hardly notice at the time, that come back to our memories and help us to be faithful and brave and honest.

Have you any favourite books? It was a wise saying, "Make some good books your friends." Have you discovered what books will do for us? To read even a story, which has a high aim and a good influence on us, much more to read the true life of a noble man or woman, is to fill our minds with good feelings and thoughts; and every thought we think and every deed we do helps to make us what we are going to become.

Things to Remember.

We grow like what we love; and this is why we should be careful what sort of books and companions we choose and grow fond of, and we should never forget that what we are helps to raise or do harm to the companions who love us. There is another thing to remember; that is, the importance of the early years of our lives. It is those and the way we spend them, our thoughts and our feelings in those early years, that decide whether we shall grow up to be unselfish, honest, trustworthy, and reverent.

As we grow through life we meet with good and bad influences on every hand, and we have to learn to love the right things; for it has been said truly that to love heartily what is good, and true, and beautiful is the only way to protect ourselves against the danger of loving what is evil and harmful. There is a storehouse of memories within each of us; and, though we may little think it, there is gathering up there a store of thoughts, good or bad, that have filled our minds, and of aims and intentions that have made our lives poor or noble. "This world is full of messages." Let us watch for the helpful, beautiful messages that come to us, and fill our storehouse of memory with them while we carry them out in our lives.

The Whispers of the Soul.

The best of all these messages are those that come direct from God to us. They have been called "the whispers of the soul," and among them is the voice of conscience. Did you ever hear how a young girl went once to hear the great Dr. Channing preach? She had fallen into untruthful ways, and had begun to fancy that it did not much signify about keeping to the truth, and that she might tell falsehoods and deceive other people when it was convenient to do so. But when she heard this saying spoken by him, "Do not silence the whispers of the soul," she resolved to obey it and to listen to the message of conscience for the rest of her life. From that day she put away all false speaking and false acting for ever.

It was Dr. Channing who, when he was an old man on his deathbed, said, with a happy smile on his face, "I have received many messages from the Spirit." And, indeed, his whole life had been spent in listening for the beautiful helpful messages of which life is so full, and in trying to obey them.

FRANCES E. COOKE.

HE is not truly patient who is prepared to suffer only as much as seems good to himself, and only from those whom he himself chooses.—Thomas à Kempis.

THERE is an atheism which still repeats the creed. There is a belief in God which does not bring Him, nay, rather say which does not let Him come, into close contact with our daily life. Many of us who call ourselves theists are like the savages who, in the desire to honour the wonderful sun-dial which had been given them, built a roof over it. Break down the roof; let God in on your daily life.—Phillips Brooks.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom, or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 12, 1903.

IN ONE SPIRIT : FRIENDS AND FELLOW-WORKERS.

THE Second International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers has been held, and we have again received many gifts and laid up many happy memories. In Amsterdam the bonds of brotherhood were knit as closely as in London two years ago. If the tide of inspiration did not always run as high, there were other elements in the great gathering of new and special value for mutual understanding, and the recognition of common difficulties, and the warm impulse of mutual encouragement.

At the close of the last Session of the Council, the Rev. C. W. WENDTE, the general secretary, stated that besides Holland thirteen other countries were represented in the meeting, while Norway and Sweden and Italy, not to mention Canada and Australia, where there are many sympathisers with the cause, had been unable to send any representative. Mr. WENDTE also stated that in addition to the various communities in the Netherlands, he had reckoned up seventeen different religious bodies joining in the Council, and sending together not less than 250 delegates. Many of these came from large and prosperous communities, such as those of our American Unitarian brethren ; others came from lonely outposts, where they are often sorely pressed, and where the need of such fellowship as the Council offers is most acutely felt. Thus we may hope that the members of the Free Religious communities of Königsberg and Dantzig, the little band of liberals in Denmark and in Brussels, and those liberated priests in France whom M. BOURRIER represents, and for whom he labours in a position of peculiar difficulty, may have received a special measure of sympathy and encouragement from the meeting with brethren from so many lands.

For ourselves it was an education to come into contact with so many members of the various religious communities of the Netherlands, to learn of their work and their ideals and the difficulties they also have to face, and to see how the spirit of unity in a free faith draws them all together. They have, indeed, their trials and their divisions, as we have, but when we see how members of the Reformed Church, the Remonstrant and the Mennonite communities and the Free Congregations meet and take counsel together as one people, and the ministers enjoy a free interchange of pulpits, it makes one ponder how it might be if the liberals of the Church of England, of the Congregational and Baptist communities, and of the Unitarian and Free Christian Churches in England were drawn together in one national union, as our brethren in Holland are, in the Protestantenbond, and enjoyed a similar close fellowship in religious and social work.

We were specially touched by that passage in the PRESIDENT'S address which referred to the difficulty of the liberal position in the matter of assured religious faith, but with a noble sincerity refused to be led aside into easier paths of conformity, because Truth must be maintained at all costs, and a day even in the forecourts of the House of God is better than a thousand elsewhere. In the same spirit Mr. VAN LOENEN MARTINET pleaded for absolute fidelity to the light as it is granted to us, if we would really possess the faith and hope and love which still abide, as the supreme treasures of our life with GOD. With the difficulties and the discouragements of the position of the liberals in Holland we can fully sympathise ; we are the better for having been brought into such close and friendly contact with the lofty spirit of their faith.

Professor OORT closed the meeting of the Council with earnest words of encouragement, holding up the ideal of emulation in religious work, without any sting of envy, and bidding each one do his own part, not for self-glorification, or for the exaltation of his own church or denomination, but for the glory of GOD alone ; and on the same occasion, Mr. CARPENTER, his predecessor as president, also spoke words of acknowledgment and farewell. In his concluding words we may well sum up the chief impression of the week :—

"We have heard words of wisdom and encouragement. We have been cheered to find that we are in contact with the great currents of religious thought and faith, upborne by common aspirations of freedom and trust. Our devoted GENERAL SECRETARY concluded his report with the hope that the day was coming, when men would come from the east and the west, the north and the south, and sit down in the Kingdom of GOD. That day has been with us during this week. The Kingdom of GOD is always present, and we have come from India and Japan, from England and America, and from the east and west, and have sat down together in the Kingdom of GOD. May the words of heavenly bread offered to us quicken us alike for our worship and our work."

LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKERS & WORKERS.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL AT AMSTERDAM.

WEEK'S CHRONICLE CONCLUDED.

LOOKING back now upon the whole proceedings of the week, one sees how much was accomplished and how happily. Good fortune in the weather, and much more than good fortune in the overflowing kindness of our hosts, made the week delightful from beginning to end. As to the work of the Council, the programme promised us twenty-five papers (including the President's address and the secretary's report) ; but, fortunately for even the most enthusiastic endurance, three of the papers dropped out, those by Professors Lindberg and Gooszen and the Rev. J. E. Roberty. They will, however, be published in the volume of the Proceedings.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER, 2.

Wednesday, which opened, as we recorded last week, with the President's address, was the hardest day's work of all, and of the most fervid heat. Morning and afternoon were occupied with ten papers, five in English, two each in Dutch and French, and one in German.

Professor Carpenter's Paper.

The first paper, by Professor J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, on "The Place of Christianity among the Religions of the World," we shall publish next week in full. It noted the wider outlook of the present time upon the religions of the world, and showed how there must be a uniform standard of judgment for all. The character of Hindu thought was then depicted, and the strength and weakness of Buddhism. With this was contrasted the new impulse of Christianity, in which the temporary elements were distinguished from the central force and the inspiration for religion in the person of Jesus. Finally, the relation of his religion to the universal faith of the future was indicated, making its great contribution of the ideal of the kingdom, in social regeneration, in brotherhood, and love to God and man.

Professor Jean Réville on Religion within the Realm of Law.

Professor JEAN RÉVILLE followed, with a paper on "Religion and the Modern Conception of the Order of Nature," maintaining that as the old Calvinists, with their belief in the immutable decrees, were yet deeply religious men, so those who accepted the modern scientific view of the world as under the domain of inviolable law might live by faith, and with profound humility and submission have joy in the knowledge and love of God.

The modern conception of law in Nature, said M. Réville, led some men of science to deny the possibility of religious life, and on the other side it furnished a plea for those orthodox believers, who maintained that faith in miracle and the supernatural could alone establish religion on a sure foundation. But Christian faith must not be thus identified with belief in miracle. In the old days, marvel belonged to the habitual conception of religion, and the modern distinction between natural and supernatural did not exist; yet the element of marvel did not constitute the essence of religion, which was to be found in the sense of dependence on God, as the Source of all Spiritual life. This was common to all the great teachers of religion, however different their conception of the order of the world, to Origen and Tertullian, to Augustine and Pelagius, to Erasmus and Luther, to Schleiermacher and Parker. And now the childish thought of the order of the world must be put away; men must no longer expect the indulgence of God to alter the order of Nature to meet their needs or desires, but must hold to a true Christian piety, penetrated by the spirit of the prophets and of Jesus, bowing before the sovereign and immutable Will, with the prayer of Jesus, "Father, not my will, but Thine, be done." This modern conception of Order in Nature implied Spirit, the spirit in man, entering into a knowledge of the world, recognised the spiritual Source of all things, and knew himself to be akin to God. Thus we are confirmed in the faith, declared by the sublime consciousness of Jesus, that man is the child of the heavenly Father; and amid the sublime order of the world we can nourish a piety, manly and austere, with inward serenity in submission to Divine law. Thus the new conception of law does not destroy, but confirms religious faith.

Dr. Cannegieter on "Personality and Religion."

Dr. S. A. ELLIOT'S paper on "Liberal Religion in America," which followed, is printed in full in our present issue. The morning session closed with a deeply interesting paper by Professor T. CANNEGIETER, of Utrecht, on "Personality and Religion," read in Dutch, of which a German translation had been provided. Its affirmation was of the essence of religion in the spiritual personality of man, conscious through self-knowledge of the Divine Presence, and of the true life in God. "Religion is given to us not as Word or Thought, but as spirit from God's Spirit, as natura divina, to become in us natura humana." Thus it is not the word of Jesus, or anything related about him, which constitutes the power of Christianity, but his personality, his own experience of faith, as the inmost possession of his life. As we realise this, we see that it must be so with us all, and he becomes the Teacher and Inspirer of our true life.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

Into the Afternoon Session six papers had to be crowded, and several of them had, therefore, to be considerably curtailed in delivery.

First came an English paper by Professor CRAMER, of Amsterdam, asking, "Do Liberal Religious Believers want to be organised as a Church?" The reply was affirmative, on the ground that each form of Christian faith needs its own worship, to maintain a clear testimony to the truth and give full expression to its own religious life, and that it is only through a permanent religious society, maintained from generation to generation, that the real strength of religion makes itself felt in the world. The liberalism of the seventeenth century, which pleaded for comprehension, and in the person of Hugo Grotius urged that Catholics and Protestants should worship together, had proved ineffective; but to plead for the separation of different religious bodies did not mean self-glorification or emnity towards others. Each denomination had its own contribution to make. Forty years ago liberal religion was in the ascendant in Holland, but the liberals let the opportunity for separate organisation pass, and now they suffered eclipse. Such an international union as drew them together there was good, but each church must maintain its own character, rejoicing in the sympathy of others.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG followed, with his paper on "The Conception of God as the 'Soul of all Souls,'" which we shall publish in our next issue.

Professor A. BRUINING, of Amsterdam, then read a paper in Dutch, on "The Aggressive Character of Liberal Religious Faith," urging that liberal religion must hold fast to theism, as against not only materialism, but pantheism also, which, if consistent, makes religion impossible. A veritable communion with the living God must be maintained, and this implies the abiding worth of the human spirit, and its continuance in the life eternal. To this end philosophy must be brought into the service of religion, to vindicate its fundamental truths.

Liberal Religion—East and West.

Then came Mr. V. R. SHINDE, with his account of "Liberal Religion in India," telling of the persistence of Hinduism, and the strong hold of custom upon his people. "Hindustan," he said, "has been twice conquered, but Hinduism remains unsubdued." The religion of the future in India, he added, must be a native growth, out of the spiritual life of the people themselves. Of Rajah Rammohen Roy, he spoke as the greatest son of modern India, the founder of the Brahmo Somaj, who lived and died for religious and moral reform. In him ancient and modern India met, and he foreshadowed in his society the pure worship of the Eternal, in which all the people shall join, without distinction of creed or race.

The fifth paper was by the Rev. J. HOCART, of Brussels, in his native French, telling of the "Difficulties of Liberal Religion in Belgium." Since 1884, he said, the Catholics have had un unbroken majority in Parliament, and Catholicism has exercised a growing religious and social despotism. It is felt in every range of life, in business and the professions, and in the administration of charity. The boycott which the priests instigate against heretics is specially oppressive in villages, but even in Brussels men prominent in business had confessed to him that they dared not openly avow their liberal sympathies. The low intellectual level of the people was another difficulty they had to face, for although practically their liberal faith was very simple, its vindication to the mind required serious powers of thought. A third difficulty was the hostility to all religion on the part of many who broke away from Catholicism. Yet, in spite of difficulties, he would not speak of discouragement. For twenty-two years they had held the banner aloft, and would not haul it down. If they themselves did not see the victory, they would prepare the way for others.

In Germany.

The concluding paper was by Dr. CASPAR SCHIELER, of Danzig, on "Fears and Hopes concerning the Religious Question in Germany." In the land of Luther he confessed that they were no longer in the vanguard of freedom, and very strong retrograde influences were at work. Heretics were no longer burnt at the stake, but bureaucracy in Church and State found means to repress and punish the exercise of free religious thought. The freedom of teaching was indeed maintained in the universities, but it did not minister to the religious needs of the people. The Church still taught the old discredited doctrines, and the consequence was that the thoughtful among their young people were alienated from religion. Insincerity on the part of the Church in the realm of religion was one of the greatest evils of the day. Dr. Schieler told how he himself had been a zealous son of the Roman Church, and through bitter conflict had gained his liberty. He pleaded earnestly for the ideal of the kingdom of God, a spiritual fellowship untrammelled by ecclesiastical limitations. They must have faith in the natural aspiration of the human soul for freedom; and, encouraged by the example of those who had made great sacrifices for the cause, hold together with brethren in every land devoted to the service of religious freedom.

"The Merchant of Venice."

Evening brought a change of scene and a delightful respite from hard work. The members of the Council were invited to the theatre in the Industrial Palace, Frederiksplein, and attended in large numbers, in spite of the exhausting heat, the performance in Dutch of Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, specially arranged in their honour. Louis Bouwmeester is a great actor, the first in Holland, and he has given his "Shylock" in Paris and Berlin. Certainly it was a wonderful presentment, most striking of all in the more restrained passages of the first act. One thought of Irving's Shylock, and recognised that here and not at the Lyceum was the veritable Jew. For the rest, the great actor's son, also Louis, made delicious, if exaggerated comedy out of young Launcelot Gobbo. It was said that on that occasion he appeared for the first time on a public stage. At the conclusion (as also after other scenes) Bouwmeester received enthusiastic acclamation, and Dr. Eerdmans and other members of the Netherlands Committee, went on to the stage and presented a wreath to him, with the warm acknowledgments of the International Council and a special word of thanks on behalf of the English visitors, for the great pleasure of the performance.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER, 3.

Members met on Thursday morning eager for the promised papers, but happy in the prospect of a free afternoon and evening for the excursion to Haarlem.

First on the programme was Dr. J. H. CROOKER with a paper on "American Ideals in Education," showing how the great aim was to produce men, for a homo-centric civilisation. To all alike there must be equal opportunities, the State caring for the citizen, the church for the immortal soul. That implied secular education in their common schools, but neither godless nor irreligious. Religion was left to the home and the church. The public school was supported by the people themselves, the one institution of which all were proud, for which they were willing to spend freely to perfect it in all its branches. They were happy in Ameica in that they had no hopeless poor; the door of school and university was open to all.

Professor Pfleiderer's Paper.

At the first meeting of the Council in London, Professor Otto Pfleiderer, of Berlin, though he sent a paper, was unable to be present, and it was, therefore, a special pleasure to many to welcome the distinguished and already venerable New Testament scholar to Amsterdam. The subject of his paper was "The New Testament Conception of Christ in the light of the History of Religion." It proved to be a pamphlet of over a hundred printed pages, of which only a small portion could be read.

Professor PFLEIDERER began with a reference to the great service rendered by modern criticism in teaching men to distinguish between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith. Freed from the mythical elements in the Gospel narratives, the noble humanity of Jesus is made clear to the modern world; and yet, when one looks at the rich literature of the life of Jesus, the question arises how much of this work is due to the poetic inspiration of the writers. Even the oldest sources are coloured with dogmatic conceptions, and what we find in the Gospels themselves is an image of the Christ of faith, as he was to the first Christian societies. The question how much of that image is due to a true historical memory cannot be answered with absolute certainty. That so many people shut their eyes to this is due to the feeling that the character of Christianity must depend on exact knowledge of the historic personality of Jesus, whereas, in fact, it is the Christ-faith of the first Christians which is the foundation on which we have to build. Whether the exact remembrance of Jesus preserved to us is much or little, the fact of faith in him, and the character of primitive Christianity remains unchanged. Scientific theology must, therefore, thoroughly examine all the sources, and not occupy itself merely with what falls in with any preconceptions. The attraction of the series of "Jesus novels" from Renan downwards is undoubted; and who does not praise Harnack's "Wesen des Christenthums"? But we must beware of thinking that these modern pictures represent scientific results of the critic's study. The modern and ancient pictures of Christ are alike creations of a common spirit, springing from the needs of their own age, fixed as an image to meet those needs. These pictures and the rites closely associated with them are objects of the greatest interest to the historical student, and they should be studied with the new aid of comparative mythology.

An Interesting Comparison.

At this point Professor Pfleiderer paid a warm tribute to the memory of the late Professor Tiele, of Leiden, whose work in the field of comparative religion had been of such inestimable worth. He then mentioned that his paper contained an elaborate comparison, by way of example, between the childhood stories of the Buddha and Luke's account of the childhood of Jesus, and affirmed that all the elements which made up the picture of the Christ were already in the world, and only needed the point of crystallisation, which was found in the person of Jesus. Thus the Galilean Saviour of his people universalised became the Saviour of the world. It was not something new and unique, that came down direct from heaven, but the rich fruit of the religious aspirations of the world. In the depths of the religious experience of man, the conviction that he is the child of God, was brought to fruition by the experience of the chief of men, representing the greatness of our common humanity. The profound thought that we must die to live is found variously expressed among the religions of the world, but in its purest form in Christian faith. Viewed in this light, the living Christ-spirit is seen to be universal. Freed from the bonds of historicity, we find the living God in the present, and the highest human life in the sacrifice of self, the striving after the common good, and faith in the Kingdom of God, which overcomes the world.

[We have not yet had the opportunity of reading Professor Pfleiderer's paper, and trust that in these brief and imperfect notes of what we heard from him, we have not seriously misrepresented his meaning on any point.—ED.]

The Rev. P. H. Wicksteed on Mediæval Religion.

After the German Professor came a man speaking first Dutch and then English, briefly telling of the paper, which he did not attempt to read, but which we hope to publish in full a fortnight hence. "Francis of Assisi, the great church builders, even the schoolmen, and above all Dante, are becoming more and more, not merely a historical interest, but a power in our lives"—such was the burden of Mr. WICKSTEED'S paper on "The Revived Interset in Mediæval Religion," the rich interest of which we will not further anticipate here.

The Apostle of Peace.

Then Boanerges, in a voice of thunder, proclaimed the Gospel of Peace. "The Worlds Debt to Holland for the Propaganda of Universal Peace" was the subject of the paper read by Mr. EDWIN D. MEADE, of Boston. The Dutch Republic, he said, antedates the English Commonwealth and the planting of New England. William Penn, the first Englishman who had a clear vision of the federation of the world, referring to Sir William Temple's history, and particularly his account of the United Netherlands (cf. Macaulay's Essay), remarked: "Here was illustrated in practice the theories for which he pleaded." The Dutch Federal Republic, said Mr. Meade, was the earnest and model of all that was to come. Those United States were the great precursor of the United States of America, a prophecy of the United States of Europe for which Penn pleaded, and of the United States of the world, for which we work.

So also our poet had a vision of "the parliament of men, the federation of the world"—a world weary of the terrible wickedness and waste of war. At the conclusion of his paper, Mr. Meade expressed the gratification they as Americans must feel in Mr. A. Carnegie's gift of a million and a half to build a worthy temple of Peace at the Hague, and said it was poetic justice that the great Peace Conference should have been held there.

Professor Montet on Monotheism.

The concluding paper was by Professor Montet, of Geneva, on the principle of Monotheism as a basis of alliance for the religions of the world. He estimated that there were some 750 to 800 millions of Monotheists in the world, whom he classified under six heads: (1) From 500 to 534 millions of Christians (Unitarian and Trinitarian). (2) Philosophic Thinkers in Europe and America, beyond the pale of Christianity, though under its influence. (3) Independent Thinkers among the Dualist and Polytheist religions (Parsees, Buddhists, &c.). (4) Members of the Brahmo Somaj. (5) Jews, some eight or ten millions. (6) Islam, from 200 to 250 millions. One of these last it was, who declared to Père Hyacinthe: "Jesus was a great prophet. Moses, Jesus, Mahomet, these three are great prophets. But God alone is God." If there was to be any closer union between the Monotheists of the world, such as already existed between a few enlightened liberal Protestants and Catholics, Jews and Musulmans, it could only be through the renunciation of any desire in one to conquer the other. There must be no Christian mission to the Jews or in Mohammedan countries.

EXCURSION TO HAARLEM.

Thursday afternoon was made memorable by the excursion to Haarlem, to which quaint old city the large party was taken by special train. There was much to be seen and enjoyed, from the pictures in the Town Hall, including some famous works by Frans Hals, to the charming woods on the outskirts, and in the centre of all the great church of St. Bavo, with its famous organ. There, at half-past three, a special recital was given, the organ pieces including an Adagio from Beethoven, and, last of all, the Hallelujah chorus, while the Zalsman Quartet sang very beautifully a number of old hymns, beginning with the Dutch national hymn, "Wilhelmus." In the evening, the party of about 400 dined together in the great hall of the Brongebouw—and words fail us to describe the scene. For two hours and forty minutes the crowded tables were beset, but much more than eating and drinking happened there. Very early in the evening National Anthems, one after the other, were played by the band, the company standing in more or less tumultuous patriotism, and taking up the strain. Then students' songs would surge from one part of the building to another, and after a time speeches began. In the midst of all this, the menu struggled steadily forward, and the whole proceedings were thoroughly festive in characteristically good-natured fashion.

Some of the speeches were heard, others not. Dr. Eliot stood up on a chair and made himself heard, replying to the toast of America; so did Professor Pfleiderer, after Dr. Cramer's eulogy, and the Chairman, Professor Oort, who proposed "The Ladies," and Mr. Wicksteed, who replied, and added some grateful words as to the spirit in which the English guests had been received. Even the list and order of the speeches we cannot altogether recall, much less the eloquence which flowed so freely; but it was eloquent of an abundant hospitality and international amity. After eight o'clock there was a band playing in the garden, to which ultimately the company adjourned, and then in the cool of the quiet night returned to Amsterdam.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER, 4.

Friday morning saw the concluding session of the Council, with five papers to be read in strictly limited time.

The Rev. N. JÓZAN, of Budapest, began, with his paper on "Religious Movements in Hungary," setting forth the lofty ideal inherited by his people from Francis David, their first bishop and faithful martyr. Then came Mr. K. ANDRESEN, of Blankenese, with a thoughtful paper on the need for a new presentment of positive doctrine, pleading that religious feeling requires a basis of definite fact, that superstition, whether religious or irreligious, may be avoided, and that reason must establish faith in God and immortality. A universal religious philosophy must take the place of sectional Christian dogmatics. Mr. Andresen's paper seemed to imply more confidence in our knowledge of the historical Jesus than Professor Pfleiderer had expressed on the previous day. The ethical ideal of Jesus, he said, will be the centre of a new free Christianity.

A Parable:

The Rev. G. SCHOENHOLZER, of Zürich, did not read his paper on "The Development of Free Christianity in German Switzerland," but handed it in, for inclusion in the volume of proceedings, and then gave a brief address, expressing the hope that the Council would meet next in Switzerland, and concluding with a vivid parable, taken from what he had seen in the Aquarium in the city. There was one fish, he said, very like the sand in colour, and he saw it bury itself in the sand, until there was nothing left but one little eye looking out watchfully upon the world. They must forgive him if he said that fish reminded him of their Erasmus of Rotterdam. But another he had seen, swimming freely through the water, rising to the surface for air and light, full of gladness in the energy of life. That was the pleasantest sight of all; and such they were who looked towards the light and sought the air of freedom and life. He had looked upon the marvellous works of God, and they became to him images of the mystery of their own life in God; for the Christian man must be and must remain a mystic, amid all his seeking for light and air, a mystic in the true sense, full of piety, waiting always for a fuller knowledge of the love of God.

From France to Japan.

M. BOURRIER, of Sèvres, editor of the Chrétien Français, followed with an account of the "Emancipation of Religious Thought among the Priests." He told of his own bitter struggle in breaking away from Rome, and how, having gained freedom, at so sore a cost, he could not submit to the trammels of a Protestant orthodoxy, but must maintain for himself and encourage others to claim a true spiritual freedom. He expressed his great indebtedness to the broad free spirit of the late Auguste Sabatier, who had been his teacher, and spoke of the growing influence of his paper, the Chrétien Français, which he had established in the cause of emancipation from Rome.

Mr. Z. TOYOSAKI then read the last paper, on "Liberal Religion in Japan," telling of the movements of thought among the Congregationalists in his country, and the German Evangelical Church in Tokio, and of the establishment of the Unitarian mission from 1887, when the first representative of the American Unitarian Association went over. There was now a liberal movement among the Buddhists also. No one system was likely to take hold of the whole people, but they would move forward on various lines towards the universal faith, in aspiration towards God and the love of mankind.

Words of Farewell.

At the conclusion of the papers an address of grateful acknowledgment was given by the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, the first President of the Council, who, on behalf of the visitors from other lands, referred to the splendid hospitality of their Dutch hosts. He spoke also of the impressive service with which the Council had been opened, and the noble and lofty words of the preacher, for which they desired to express the deepest thanks. The Shakespeare play and the music in the great church at Haarlem had also won their hearts. To the president, for the courtesy, dignity, and goodwill with which he had fulfilled his duties, they offered affectionate thanks. To Professor Eerdmans, who, as secretary, had been so unwearied and unfailing in courtesy and kindness, with such modest self-effacement, they made the sincerest acknowledgments, as also to Professor Groenewegen, the treasurer, and Mr. Hugenholtz, in whose beautiful building they had been privileged to meet. Many others had helped, whose names they did not know, but they were grateful to them all. He concluded with the hope that from the meetings of that week they would all go forth strengthened for their worship and their work.

A Message to the Lonely Ones.

Dr. OORT offered the special thanks of the Committee to Mr. Hugenholtz and the members of the Free Congregation for the hospitality of their building, so generously given, and then, on the motion of the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, the following resolution, read also by the Rev. F. C. Fleischer in Dutch, was unanimously passed:—

This meeting of liberal religious thinkers and workers, assembled in Amsterdam, offers its warm sympathy to those brave and often lonely souls who in all parts of the world, and under various names, are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty; and authorises the Executive Committee of the International Council to do all that lies in its power, by means of the spoken and written word, to increase fellowship and co-operation among them.

The New Committee.

On the motion of the Rev. C. W. WENDTE, seconded by Dr. Elhorst, the committee was then elected, as follows:—

Professor H. Oort (Leiden), president; Professor G. Boros (Hungary), Rev. W. Copeland Bowie (London), Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter (Oxford), Professor B. D. Eerdmans (Leiden), Dr. S. A. Eliot (Boston), Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz (Amsterdam), Professor E. Montet (Geneva), Professor O. Pfleiderer (Berlin), Professor Jean Réville (Paris), the Rev. G. Schoenholzer (Zürich), the Rev. C. W. Wendte (Boston), secretary.

Dr. OORT having added words of earnest farewell, the verse of the same hymn of aspiration which opened the service on Tuesday evening was sung by the assembled members, with organ accompaniment, and brought the meeting of the Council to a close.

EXCURSION TO VOLENDAM.

In a few words we must tell of the excursion on Friday afternoon. By ferry across the broad water of the harbour, and in a long string of carriages on the steam tram, the large party was conveyed to Edam, and thence made their way, a few by barge, the rest on foot, to Volendam, the quaintest of fishing villages on the Zuider Zee. There the women are picturesque and the men are wonderful in their clothing, and the long line of old houses, protected by the great sea wall, and beloved of artists, is full of interest. A special steamer took the party home, passing the island of Marken, and many regretful and affectionate farewells were spoken on deck, as the boat neared Amsterdam.

MEMORIAL VISIT TO LEIDEN.

While the others made their way to Volendam, a small company, at the instance of Professor Pfleiderer, accompanied him to Leiden, to pay a memorial visit to the Tiele Room in the University Library. This is the room in which the library of the late Professor Tiele, given by his widow, is kept together, with the furniture of his study, arranged as it was in his own house. The party, which consisted of Professor Pfleiderer, the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter and P. H. Wicksteed, Dr. and Mrs. J. H. Crooker, and Mr. and Mrs. Stapley, was met at the station by Professor M. J. de Goeje, one of the curators of the room, a distinguished Arabic scholar, and Dr. J. J. M. de Groot, professor of Ethnography. At the library they were received by Mrs. Tiele, and Professor Pfleiderer placed a wreath on Tiele's chair, which stands by the desk at which he used to work. Professor Eerdmans was to have been of this party, but was detained by his duties as secretary at Amsterdam.

DR. ELIOT'S PAPER.

LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY IN THE UNITED STATES.*

THE founders of the American Commonwealth were men who brought to the New World the best wisdom of the Old. The free State, the free church and the free school are the gifts to America of Puritan England and of the United States of the Netherlands. Spanish soldiers of fortune first landed on our southern shores, but left no permanent impression save of ruin and misery; the bold adventurers of France first explored the northern wilderness, and planted the fleur-de-lis on the rock of Quebec; but it is one of the most fortunate circumstances in all human history that the colonisation of the country was delayed until after the period of the Reformation, and especially until after the heroic struggle for liberty in the Netherlands and the rise of Puritanism in England.

Ideal Freedom:

The planters of New England and New Netherland were men trained in the principles of resistance alike to arbitrary civil power and to ecclesiastical authority. From that origin America derives its inheritance of complete religious toleration, a principle not only embodied in the National Constitution, but established in all the habits and convictions of the people. The creation and support of religious institutions in America is committed to the intelligence, energy, and faith of the people. No Government has either the will or the power to levy taxes for the support of churches, to prescribe systems of doctrine or forms of worship, to enforce discipline and uniformity.

The churches are supported by the free-will offerings of the people who voluntarily associate themselves for religious purposes. Every method of ecclesiastical organisation and all forms of religious thought are represented among the hundred or more Christian denominations, but no one denomination contains more than a tenth of the population. All have equal privileges, but no church has any other right to exist than that it partly satisfies some longing of the human soul. As a rule, Christian ministers in America are judged just as other men are, by their abilities, character, and public usefulness, and our churches are valued for the inspiration and comfort which they afford to their adherents and for the service which they render to the community.

The dominant influence in American Christianity is Protestant, orthodox, and evangelical. The most potent force in American life has been wielded by the descendants of those brave children of Calvin's spirit who vainly struggled for freedom of worship against English king and bishop, were nourished and taught in hospitable Leyden, and finally sailed prayerfully across the wintry sea to found a commonwealth upon the principle of equal rights. When the Mayflower company landed, all knelt together on the strand and William Brewster prayed for God's blessing on their hazardous adventure. The answer to that prayer is to be read in the self-reliant congregations, schools and colleges, in the self-governing communities that from the pine-clad Katahdin to the golden gate of the Pacific Sea gather millions of people into a church without a bishop and a state without a king.

Democracy Superseded Theocracy.

I do not affirm that the Puritan conceived his own principles in their amplitude and final application. He was a man of the seventeenth, not of the twentieth century. He meant to found a theocracy, but that brotherhood of equal rights we call democracy was in the inexorable, though unconscious, logic of his creed. "By their fruits," we read, not by their roots, "shall ye know them." In the chill April days, under the matted leaves of the Plymouth woods you will find masses of tough and fibrous roots. The flower that springs from them is the sweetest of the year. The root is hard and rough but the blossom is the mayflower. The root of Puritanism was a harsh theology, but the flower was civil and religious liberty. The blood of New England flows to-day in the veins of every state, and largely determines the character of American institutions. As on this autumn day the fresh sea wind blowing from the New England shore breathes health into many an inland valley, so the penetrating influence of the Puritan principle has been felt in every part and crisis of the nation's life.

I do not need to say that the original Calvinism of the Puritan churches has been profoundly modified, not only by the influences which are common to all civilised lands, but also by the special political theories and habits of the American people, and by the social conditions of new and rapidly growing communities. No religious body in America is precisely like the denomination which may bear the same name and acknowledge the same confession in Europe. In New England itself, Calvinism has disappeared. The original churches of the Pilgrims and Puritans are almost all Unitarian in faith and fellowship, while the so-called orthodox churches are almost equally liberal in theology and flexible in organisation. The prevailing Protestantism of the Middle and Western States is increasingly broad and catholic.

Schism and Progess.

Each one of the great orthodox denominations has been rent with schism. The Methodists are split into a dozen different bodies, the Baptists into as many more. The Cumberland Presbyterians represent a revolt from the Calvinism of the old-school Presbyterians; the reformed Episcopalians a revolt from certain rubrics and phrases of the Prayer Book, the Protestant Methodists a revolt from the Episcopate, the Unitarians a revolt from the Tritheism and dreadful teaching of human depravity which characterised eighteenth century Congregationalism. In each and every case the main body, instead of reverting to bigotry by the expulsion of its more progressive elements, has girded up its loins and followed hard after its own heretics. It is safe to say that the Unitarian schism in the Congregational churches, inevitable a century ago, would be impossible to-day. The Presbyterian Church has just succeeded in enacting certain radical amendments to the Westminster Confession. The Methodist and Episcopal Churches witness a steady decrease in the power of their bishops. The preaching in all Protestant pulpits becomes less and less doctrinal and more practical. Steadily in that conflict which Carlyle called "the struggle of men intent on the real essence of things against men intent on the forms and semblances of things," the victory tends to the side of those whose trust is in the light of reality. With increase of knowledge and the pressure of social problems the emphasis of the doctrinal teaching changes from the sovereignty of God to the Fatherhood of God, from the privileges of the elect to the rights of the brotherhood of man. The higher criticism of the Bible is taught in all but one of the Protestant theological schools of the Northern States. The study of the ethics of social questions more and more takes equal rank in the education of ministers with the study of theology. Conversion in most Protestant communions has come to mean nothing more than a decision to seek the truth and do the good. Regeneration has come to be regarded as a process of spiritual education, salvation as a "growth from selfishness into service." As to future destiny, the prevalent teaching of the Protestant Church is either a frank Universalism or a non-committal statement which looks any way except toward the old stern belief in endless punishment.

Orthodox Churches Peril.

While these churches have thus gained immensely—and still are growing—in breadth of view, in humane sympathies and in self-government, it may be questioned if they have also gained in ethical and spiritual vitality. It may reasonably be doubted if the present ministers and members of the orthodox churches are equal in loyality to truth and in the spirit of self-sacrifice to the men and women whose convictions were shaped by a severer creed and whose characters were disciplined in a more rigorous social and religious climate. The grave peril that confronts the orthodox churches to-day is that of insincere conformity. It would be easy to point out the scholarly deficiencies and the discrepancies between creed and practice. It would be easy to show the serious difficulties in which the professedly orthodox ministers and churches find themselves when they try to make new wine stay in their old bottles, to harmonise antiquated formulas and modern knowledge; to make seventeenth century phrases express twentieth century ideas; but to assail a great religious party just when it is struggling to adapt itself to higher truths and larger usefulness is too ungenerous a task. Let it suffice that the prevailing forces in orthodox Protestantism are generally liberal, tending to purify doctrinal systems, to popularise church government, and to elevate righteousness of life above dogmatic accuracy of belief.

Position of the Roman Church:

Besides the dominant Evangelical Protestantism two other important influences work in American religious life; on the one hand the Roman Catholic Church, and on the other hand the independent churches or fellowships which avowedly represent liberal Christianity. The Church of Rome has had a wonderful career in the United

* An Address at the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, Amsterdam, Sept. 2, 1903. By the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., President of the American Unitarian Association.

States. When the American Government was established the adherents of the Roman See were numbered as the least of the sectaries: they now constitute the largest single denomination. No stronger testimony to the power and discipline of the Roman order can be discovered than the rapid and thorough way in which, with slender resources, parishes and schools have been organised and equipped. The achievement of the Catholic Church in receiving and caring for the great masses of emigrants of diverse nationalities and tongues has been an exhibition of incomparable administrative ability. The unconscious action and re-action between Catholics and Protestants in America has been healthy. The Catholics have taught the Protestants how to study the infinite varieties of human nature, how to have compassion on the multitude, and how to call noble music to the aid of devotion. They have shown us the folly of taking away their playthings from spiritual children, and of permitting the devil to have all the good tunes. They have helped to mitigate the dulness of the Calvinistic Sabbath and to glorify social enjoyment and good cheer. Above all, they have defended the clinging love that refuses to believe in any great gulf set between our souls and the beloved dead. They have wisely interpreted the deep instinct of the human heart which believes in the Communion of Saints.

A Remarkable Change.

The mediæval elements in Catholic creed and worship have been profoundly modified by contact with the conditions of democracy. The Roman Church in America is different from the Roman Church in Italy, Spain, or Belgium. At first almost exclusively a foreign Church, both in priesthood and in laity, it more and more takes its normal place as a permanent element in American life. The priesthood is now chiefly recruited from American born youth, who receive their training in their native land, and who are generally as ardently patriotic as the sons of the Pilgrims themselves.

Romanism is divided from Protestantism by fundamental intellectual disagreements, but American Protestants must gratefully recognise that for a great mass of their fellow citizens the Catholic Church performs a service which no Protestant church is fitted to render. For those who have little power to think for themselves a church that can teach them how to obey is indispensable. The Roman discipline often unfolds a saintliness that may well bow our hearts in respect. If it upholds a doctrine of the Priesthood and the Sacraments which obscures the light of the Christian gospel, if it grossly carnalises religion, its very bigotry is exercised in a cause in which all Christians are enlisted. The earnest Catholic holds to his sacramental theories because he believes that through the Mass the eternal life of God can be made the actual possession of men. If we have found a more direct way to God let us not fail to recognise that, though by different paths, we are "urged by one great motive to the one end."

The Liberal Christians.

At the other extreme from Roman Catholicism are the free and independent Churches that are entirely fearless in their devotion to truth, and whose chief interest lies, not in the perpetuation of doctrines or ceremonies, but in the cultivation of the life of integrity, purity, and public serviceableness. The liberal forces in American Christianity are not confined to any one denomination or group of churches. They appear sporadically but unmistakably in all the churches, even in the great ecclesiastical corporations themselves. The liberal communion is the fellowship of all those who are intellectually hospitable, who do not fear that investigation can discover any poverty in God, who assign the seat of authority in religion neither to infallible church nor infallible book, but to the reason and spiritual capacity of man. The liberal forces have found their largest scope in the churches that are congregational in polity. I should not however, fail to testify that the gospel of the inner light to which the Society of Friends has borne brave and quiet testimony has been not the least of the liberalising tendencies as well as one of the purest moral influences in America. The sweetness of domestic life, the promotion of peace and all progressive social reforms, owe incalculable debt to the Quaker. I should also bear witness to the ethical contribution which reformed Judaism, proportionally the wealthiest religious communion in America, has made to the national life. The reformed Jews have set high standards of education in motion, the wisest and most thorough systems of charity. The recent development of the movement most inaccurately entitled Christian Science has been on the whole beneficial. It is entangled in a deplorable charlatanism and involved in most unscientific practices, but its fundamental philosophy, when cleared from the fog of verbiage, is found to be sane and broad, so that its general influence is undeniably wholesome. The simplicity of the Gospel of Christ is, however, most distinctly represented by the fellowships called Unitarian and Universalist, a little company of perhaps a quarter of a million people, gathered into some thousand independent congregations, with their chief strength in New England, but well represented in all the Northern and Pacific States, and sparsely in the Southern States.

These Free Churches find their justification for being in no passion for dissent or freak of wilfulness. They are the natural product of the good soil of Protestantism, and represent the Puritan principle in its highest development. Their distinctive teaching is the assertion that the finite spirit may hold communion with the infinite spirit without any mediation. The Free Churches build upon the faith that God is manifest in human life. In that faith they seek to guide life in clean and honest ways, and to consecrate intellectual and material resources to the glory of God by securing them to wise human uses. They preserve Christianity from being narrowed by priestly or scholastic interpretations. They refuse to allow religion to separate itself from other human interests. They collect the best wisdom of all lands and times, and with it feed the altar fires of the living God. I do not say that they have attained their ideal, but toward that ideal they tend, mightily assured that "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty"—not the false liberty which means lawlessness and breeds chaos, but the liberty of sonship, of service and of growth.

The Free Churches disarm certain natural prejudices against religion by allying it with common sense, with the best instincts of the heart, and with the happy service of the brotherhood of man. They preach a religion for daily life. They believe in the educational value of happiness. They hold to the naturalness of Christianity. They take for granted the divine life and longing in the hearts of men and women, and seek to quicken it by association and common work and worship. Their force is as that of a stream flowing from a mountain height which is feeble in origin, which may be here delayed and there for a moment diverted, now vexed with rapids and then calm in monotony; which takes to itself tributary streams and is refreshed by their brightness, which turns the busy wheels of human activity and finally finds its expanded power in the great eternal sea.

Co-operation Against Materialism.

More and more these Free Churches, whatever their name or denominational allegiance, are coming into conscious sympathy and co-operation. There are diversities of gift among them, but the same spirit. There are differences of emphasis and operation, but their intellectual agreements and spiritual affinities are increasingly manifest. They are urged to unity by outward pressure as well as by inward attraction. Sacerdotalism and materialism are arrogant foes that beset them on either hand. Of the prevalence of the commercial and secular spirit I need say little. Such as it is it makes itself sufficiently apparent to the most superficial observer of American life. Americans sometimes appear to be engrossed in trade and money-making, but it will not do to take this aspect of American life too seriously. Materialism comes up against the citadels of Christian theism with the noise and boast and flaunting array of Sennacherib against the cities of Judah, and sometimes in these days of our amazing commercial activity it seems as if "prosperity" were deified and the eyes of the people were dazzled by the new glory, and their hearts won by the invader's promise of riches and empire; but already, as to the Assyrian of old, is the word of the prophet being fulfilled: "By the way that he came up by the same way shall he return." There is no permanent peril to the deeper life of the people in the gusts of commercial passion that sweep periodically across the marts of trade. The soil that to-day brings forth the largest crop of weeds, will, perhaps, to-morrow bear the richest spiritual harvest.

The Growth of Sacerdotalism.

Sacerdotalism is a more unnatural phenomenon in American life. Its power is small, but its pretensions are great. In the Protestant Episcopal Church it is constantly growing in influence. It appears to furnish a religious home for some devout and submissive souls who need in their religious life the crutch of stated observances. It commends itself by the self-sacrificing, though often injudicious, labours of its priestly adherents in behalf of the poor of the cities. But its piety lacks the quality of robust manliness. It deifies correctness of speech and attitude, and represses individuality. It is fundamentally in opposition to the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free. It interposes semi-magical mediators between the Father-God and those who ought to be His fearless children. It really belongs within the fold of the Roman Church, of which it is a mutilated copy. It cannot but prove to be a temporary reaction against the prevailing liberalising tendencies that characterise American Christianity.

Grounds of Confidence.

What are the facts which justify a confidence that the Free Churches represent the type of Christian thought and organisation that will prevail in America? I leave out, for want of time, the influences which are everywhere at work—the time spirit, the spread of democratic institutions, the growth of the scientific habit of mind. Let me speak only of the influences that have peculiar potency in the United States.

(1) I mention first the absence of all legal and statutory barriers. Under the practice of universal toleration there is absolute freedom to grow and expand. The social ostracism of Dissenters is unknown in America save in immature communities. The liberal churches have only to overcome the opposition of theological prejudice or misunderstanding. If they fail in this new century to lead the intellectual and spiritual life of the nation, it will be because of their own inertness and unworthiness, because they have been "disobedient to the heavenly vision."

Congregationalism and Republicanism.

(2) I mention the fact that the Congregational policy of church government is best adapted to the political and socia life of a republic. The great ecclesiastical corporations, whether Catholic or Protestant, are at great initial disadvantage. All American institutions require constant re-adjustment to the changing needs and beliefs of a mobile people. A dogmatic system that admits of no reform is an anachronism in a democracy. It is only a free church that breathes naturally in the atmosphere of a free state. The two grew up together and are still interdependent. Further, any church that endeavours to transplant to America class distinctions or clerical pretensions is an alien in a land where every man carries his sovereignty under his own hat. The Roman, Anglican, and Lutheran communions all suffer from this handicap, while the independent churches, which are governed by their own local constituencies, which determine their own covenants and choose their own ministers, find themselves in accord with their environment and close to the national heart. The church that is self-reliant in administration, elastic in doctrinal system, that founds its ministry not on any fiction of Apostolic succession, but on sincere and Christian manhood, that describes itself as a company of the disciples of Jesus Christ united for the worship of God and the service of men—that church will possess the future if it is faithful to its opportunity.

Education makes for Liberalism.

(3) The statute requirement of universal education makes for the liberal cause. Every American child is obliged to follow the course of primary education providid for by local taxation, or its equivalent. The fact that one out of every twenty children in America secures the higher education of normal school, college, or university, is as novel and significant as the attainment of primary education by the other nineteen. Manhood suffrage is in a measure a prolongation of education, for it stimulates people to think of problems outside of their immediate occupations, to read about public questions and discuss the characters of public men. We may reasonably hope that the diffusion among all classes of people of the power of correct observation and just reasoning will deliver us from some of the theological errors that are perpetuated only by ignorance, and contribute to the spread of rational interpretations of Christianity.

Family Devotion.

(4) I venture to say that American family life has a quality of tender devotion and considerate courtesy, which is not, indeed, unknown elsewhere, but which is pervasive in America. The relations of husband and wife and of parents and children are generally just and gentle. The moral standards that guide family life are Puritanic in origin, and retain their potency; but the Puritan severity has entirely disappeared from the family discipline. It has been supplanted by a freedom and a demonstrative goodwill which sometimes seems slack and injudicious to critics of sterner mood. Now, the Christian life is much more a matter of the heart than of the head. Its root and type are in family love. The growth of tenderness and justice in domestic life cannot fail to make American Christianity equally just and kind and brotherly.

(5) There are some traits of character that are conspicuously American, and which contribute to the overthrow of false ideas about religion and the spread of ideas which are, indeed, as old in theory and utterance as the Christian Gospel, but which are new in realisation. They are, moreover, like all the special influences I have mentioned, the possession of women as well as men. The characteristic American love of humour and power of ridicule helps to bring all infallibilities to their doom. Many of the old errors are more readily laughed out of court than argued out. Dogmatic certainties and ecclesiastical arrogance are the easy victims of a pointed joke. All inflated claims and pretensions are quickly punctured by the needle point of wit. The good spirit of laughter is on the liberal side.

American Optimism:

Again, the American is naturally an optimist. His temperament and his experience alike persuade him to look on the bright side of things. His instincts favour belief in a cheerful and humane form of religion. The American has not the Scotchman's love for gloomy theological speculation, or the German's scholarly patience and industry, or the Frenchman's vivacious imagination. He pays allegiance to a religion that does something and does it quickly and efficiently. Again, he is not averse to novelties. He approaches new ideas with a cheerful confidence such as no other people exhibit. Many highly cultivated people in Europe are temperamentally conservative, and the persistence of established churches and conventional usages and outgrown dogmas is due to the fact that the best people are opposed to changes of which it is impossible to foretell the outcome; but for us Americans so many new experiences have proved to be fortunate experiences that we are are not disposed to regard novelties with distrust. Our continent is new and has proved marvellously rich. Our laws are novel, and have promoted human welfare and happiness. Our political machinery is an experiment, and it works well. Our people have pushed into unexplored territories and made them the abode of happy millions. The untried is therefore to us desirable rather than suspicious. A confident expectation of good characterises the American, and qualifies him to receive and adopt happier faiths and larger hopes.

Justified by Their Works.

(6) The brief but already historic record of the Free Churches commends their system to popular approval. Their just pride is in the type of character they produce, and in the men and women they have developed for the public service. The temperament which makes a man an independent in his religious thinking is usually the temperament which makes a man a leader in any occupation to which he gives himself. To an unparalleled degree the men and women trained in the fellowship of the Free Churches have served the cause of education, of philanthropy and reform, of literature, art, and science. I will not weary you with the recitation of the deeds of these men and women; I will not read the long lists of distinguished names. They are known of all who read American history. Suffice it that the fruits of liberal Christianity. are plentiful and good, and that the forms of faith and government practised by the Free Churches have proved their capacity to produce America's chosen leaders in almost every walk of life.

It is not for me in this presence to glorify these churches that I love, or that dear land of which they are the flower and pledge of spiritual harvest; I do not ask your praise for them, but I do ask you for your confidence, your co-operation, and your prayers of affectionate goodwill. May I not ask that the brethren who are bound with us in the control of the law of liberty, whatever their name or nationality or tongue, will pray for a blessing on their comrades far across the sea, on the quiet homes wherein the new generation is being trained, in simplicity and righteousness, on the congregations which after the way which men call heresy worship the God of their fathers, on their unconstrained religious life, on their eager search for truth; that these churches may justify their noblest hopes, and prove fit channels for the inspiration of the living God, declaring His messages, transmitting His healing ministries, entering into His abundant life, and rejoicing in His never-failing love.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Dundee.—The Rev. Henry Williamson has returned after a four months' visit to America, and at a congregational meeting held the other day a resolution heartily welcoming him home again was passed, together with a further resolution according to the Rev. G. A. Ferguson the best thanks of the congregation for "the able and efficient manner in which he had conducted the services and performed the whole duties of the pastorate during the time the Rev. H. Williamson has been absent."

London (Highgate).—In connection with the Robert Spears Memorial Hall, adjoining the church, a bazaar will be held early in December, and it has been suggested that amongst our readers there may be some who would like to assist this endeavour to reduce the balance owing on the new building. The collector on behalf of the Sunday-school is Miss B. Spears, Arundel House, The Bank, Highgate, who will be pleased to acknowledge any contributions.

Plymouth.—We regret to learn that the Rev. R. C. Dendy, who has been the minister of the Unitarian Chapel at Plymouth for rather more than two years, has been ordered by the physician whom he consulted in London to refrain from preaching for some months certainly, possibly altogether. Mr. Dendy was not allowed even to take leave of his congregation from the pulpit, and could only send them some farewell words, which were read to them on Sunday morning by Mr. Norman, who took the service.

MR. JOHN HARWOOD is prepared to give DRAMATIC RECITALS of two hours' duration to Societies connected with our own Churches and Schools, upon exceptional terms. Selections from Dickens's "Christmas Carol," "Cricket on the Hearth" (original adaptations), Shakspere, Colman, Sheridan, and other Authors; also a novel "Lecture," entitled "The Art of Public Recitation: its Humours and Difficulties—a Leaf from my own Experience," followed by one hour of illustrative Recitals.

Address, Fair View, Pendleton, Manchester.

HOLBECK, LEEDS.—Domestic-street Unitarian Church. Pulpit vacant. Applications invited.—Apply to the Secretary, GEO. A. REASON, Daisy-hill, Rawdon, Leeds.

CULLOMPTON, Thursday, Sept. 17th. —Bazaar, at Parish Rooms, in Aid of Fund for Chapel Improvements and New Organ. To be opened at 2 P.M., by P. J. WORSLEY, ESQ., B.A., J.P. Friends cordially invited.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses. —For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

FREDK. LONG & SON,
AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,
4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK
Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.
INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.
CURRENT ACCOUNTS
2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%
DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
2½% repayable on demand. 2½%
STOCKS AND SHARES
Purchased and sold for customers.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.
C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

DEATH.

SCEATS.—On Sept. 10th, after a few days illness, James Sceats, aged 51 years. No flowers, by request.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, September 13.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton. Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M.
Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.
Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M and 7 P.M., Rev. F. W. STANLEY.
Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
Deptford, Church-street, 11.15 A.M. and 6.30, Rev. A. J. MARCHANT,
Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M., Rev. GORDON COOPER, B.A.
Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.
Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. R. H. U. BLOOR.
Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. Gow, B.A.
Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. R. H. GREAVES.
Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. F. B. MOTT.
Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.
Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.
Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7.0 P.M., Rev. E. S. LANG BUCKLAND.
Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
Peckham, Avondale-rad, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. G. CARTER.
Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.
Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M.
Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.
Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, East-hill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Dr. MUMMERY.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. McDOWELL.
BEDFORD, Library (side room). Vacation.
BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.
BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Church, The Hall, Lytham-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS.
BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. C. C. COE.
BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.
BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET.
CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., Rev. J. REMINGTON WILSON, M.A.
DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.
GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. GARDNER PRESTON.
HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. WALTER H. BURGESS, B.A.
LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. ERNEST PARRY.
LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. J. JUPP.
LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON, and 6.30 P.M., Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.
LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. PHILEMON MOORE, B.A.
PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.
PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 P.M., Mr. THOMAS BOND.
SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M.
SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.
SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.
SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.
STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church Tyler-street, 7 P.M., Rev ARTHUR RYLAND.
TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
WINDERMERE, Albert Hall, Cross-street, 11 A.M., Rev. W. R. SHANKS.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.
WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M., Mr. J. ISLAN JONES, B.A.

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH,
SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F. Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS.

SOUTH-PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.—Sept. 13, at 11.15 A.M., J. A. HOBSON, M.A. "Survivals of Barbarian Ethics."

PULPIT SUPPLY.—Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY, 28, Downshire-hill, Hampstead, N.W.

NUT FOODS.

The following Nut Foods are specially suited for the hot season:—

Banana and Nut Food, 7d., 1/-, and 1/4 per Tin. A new delicious food made from ripe fresh Bananas and Nuts. Can be sliced for sandwiches, or used as cheese.

Almond Cream, 3½d., 1/-, and 1/10 per Tin. Unrivalled as an accompaniment for fresh or stewed fruit.

Malted Nuts, 2d., 6½d., and 1/- per tin. Promotes digestion of all cereal food.

Full descriptive Price List from the Manufacturer:
HUGH MAPLETON,
COLONIAL HOUSE, ARDWICK GREEN, MANCHESTER.

Reckitt's
PARIS BLUE.
THE BEST IS THE CHEAPEST.

Schools, etc.

CHANNING HOUSE, HIGHGATE, LONDON, N.
HIGH SCHOOL for GIRLS
and UNITARIAN BOARDING SCHOOL.
("Recognised" by the Board of Education.)

COMMITTEE OF MANAGEMENT.

F. J. NETTLEFOLD, Esq.
Mrs. BLAKE ODGERS.
F. PRESTON, Esq.
W. A. SHARPE, Esq.
Mrs. W. A. SHARPE.
HAROLD WADE, Esq.
Mrs. WILLIAM WOODING.

Miss LILIAN TALBOT, B.A. Honours Lond., Head Mistress.

BOARDERS' FEES:

Fifty Guineas a year, and Seat in Chapel One Guinea. Music, Six Guineas extra: or £17 17s. a term: with Music, £19 19s.

Ministers' Daughters £10 13s. 6d. a term, or with Music, £12 5s.

Outside Sanatorium, Laundry at Home, Electric Light. Good Playground and Garden. Tennis, Hockey (in field hired near School).

Opportunities afforded for Sight-seeing, Concerts, &c.

The Terms include Board, Lodging, necessary Laundry, all class lessons up to London Matriculation, Drawing, Class-singing, Physical Drill, Divinity.

Extras.—Music, Shorthand, Type-writing, Dancing, Gymnastics, Cooking.

Day Scholars, 3 to 5 Guineas a term; Music 1½ Guineas extra. Kindergarten, 2 to 2½ Guineas a term.

Next Term begins Sept. 16th.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

"The College adheres to its original principle of freely imparting theological knowledge without insisting upon the adoption of particular theological doctrines."

PRINCIPAL:
REV. J. DRUMMOND, M.A., LL.D., D.Lit.

For particulars as to Lectures and Bursaries for Students for the Ministry, apply to the Principal, or to one of the undersigned:—

Secretaries { H. ENFIELD DOWSON, Gee Cross, near Manchester. A. H. WORTHINGTON, 1, St. James-square, Manchester.

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
14 & 15, SOUTH MARINE TERRACE, ABERYSTWYTH.

PRINCIPAL ... MRS. MARLES-THOMAS.

This School is splendidly situated in one of the healthiest parts of Wales, overlooking Cardigan Bay, and close to excellent golf links. Pupils have passed the London and Welsh Matriculation; Cambridge Higher Local; Senior and Junior Cambridge Locals, besides the usual Theoretical and Practical Music Examinations. Scholarships have also been obtained at the Welsh University Colleges.

Gymnasium, Swimming, and excellent Hockey Club.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, BISHOP'S STORTFORD.
Head Mistress, Miss ESTHER CASE, Certificated Student of Girton College, Cambridge, Classical Tripos.
Next Term begins on September 17th.

VACANCY for one Boarder, not under 12, in September. A high percentage with Public Examinations has been gained. In July eight pupils passed R.A.M. and R.C. Associated Boards (Local Schools), one aged 14 gaining distinction in Higher Division. Music or Art can be made a specialty. Excellent references.—PRINCIPALS, Bestreben High School for Girls, Brondesbury, N.W.

WAVERLEY SCHOOL, 24, HAMILTON ROAD, SHERWOOD RISE, NOTTINGHAM.

PREPARATORY TO THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
HEAD MASTER, Mr. H. T. FACON, B.A.(Lond.).
Next Term begins Wednesday, September 16th.
Prospectus on application. BOARDERS received. Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, Essex House, Campden-hill, W.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN, NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON
(Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS

By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

DAILY MEDITATIONS

(Fourth Edition Revised.)

NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.

Cloth, red edges, 6d.; roan gilt, 1s.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

"THE MILL HILL PULPIT."

VOL. XI., No. 12.—"THE NEW POPE."
A Sermon by
Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A. (Leeds).
Price 1d.—A new Volume commences with the October number. One copy of each monthly issue posted to any address for 1s. 6d. per annum. A complete catalogue of the last 11 years printed numbers sent free.—CHAS. STAINER, 82, Ravenswood-terrace, Hyde Park, Leeds.

POPULAR SERVICES FOR THE PEOPLE.

CARLTON THEATRE, GREENWICH, S.E.
Sundays, Oct. 11, 18, 25, and Nov. 1.
GRAND THEATRE, ISLINGTON, N.
Sundays Nov. 8, 15, 22, and 29.

HELPERS WANTED.

Stewards, Canvassers, Members of Choirs, &c. Please write to

Mr. GEO. CALLOW, Fern Villa, Morley-road, Lewisham.

Mr. A. WILSON, 2, Ella-road, Crouch-hill, N., or

Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, 18, Gardnor-Mansions, Church-row, Hampstead, N.W.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17 Mincing-lane, E.C.
Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.
F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.
Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.
STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOINSON, Pier-street.

Situations, etc.

YOUNG LADY seeks post as Maid to elderly lady. Unitarian. Nursing experience. Massage.—M., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, W.C.

TYPIST required for small General Copying Office. Must be well educated, and do clean, correct work; also a PUPIL to prepare for vacancy.—Write fullest particulars to Miss A. BECKS, 50, Rupert-street, Shaftesbury-avenue, W.

AS ORGANIST.—A Minister's Daughter, having had many years' experience, requires a position as above.—Address, Organist, INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, W.C.

WANTED, by Lady Artist, Home in family, partial board on very moderate terms, in return for Evening Lessons in Painting and French. S.W. district preferred.—M. F. H., 7, Roehampton-street, Vauxhall-bridge-road.

GOVERNESS, Resident, seeks re-engagement. Certificated English, Drawing, Sciences, French, Music, Drill. Or as Secretary, Companion.—ELLINGHAM, Thorpe St. Andrew, Norwich.

CAPABLE LADY (44) desires position of trust. Good health. Cyclist. Some Nursing.—S., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, W.C.

WANTED, re-engagement as Governess or Nursery Governess. Good French, Botany, Latin, Elementary Music, and Mathematics.—M., 12, Richmond-terrace, Cardiff.

Board and Residence.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged.—Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

BOURNEMOUTH. — ARNEWOOD. En Pension. Grand position in West Cliff-road; sea views; South aspect; close to Winter Gardens, Promenade, and Pier.—Apply, MANAGERESS.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT. Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH, DEVONSHIRE.

A HOLIDAY RESORT FOR YOUNG LADIES OR SCHOOL-GIRLS, WITH OR WITHOUT CHAPERON.

Charming little Devonshire town. Perfect Sanitation. Sea and Moorland. Bracing air. Walks, excursions, picnics, splendid bathing. Main line G.W.R.

Terms and other particulars from THE PROPRIETOR.

BOARDING HOUSE.—THE FELL, TROUTBECK, WINDERMERE, is situated 550 feet above sea-level, and about 2½ miles from the station at Windermere. Every home comfort.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate.—Saturday, Sept. 12, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3195. NEW SERIES, No. 299.] LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 617
ARTICLES—
Public Worship 620
Beowulf 621
Christianity and Tariffs 623
The Place of Christianity among the Religions of the World 624
The Conception of God as "The Soul of all Souls" 627
A Business Man's Religion 630
LITERATURE—
Les Affirmations de la Conscience Moderne 619
Dr. G. B. Gray on "Numbers" 620
LEADER—
Echoes from Amsterdam 624
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 623
CORRESPONDENCE—
Dogs for Vivisection 618
Country Holiday Movement 618
Bishop Miraglia 618
Temperance Sunday 6-1
Secular Education 622
The Convention and Dear Sugar 622
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 630
ADVERTISEMENTS 631

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MR. WATTS is at work on a colossal statue of "The Dawn." "The idea was first suggested to me, I think," he says, according to a Daily News interview, "by the rise of dawn over a great expanse of sea. I want to give a sense of majesty, of the breadth and hopefulness of early morning." So speaks our greatest living artist at 85. "I should like," he adds, "to be remembered as a teacher rather than for brilliance of execution. Letters from people who write to me, saying my pictures have helped them, these are much more valuable to me than any amount of art criticism. I have a good many letters of that kind." One can well believe it, for there are surely few more certain external aids to the regaining of a spirit of worship and high resolve, than a visit to that wonderful Watts room of the Tate Gallery, for those fortunate enough to live within reach of it.

THE prospectus of "First Garden City, Limited," has been issued. Of the proposed capital of £300,000, the first issue is 16,000 £5 shares, for which subscription is now invited. It is stated that the board of directors (which includes well-known men of business) give voluntary service, "looking for their reward in the realisation of a reform which they believe to be essential to the vital interests of the country." Mr. Ebenezer Howard, alone, receives a salary of £400 a year, and devotes his whole time to the management of the affairs of the company. The problem for which it is claimed that a solution will be found by the successful establishment of Garden City is—"How to maintain and increase industrial efficiency without impairing the national physique." Copies of the prospectus can be had from the Secretary, 347-351, Birkbeck Bank Chambers, Holborn, London, W.C.

A SERIES of photographs and a map of the site of the first Garden City have been prepared. The estate, consisting of 3,800 acres, acquired at a cost of about £40 per acre, from various owners, is situated between Hitchin and Baldock, in Hertfordshire. The Great Northern line to Cambridge runs through it, and it is within one and a half miles of the same company's main line to London and of the Midland line from Bedford to Hitchin. The site is within thirty-five miles of London. There is a good supply of water. Negotiations with manufacturers who think of removing into the country and who are likely to appreciate the advantages of Garden City are proceeding, and there seems good hope of a happy realisation of an idea which looks to the happiness and healthiness of the whole of the people. If one garden city is successfully established it will certainly show the way which many may follow.

THE British Association for the Advancement of Science has been holding its annual meetings at Southport. The presidential address of Sir Norman Lockyer was concerned mainly with the well-worn theme of the need for extending, improving, and systematising our national provision for higher education, especially in science, if we are not to be left behind in the commercial race with other countries. There are, of course, higher grounds on which to base the advocacy of better education, but in these utilitarian days this is doubtless the one which has most hope of a hearing. The irony of the situation lies in the fact that Sir Norman Lockyer enforced his argument by copious quotations from the very men—Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Balfour, the Duke of Devonshire and the rest—best placed to carry out themselves the improvements they advocate, but who have instead used their opportunities merely to hamper and disorganise—to use no stronger terms—that elementary education, a sound grounding in which is the only possible basis for an efficient course of higher instruction, scientific or otherwise.

RADIUM, that revolutioniser of all accepted theories regarding both force and matter, naturally came in for a principal share of attention at the sectional meetings, and chemists and physicists have evidently a great deal of investigation and speculation to get through yet before they can fit the new substance in with their reading of natural law, or—an alternative which they seem more likely to have to adopt—can so revise their reading of natural law as to fit both the new substance and the more docile elements whose properties have hitherto been supposed to be duly numbered and accounted for.

THERE is a great store of good books stowed away in public free libraries and seldom or never asked for by the public. How can these libraries be made more useful? The matter was dealt with at the Conference of the Library Association which met at Leeds last week, especially in the presidential address. An excellent suggestion is that lectures should be given by competent men under the auspices of the Free Library managers, which would rouse interest in books of real literary value and make easier the comprehension of their meaning. Such lectures need to be prepared not for those who are already literary in their tastes, like the majority of literary lectures, but for the uninitiated—those who need to be interested and shown how to find profit and enjoyment where they have not looked, or have not hitherto succeeded.

AN attendant at one of the largest free libraries in London is quoted in the Alliance News as expressing his surprise at the large number of books generally called "English Classics" which every library keeps, but nobody ever thinks of reading. He declares that Spenser's "Fairy Queen" has never been asked for during the five years the library has been open, and Milton's "Paradise Regained" only once—by a University student who needed it in preparation for an examination. Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations" went out only twice—on both occasions to Socialist debaters in a neighbouring park. Speakers at the Library Association Conference at Leeds deplored the general taste for scrappy literature and the small demand for the books of solid worth. Usually suitable rooms are available in the library buildings, in which educational work might be done and the great treasure of English literature opened, at least in part, to some who have not yet found their way to it.

THE position of high politics at home is indeed bewildering. The Cabinet has held two sittings, one of them of great length, at which, it is understood, the attitude it is to assume toward Mr. Chamberlain's proposals for taxing food was exhaustively discussed. Since the Cabinet contains both ardent supporters and vehement opponents of the plan, and since—up to the time of writing, at any rate—no resignations have been announced, it has generally been assumed that the discussion can only have resulted in an agreement to postpone a final decision on the plea of "further inquiry."

YET on the morrow of these meetings the Prime Minister himself, hitherto understood to hold a neutral position with "an open mind," has published an essay which proclaims his complete acceptance of the detestable policy of "retaliation." This essay, published as a preliminary to his Sheffield speech on Thursday week, has, he tells us, been in the hands of his colleagues since the beginning of August,—before Parliament rose. It was, therefore, with this pronouncement before them, and with the knowledge that it was immediately to be elaborated on the public platform, that Ministers came to whatever decision they arrived at, at Monday's Cabinet Council. What can that decision have been which left the Duke of Devonshire and Mr. Ritchie still members of the Government in face of such a situation? Can it be that the Prime Minister himself, as well as the Colonial Secretary, is to have, and use, "a free hand," without being regarded as committing his colleagues to his views?

WE are brought one step nearer to the cataclysm which continued inaction on the part of the Powers must inevitably bring about in the Near East by Bulgaria's moderately worded Note of protest. "The Turkish Government," it says, with literal truth, "is systematically annihilating the Bulgarian people" in Macedonia. "The Government considers it its duty to appeal to the sentiments of justice and humanity of the Great Powers, praying them to save an entire Christian population from the complete extermination which threatens it." Alas that such an appeal should be necessary! It is said that the Powers are now "remonstrating" with the Porte. Remonstrances are useless unless backed by coercive measures, as has been abundantly shown in the past. The Powers asked the Porte to suppress the revolt, well knowing the methods by which such a task is usually accomplished by the Turk. The Sultan has tried to oblige them. Their only legitimate procedure now is to stop both the revolt and its repression by freeing the Macedonians from his rule.

Meanwhile, Bulgaria has given fair warning that if the Powers will not act she must. "The mobilisation and concentration of such great forces in Eastern Turkey, under the pretext of suppressing the revolution, gives Bulgaria reason to suppose that, at an opportune moment, she will be attacked by Turkey. The Bulgarian Government can no longer remain indifferent in presence of such a situation." The Powers are asked to require the Porte to "recall its mobilisation orders and cancel its measures for the concentration of troops, which are in no way justified in view of the correct attitude of the Government of the Principality." If this is not done, Bulgaria will be "obliged to take the necessary steps to be ready for every eventuality, and not to be taken by surprise." When those steps are taken there will be war.

WE have received a letter from Mrs. Cole, hon. treasurer of the Women's Armenian Relief Fund, dated from Danehurst, Putney, London, S.W., urging that we should all, "especially the women of our happy British Empire and of America," testify their sorrow, indignation, and sympathy with the Macedonian sufferers in some practical way. She points out that the work done by the various Armenian relief committees has shown what a great amount of good small beginnings can achieve in coping with starvation and destitution in Asiastic Turkey. "As soon as the revolt is over it is probable that the American missionaries and British Consuls in Macedonia may see their way to establish Industrial Relief Bureaux, upon the plan adopted in Armenia, and so save at least a remnant of the population." Mrs. Cole urges, therefore, that we should "lose no time in doing, even individually, what is possible under the circumstances by forming local Macedonian relief committees." We heartily commend the proposal to the consideration of our readers.

DOGS FOR VIVISECTION.

SIR,—The refusal of Mr. Akers-Douglas to make any inquiry into the sources from which dogs are obtained for cruel experimental purposes, is perhaps not very surprising from a man who is an avowed supporter of vivisection, and who recently set the seal of his approval on the brutalities of a noted vivisector, but it gives considerable food for thought.

Very many poor homeless "strays" undoubtedly find an agonising death in vivisectional laboratories, and stolen dogs—our own dear lost household pets—do they sometimes meet the same terrible fate? There are, unhappily, people in the world who would not scruple to pick up a dog only temporarily lost, and dispose of it to a "scientist" for a shilling or two; and it was coolly admitted by one of this fraternity that he took all the dogs brought to him and "asked no questions!"

Where do all these poor creatures come from? "From sources, no doubt, many and various," says Mr. Akers-Douglas, and considers the subject unworthy of further attention; but surely all owners and lovers of dogs will be of a very different opinion. Can anybody who has loved and lost a dog, and who retains the memory of his quick intelligence, his faithful love, and winsome ways, possibly tolerate the thought that he may have ended his life amid the inconceivable horrors of the vivisector's inferno?

A General Election cannot be far distant, and then I trust that, for the honour of our country, vote-holders will show a true English and manly detestation of cruelty by refusing to return to Parliament a candidate like Mr. Akers-Douglas, who declares that "nothing could induce him" to introduce or vote for a Bill for the abolition of the loathsome barbarities of vivisection.

Meanwhile, all who love our faithful friends, the dogs, and pity their awful sufferings, can help by sending for a petition for their exemption from torture, to be had gratis from Mr. G. J. Knight, 151, Strand, London. A. GIBSON.

Rochester, September 7.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.

SIR,—May I venture to place before your readers a short account of the working of the Children's Holiday Movement during this summer, and to solicit additional contributions in order that the balance sheet may not show a deficit at the close of the year?

More than 400 children have already been sent for a fortnight into the country, and, although the wet weather prevented their having quite so pleasant a holiday as usual, still, almost without exception, they have returned with ruddy cheeks and renewed health and spirits.

It has been said that a holiday nowadays is largely a search for health, and no doubt the fortnight spent in the country has a stimulating effect on the minds and bodies of the little dwellers in the crowded streets.

In addition to the money expended upon the work, a large amount of time is spent and a great deal of trouble incurred by those friends who carry out the arrangements. The number of such helpers is large, and their personal devotion great. Some of these lovers of children have even given a considerable part of their own holiday in order to live with the boys and girls in the country. I feel sure that your subscribers would not desire that such devotion should be restricted by lack of the necessary funds.

I acknowledge with many thanks the following donations: Mr. Edward Blake, £1 1s.; M. S., £1; E. F. G., £2 2s.

A. J. LAWRENCE.

23, Campden House Chambers, Campden Hill, London, W.

Miss Lawrence writes later acknowledging with thanks receipt for this fund of the following further sums:—

Mrs. Holt, £1 1s.

Two Irish Lady Friends, £2.

BISHOP MIRAGLIA.

SIR,—The Italian daily Il Tempo, the best advocate of Socialism in Milan, writes of our friend, Bishop Miraglia, as follows—(I translate, of course, into English):

Don Miraglia's Preaching in Switzerland.

Geneva, September 14 (our telegram).

Don Paolo Miraglia is working here with great and successful zeal, preaching indefatigably.

His public addresses in Basel, Berne, and Zurich are attentively listened to by multitudes of Italians. The Swiss journals are full of articles, biographies, and anecdotes upon the "New Savonarola."

Being asked about his meaning and nearest purpose, he replied that he intends shortly to return to Italy and convert his native Sicily to Protestantism.

FERDINANDO BRACCIFORTE.

Milan, September 15, 1903.

THE third issue of "The Nationalist" (2, Southampton Buildings, High Holborn) contains an "Appreciation" by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, of Mr. Brook Adams's "Law of Civilisation and Decay."

TO SAVE FRANCE.

"AFFIRMATIONS OF CONSCIENCE" WHICH BRING NEW LIFE.*

THE last decade has seen the beginning of more than one non-sectarian religious movement in France. The importance of every such movement in a country so distracted by the great sectarian antagonisms, and, in these later days, so devoured by materialism, must be evident to all thoughtful observers. Perhaps, "movements" have never been far to seek in France since the Revolution; but recent events, pre-eminently the Dreyfus Affair and the Nationalist agitation, have shown the need for something more practical than mere social or political theories; they have turned men's minds to the great problem of moral education. The true French patriot has realised that the one hope for his country lies in the higher practical morality; that it is only as the moral consciousness is quickened in his fellow-citizens that they will be able to resist those cyclones of passion which from time to time devastate every people, and to which the Latin races appear to be peculiarly liable.

The Need of the Hour.

The crisis of the Dreyfus Affair showed clearly how wide might be the gulf between social idealism and practical social insight and morality. From the throes of that crisis was born a movement which may be of the greatest importance to the future of France. As yet in their early years, the popular universities or Homes of the People (Foyers du Peuple) are already to be found in many parts of the country. They aim less at merely intellectual than at social education, and are in reality associations for co-operative social inquiry and practice. They belong to no political or religious party, and their first principle is that of solidarity.

In order properly to appreciate the significance of this work, English readers should turn to an address on the Affirmations of the Modern Conscience delivered by M. Séailles in 1897, under the auspices of the Union for Moral Action,† and now published together with other papers and addresses on kindred subjects. M. Séailles is much more than the professor of philosophy in the College of France; he is one of the most potent inspirers of French youth; and this address, besides showing us the foundation upon which the Popular University Movement stands, gives us a glimpse into the best and most forceful of contemporary French thought upon those social and moral problems which beset us all.

Faith and Action.

Here are set forth some of the present-day affirmations for which men seek. M. Séailles delivers us alike from effete sentiments and from barren negations. Practical in the best sense, and the implacable foe of all those historical, sentimental, or ecclesiastical adjuncts of religion which tend to undermine the immediate action of morality in the actual circumstances of to-day, his thought is far from mere agnosticism. It rests upon the one sure basis of faith—which it shares in common with all true mysticism—the experience of life. With keen, but unprejudiced mind, he seeks to understand the affirmations of actual moral experience; in them, and in no speculative or historical hypothesis apart from them, does he find the religion for which the world is seeking.

Faith, says Emerson somewhere, consists in assenting to the affirmations of the soul; it is the very thought which M. Séailles never tires of enunciating. But for him, as for Emerson, this assent is no mere subscription to a formula; it is a realisation which involves the whole being, it is a transformation of the whole of life into conformity with those affirmations. We lack faith, not because we lack ideals, but because our lives do not realise them. "Only action suppresses doubt," because we can only know of the Divine order by participating in it; it is only as morality comes to flower in our lives that we may be sure of that actual Presence of which sacramentarian and dogmatic religions have failed to assure us.

"Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité."

What, then, are the affirmations of the soul to-day? M. Séailles finds them summarised in the motto of the Republic. But it is a spiritually enhanced ideal of liberty, equality, and fraternity that he proclaims. To be free is to express oneself: but first, the self must be evoked. That mere succession of states of consciousness, held together by some inclination or prejudice, but the slave of innumerable suggestions, which serves as a self for many men, is incapable of liberty. "We only rise into being in rising to liberty, in mastering our multiple inclinations, in subordinating their diversity to the logic of a will faithful to the same thought. . . . Our life must be, as it were, entire in each of its moments." Liberty is thus identified with true self-realisation. It is the first right and duty which the modern conscience affirms alike for the self and for others. Social liberty is that moral union and spontaneous accord which is the individuality, so to speak, of a community or people. In this one thought, what vistas of political and social progress unfold!

The Demands of Solidarity.

The second affirmation is that of equality, the equal right of every man "to make of himself the man that he may and can be": the equal right of every man to share in those social resources which aid in the evolution of a large and worthy manhood and womanhood. And the third is of fraternity, or as we should now say, perhaps, of solidarity. It is this which absolutely prohibits our standing aside in a sort of monastic solitude, or as philosophical and indifferent spectators of the human comedy. We are pledged to share in the human lot; because all have worked for us, we must work for all. This conviction of human solidarity makes the old idea of charity appear rather as a denial than as an affirmation of brotherhood. We can no longer be content with the mere attenuation of misery, we refuse to resign ourselves to it. Pity, and the alleviation of suffering is not enough; the solidarity of humanity demands that we should employ all the strength of mind and will to bring the conditions of life into accord with justice, that is to say, with the principles of equality and of liberty.

It is only in loyalty to these ideals that the life of the Republic can continue. The forces of destiny, the laws of the moral order are such that if it fails in this loyalty it will surely perish. But to succeed is to re-create humanity in the image of God. Such teaching should not be limited to the Republic of France, it belongs to the Commonwealth of the Human Race.

RICHARD ASKHAM.

* "Les Affirmations de la Conscience Moderne." Par Gabriel Séailles. (Armand Colin, Paris. 1903. f.3 50.)

† Founded by Paul Desjardins, Charles Gide, Gabriel Séailles, Charles Wagner and others, in 1893, to unite men of many faiths or of none, in seeking to create that public spirit, that social morality, without which civilisation is in vain.

DR. G. B. GRAY ON "NUMBERS."*

BUT few words are needed to commend the latest volume of the International Critical Commentary, on "Numbers," by Dr. G. Buchanan Gray. The materials of the book are so varied,—prose and poetry, legend and legislation, that they test severely the commentator's strength. Dr. Gray reminds us at the outset that the only book in English of any real value was the translation of Keil's conservative work five and thirty years ago. No one had even been found to reproduce Dillmann's commentary of 1886, still less to attempt a new one. Dr. Gray's book justifies his modest remark that "even since 1886 standpoints have changed, and knowledge on many special points has increased." His previous studies in Hebrew proper names, and his articles in the "Encyclopædia Biblica," had awakened high expectations, and they are amply fulfilled. Here is copious and exact learning, united with a fine linguistic tact, and a broad outlook over history and religion.

Bold, yet Cautious.

Dr. Gray's documentary analysis is based upon the modern view of the sources of the Hexateuch; and though he is always cautious about details, he has a clear eye for the recognition of essential facts, such as the mingling of two situations in the law of the jealousy ordeal, and the composition of the Balaam book out of two sources, J and E. With respect to the stratification of the great Priestly Code he is more reserved, though he recognises frankly the secondary character of many of its sections, e.g., in 28–36.†

* A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Numbers, by GEORGE BUCHANAN GRAY, M.D., D.D., Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Exegesis in Mansfield College, Oxford. (T. & T. Clark.) 12s.

† In commenting on the symbol P^t adopted to designate a body of Priestly Teaching by Carpenter and Harford in their arrangement of the Hexateuch, Dr. Gray objects that the symbol "suggests a unity, though it cannot be shown that the various matters included under P^t ever existed, like the Holiness Legislation, as a separate code." But surely it is the difference between a body of Teaching and a Code that the former is not a unity; it is an oral tradition based on previous uses and judgment, certain parts of which are put into writing, and incorporated in a great legal collec-

The pages of this journal are not suited for the discussion of technical detail. But we may call the attention of students to the accurate grammatical treatment, and the discriminating sense of the fitness of different words, as well as of their use in successive literary periods. Textual problems are handled with much caution, but with no conservative adherence to the received text; the careful discussion of the textual indications in the use of the divine names at the outset of the Balaam book, is an admirable illustration of sound and sober judgment: Geography and archæology receive ample share of attention.

The Wanderings and the Conquest.

The problems of the Wanderings and the Transjordanic Conquest are problems for the historian rather than for the commentator; but the materials which must serve as a basis for reconstruction of the traditions are accumulated with great care; and the author does not hesitate to say, for instance, concerning the huge endowment of the Levitical cities, "this history is fictitious." For the description of Yahweh's march in front of Israel, Dr. Gray aptly quotes from an inscription of Ashur-nâsir-abal, "With the exalted help of Nergal, who went before me, I fought against them." There are samples of Rabbinical interpretation, and the sections of anthropological comparison are exceedingly rich. The holiness of the censers of Korah and his company, Aaron's rod and the blossoming of "dried sticks," the dedication of first ripe fruits, purification from uncleanness by the dead, the story of the bronze serpent, all give Dr. Gray excellent opportunity, and the illustrations are not drawn only from such obvious sources as "Primitive Culture" and the "Golden Bough."

A Parallel from Ashantee.

Beside the parallels of the ordeal by a draught of water in v. 11. 31, Dr. Gray may like to set the account of the Adum-draught of West Africa, given by Beecham "Ashantee and the Gold Coast," 1841) who supplies an explanation not cited by Tylor:—

> The person charged with the crime is required to drink the nauseous mixture, and it is believed that if he be innocent his stomach will reject it, but if guilty it will not make him sick. It is supposed that the fetish goes down with the water into the man's stomach, and looks about in his heart for the guilt, that if he discovers the prisoner to be innocent he comes back with the draught which is vomited up again, but that if he finds the alleged guilt, he remains in the stomach with the water to inflict upon the culprit the merited punishment.

Out of a similar order of ideas arose the custom described under the "law of jealousy." Dr. Gray rightly says that "The highest that the religion of Israel attained to can only be fully appreciated in the light of the lowest which it touched, sometimes wholly, sometimes partially, to transform and ennoble."

J. E. C.

tion, often with the formula, "this is the Torah of . . . ," where Torah is much nearer the meaning of a priestly "deliverance" or "teaching" (Deut. xvii. 11, Hagg. ii. 11), "Ask the priests for a torah," i.e. a decision on a doubtful case—the origin of much formulated law—than to our sense of enactment.

PUBLIC WORSHIP.

THE TRUE CONCEPTION OF ITS MEANING AND END.*

By the Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D.

A nobly human and truly catholic worship is dissolvent of sectarianism. It is through the door of devotion that the once warring and still differing faiths are slowly marching toward fellowship and co-operation. Those who cannot believe alike can worship together; for spiritual reverence is as unsectarian as God.

Just because worship goes so deep and sweeps so wide a circle, it is of greatest importance in the religious training of the young. Let us not forget or under-estimate the value of truth, or instruction, or correct belief; but what most of all makes the church dear and sacred to people is its worship. The most precious spots are not those where the mind has discovered a fact, but where the heart has been thrilled by a mighty emotion: where love awoke; where duty called to heroism; where God was felt. These are the shrines of life. The cords that bind the young to the church are not the iron bands of doctrine, broad or narrow, but the mystic threads of devotion. The place where they worship; where the heart finds its overflow of wonder, hope, and joy—this becomes sacred; and this sanctity will attract and command when dogmas fade and beliefs change.

Why the Churches are Losing Ground.

People are leaving the churches not so much on account of disagreement with their creeds, common and serious as this is, but because the worship lacks warmth, power, the authoritative note of reality. More services in the church fail at present because the minister has a cold heart and a doubtful spirit than because his address is intellectually weak, though modern preaching is discouragingly unscientific. The fact is, a reverent love outpoured in worship so as to make people realise that they live in a moral universe will feed and bless those whom the doctrinal discussion has not touched.

The Protestant churches are losing hold of the rising generation largely because the children, attending only the Sunday-school, do not worship in the church. No powerful associations are built up touching the life at its centre and holding the heart like anchor chains to the church as an institution loved and revered. So that when children outgrow the Sunday-school no affectionate interest in pulpit and pew exists to bind the young to religion. To hold and help people, particularly young people, during the trying period of theological reconstruction that is upon us, while old beliefs are being painfully surrendered and the new truths are being slowly organised into life, nothing is more important than that the church give most careful attention to its worship. This is both the way of wise policy and also the way of largest helpfulness; for only by the grace and power of devotion can multitudes be guided through this transition and kept within the realm of vital piety.

* Further passages from a paper read at Essex Hall at the Ministers' Meeting in Whit week.

We must Come with Souls Prepared.

The worshipful spirit is obviously fundamental to the conduct of public worship. It must fill pulpit and pews alike at the very beginning of the service. It is not a flame to be slowly kindled; it must already burn in the breasts of those who assemble. The conductor of an orchestra is able to conduct the musicians before him because they are already trained and their instruments are in tune. He would have a hard time if he had to wait for them to learn their parts and tune their instruments after he mounted his stand. So, if we are to have congregational worship worthy the name, the congregation must be in tune when the organ starts. Also, they must be on hand at the start, like the members of the orchestra. The Quaker meeting is deeply impressive because the reverent friends began to worship before they left home. The Mosque is a place of most profound solemnity because each Moslem there, absolutely indifferent to everything else, is intent on his own devotions.

If the spirit of worship is to dominate the church service, and this is what is necessary, the devout heart must be brought to church. You do not go to your friend's house with the branch of a rose-bush and ask him to hold it until it blooms: you carry the open rose. So men and women must come to the church with the soul already blossoming in wonder and trust. Let people come to church as they go to their office or shop on Monday morning: all alive on Sunday with reverence as they are alive on Monday with business intent and activity.

Minister's Need of Sympathy.

The importance of all this may well be urged from another point of view. The sympathetic audience helps the minister preach. He can do but little without that supporting sympathy. So too, the minister cannot really pray in the presence of a thoughtless, restless, irreverent crowd. Imagine Liszt or Remenyi trying to play in the midst of a rabble. The prayer of the minister ascends no higher toward heaven than what it is pushed by the devout hearts of his people. The minister cannot conduct public worship unless the people are worshipful. In attitude, manner, expression, they must show that they are worshipping. As the minister goes into the pulpit with heart and mind aglow with devotion, so the people must bring to their pew the spirit of reverence. Not there as spectators, but there as participants; not there to be dragged into devout attitudes, but there as actual worshippers; not there to be convinced that God is, but there because they feel His presence; not there in a spirit of curiosity to be entertained, but there in a devout mood to be led in prayer and praise. And it is the duty of the minister to educate a congregation in habits of reverence as in forms of religious belief.

Essentials of Church and Service.

The methods for the expression and cultivation of reverence are numerous, the forms for the conduct of public worship may vary, but a few things are primary and essential.

(1) Simplicity and catholicity are necessary: simplicity in setting and catholicity in sentiment. A church, contrary to the common speech and general custom, should never be decorated. The colour scheme should be in neutral and harmonious shades. When many brilliant hues are laid on, we have "the painted squaw" of Lowell's contemptuous line. The eye should not be distracted by mottoes and memorials. The light should be soft and sedative without being sombre. The aspirations that come to expression in prayer and praise should be those that are central in human life: those common to the general experiences of mankind.

(2) The conduct of public worship must have dignity and impressiveness. It must be orderly, felicitous, commanding. Through everything must run the evident greatness of the occasion. A lounging, fussy, awkward, uncouth man in the pulpit, inattentive, whispering, restless, staring people in the pew: these are an abomination unto the Lord. Of all bad manners, bad church manners are the worst. The language of minister, ritual, and music must be chaste, direct, noble: a fit symbolism of the sublime feelings of the soul when engaged in contemplation of such exalted themes as duty, immortality, God. There must be no doubtful disputation: affirmation must be absolute. The defect of American worship is its light and frivolous air; its colloquial and sociable mannerisms, as though God were a chance acquaintance to be patronised.

Custom and Originality.

(3) The greatest difficulty is to combine freshness and familiarity in the conduct of public worship, so that formality may be avoided on the one hand, and mere flatness on the other. We need to wed together the force of habit and the power of originality. The few great passages in Scripture; the noblest hymns and anthems—ripened out of the world's richest experiences—become more and more precious by frequent use: association continually enriches them until they are expressive and helpful beyond description. Here is the benefit of an established ritual; and this element ought to find a place somewhere in every place of worship. But beside this, there ought to be opportunity for variety, originality, and spontaneity: an open door through which the immanent God may report Himself, an open oracle through which the living soul may phrase its passing aspiration and speak its sense of present need. The heart of man ought not to be shut up in formulas, however venerable and sublime. It should have a chance to cry aloud out of the depth of its sorrow or gladness or contrition in a language prompted by the experience of the moment. The true ideal is: forms kept flexible by the spirit of freedom, and freedom kept within the bounds of propriety by forms that serve without sacrificing the soul.

No Room for Coldness.

The matter of supreme importance is not whether forms be many or few, the ritual simple or elaborate; but whether the minister in the pulpit and the people in the pews are deeply in earnest. If reverence is abundant, if God and man are actually loved, if the sweet and tender things of life are really felt, there will be beautiful and helpful worship as sure as a clear sky and a balmy air make a perfect June day.

And there is no reason why churches of broad and modern faith should be cold and unattractive in their services of worship. In fact, there is every reason for just the opposite. Where should the beauty of holiness be more beautiful than in a church that believes in the immanent God as the Father of Infinite Love? Where should worship be more tender, warm, and catholic than in a church that affirms the divinity of man and the brotherhood of men? Where should reverence glow with a clearer and brighter radiance than in a church which accepts the whole universe as the temple of the living God, traces providence in the widest sweep of history, and honours every man as the immortal child of the common Father?

What True Worship Means.

Public Worship—What does it mean? It means an escape from the petty things of the day and entrance into the presence of the sublime verities of eternity. An escape from the irritation and depression of the moment and entrance into the serenity and uplift of a spiritual experience. An escape from the discords of our own selfishness and entrance into the peace and melody of a great love.

Public worship means being at home in a divine world ruled by justice and mercy; claiming our immortal inheritance in the family of saints and communing with all the pure spirits made perfect through suffering. Public worship means the light of a day whose sun never sets, the music of "a choir invisible" whose song never wearies, the shelter of a tender providence that never fails. Public worship means a consciousness of the mystery of life that solemnises and exalts the duties of the passing hour; a thrill of joy indescribable; a companionship with God the Father that purifies, gladdens, and ennobles.

In worship we shed the sordid and the selfish, while we grow as souls into the realisation of our divine sonship. The worshipping heart puts on an armour that protects from the shafts of every enemy; it overflows with gracious and heroic motives that equip for every service; it luxuriates in an ecstasy of delight that is pure blessedness. To worship is to appropriate the divine bounty and take our place, consciously and gladly, in the family of God.

TEMPERANCE SUNDAY.

SIR,—May I take the liberty, through your columns, of calling the attention of ministers and Sunday-school superintendents to the date—November 29—on which it is hoped that special reference will be made both from the pulpit and in Sunday-schools to Temperance work.

In view of the appalling evils created by the drink traffic it is imperative that every possible effort should be made, in the interests of moral and social progress, to free the rising generation from temptations to which so many of their elders have fallen victims.

J. BREDALL, Joint Hon. Secretary.

National Unitarian Temperance Association, September 15.

BEOWULF.

THE RELIGION OF THE HERO OF A GREAT SCANDINAVIAN EPIC.

THE poem of Beowulf, called by Mr. Stopford Brooke, "Our Genesis, the Book of our Origins," remained hidden for centuries, and even now is known but to the few.

It still awaits a version in modern verse which is true and beautiful, and, excellent though some of the prose translations are, they have not caught the ear of the populace.

After waiting about a thousand years for even the scantiest recognition, Beowulf can doubtless afford to wait without impatience for that fuller appreciation which the coming years will surely bring.

Has not Mr. Stead already included a brief abridgment of the story in his "Books for the Bairns"? And who knows but that "Jack, the Giant Killer" may not have to reckon with a formidable rival in "Beowulf, the Dragon Slayer" before many generations have come and gone?

Such a consummation is devoutly to be wished, for nothing but good could result from a more intimate knowledge of our only genuine epic.

It is so absolutely, nakedly pure; the standard of duty and fair play or fair fight fixed in it is so high, that its influence can only be healthy.

Chastity, Valour, and Melancholy.

The men of Beowulf's age had not degenerated from their ancestors of a few hundred years earlier, whom Tacitus described for all time—"Nemo enim illic vitia ridet: nec corrumpere et corrumpi, sæculum vocatur." And the genius of the great historian reveals another national trait of which the poem of Beowulf contains many an instance, when he says, "Lamenta ac lacrimas cito, dolorem et tristitiam tarde ponunt." Ah, yes! the sorrow and sadness remain in those true Northern hearts long after the tears are dry, and the ashes of the funeral pyre all cold.

These qualities—chastity, valour, and a profound melancholy—were evidently in the Norse blood. The men of Beowulf's day inherited them from an earlier race. They were not a Christian importation. The Christian element in Beowulf is, indeed, one of the most baffling of the many problems raised by the poem. It is so slight—almost too slight and colourless to be called Christian—and yet, such as it is, too persistent and prevalent to be dismissed, or, in my opinion, to be ascribed to that convenient fiction, the suppositive Christian editor.

Christian or Pagan?

Early in the poem the writer assumes a tone of superiority to the religious practices of Hrothgar and his Danish subjects. After the havoc wrought by the monster Grendel in the Mead-hall of Hort, he thus describes the vain efforts which were made to procure help in the emergency from heathen divinities. I have endeavoured to make a strictly literal translation:—

Whiles they promised at idol shrines sacred service, bade with words that the Ghost-slayer aid would grant against the threatened calamity. Such was their custom, the heathen's hope, hell remembered they in their mind's sense, the Creator, the Judge of deeds, they knew not, neither wist they the Lord God, nor indeed knew they how to praise the Heaven's-helm, the Ruler of Glory.

A tone of superiority to the heathen superstition of the Danes is very evident here. We find something like contempt for the "heathen's hope," and the "Ghost-slayer's aid"; but what is very remarkable is that the imputation of paganism is to be found nowhere else in the poem.

Monotheist, at any Rate.

In other parts of the work the religious sayings, feelings, and practices of the characters mentioned are touched upon, but never with a hint of their heathenism.

Thus, for example, Beowulf and his followers, after their successful voyage, thank God, not the gods, "God they thanked, that for them the wave-path had been easy." And to show that this monotheism is not confined to the Geats, but is the practice of the very Danes, whose religion has been called in question, notice the expression of the Danish coast-guard on taking leave of the strangers: "Fæder alwalda mid ar-stafum eowic gehealde sida gesunde (The all-wielding Father with his protection keep you safe in your journey)."

The scanty allusions to Scriptural characters and events in the poem are very puzzling. They consist of a mention of Cain and Abel, of the Creation of the world, and of the Flood. Grendel is said to be of Cain's progeny after the Creator (Metod) had banished Cain for slaying Abel. "Thence evil progeny all were born." The same event is again alluded to when Grendel's mother appears upon the scene, and it is after the description of Beowulf's conflict under the water with this horrible hag, that we find an obscure allusion to the Flood. In that struggle Beowulf had seized an ancient sword, on the hilt of which was engraved a description: "Of the ancient strife sithence the flood, the flowing ocean, had slain the giant's kin; overboldly they bore them. That was a people strange to the eternal Lord, them, therefore, a last reward through water's rage the Wielder gave."

No Mention of Christ.

Such allusions, meagre as they are, and mingled with matter which is by no means Scriptural, are the only direct references to the Bible which the poem contains.

The New Testament is entirely ignored, and no mention is made of Christ, of the saints, or of the Church.

When a recent commentator declares that "the number of Christian passages is very great," he must give a large latitude to the word Christian. There are, indeed, allusions to hell, to evil spirits, and, most Christian epithet of all, to the bosom of the Father (Faeder faedmum), which occurs but once.

And yet, with this almost entire absence of anything distinctively Christian, there is as marked an absence of anything distinctively pagan, with the solitary exception of the passage which alludes to heathen rites. With this exception, unquestioned monotheism enters into the whole texture of the poem, and could hardly have been interpolated by some Christian copyist. The interpolating Christian copyist would never have stayed his hand at monotheism; while about his alterations he would have made the poem distinctively Christian.

Beowulf's Fatalism.

No true notion of the religion of the poem could be gained without a recognition of its fatalism, a fatalism so pronounced as to qualify the monotheism which has been described. In one instance fate appears to receive from the writer the attributes of Deity. With God is Wyrd, and it is not easy to say whether she is to be regarded as a person or not; as a rival Deity or an attribute of God. Beowulf is a pronounced fatalist. In making his will before the conflict with Grendel, he exclaims, "Goes Wyrd ever as she must," and at another time he acknowledges, "Wyrd oft saves an undoomed man when his valour avails"—an assertion which, perhaps, would hardly satisfy a strict Determinist. But his fatalism is most marked in the speech before his last conflict with the dragon. "But to us it shall be at the mound as Wyrd, the Maker of every man, determines." Here the word Metod—whether Maker, Measurer, or Portion-giver—applied to the Creator earlier in the poem, is used of Wyrd, and used by Beowulf, who, before his first conflict with Grendel, had expressed such unhesitating confidence in the decree of the wise God. How shall we account for this inconsistency? Had the hero lost his early faith? Was the author himself halting between two opinions, or, what is perhaps more likely, was he holding two contradictory opinions with that inconsistent hospitality which is so marked a characteristic of the human mind?

Who was the Author?

The vexed question of the authorship and date of the poem scarcely comes within the limits of this brief sketch of its religion, but to the writer the inconsistency just alluded to, and the slightness of its Christian colouring, seem to favour the opinion of Mr. Clark Hall, who says:—

So I picture to myself a Mercian courtier—perhaps a Scop—whose early life may have been spent under the heathen Penda, who changed his religion with the Court, without being able to get, or perhaps even wishing to get, definite instruction in the new faith, and who perhaps came in some degree under Northumbrian literary influences, writing the earlier part of the poem, pretty much as we have it, about A.D. 660, and the later some twenty years or so after that."*

CLEMENT E. PIKE.

ONE of St. Paul's favourite notions of heresy is "A doting about strifes of words." One side may be right in such a strife, and the other wrong, but both are heretical as to Christianity, because they lead men's minds away from the love of God and of Christ, to questions essentially tempting to the intellect, which tend to no profit towards godliness. —Dr. Thomas Arnold.

Add Pars for Inquirer.

* "Beowulf, and The Fight at Finnsburg, a Translation into Modern English Prose." By John R. Clark Hall, M.A., Ph.D.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

SECULAR EDUCATION.

SIR,—The Trade Union Congress, on whose importance you so justly commented threw its weight upon the right side this week at Leicester, in the matter of education. But its animus was not, as your note might lead readers to suppose, against "sacerdotalism," but was directed equally against the bigots on both sides of the present squabble, whether Church or Dissent.

The Congress was in favour of purely secular education during school hours, and of religious education outside school hours, in the school buildings, by the ministers or other representatives of the sects to which the children's parents belong.

Apart from the Congress discussion on this subject, a meeting was held to promote this method of solving the problem, at which the Countess of Warwick, the Rev. John Page Hopps and others supported it. Leicester claims the honour of starting this movement for a fair and equal settlement of the question, for Mr. Allanson Picton has advocated it for thirty years, and at the last School Board election we returned Mr. Gould, against both Liberals and Tories, to represent this view.

When Passive Resisters will consent to take their stand on a straight and logical issue, there will be some chance of obtaining a truly national education system. Unfortunately, however, on this question, as on so many other matters of reform, when the proposal is put to our Dissenters and Liberals they either reply, "But that is what we stand for" (which obviously they do not), or else they attack us for being "irreligious."

Leicester. W. WHITAKER.

[Let our correspondent have patience. The stars in their courses are fighting for the secular education policy. "Undenominational" religious teaching was an ideal worth striving for, and was no "bigots'" conception. But it depends for its success upon a general acceptance, which has hitherto been denied it, and the alternative is the exclusion of all religious teaching in school hours—an alternative which we shall not all of us welcome as eagerly as Mr. Whitaker.—ED. INQUIRER.]

CONVENTION AND DEAR SUGAR.

SIR,—As one who knows something about sugar, and a good deal about the West Indies, I must comment on two misstatements in the two paragraphs about the Sugar Convention in your Editorial Notes of last week. [Sept. 5.]

Those best competent to judge are satisfied that the Sugar Convention will not only not raise the average price of sugar in the future, as compared with the average price of the last ten years, but are equally satisfied that the price in the future will be considerably less than would have been the case if what you justly describe as the "pernicious bounty system" had been allowed to continue.

To anyone acquainted with the West Indies your statement that "the few sugar growers would be more profitably employed growing fruit" is quite ridiculous.

It does seem to me a pity that, by reason of political bias, THE INQUIRER should commit itself editorially to statements about affairs of which it has so little information.

FRANK PRESTON.

Meadowcroft, North Finchley, N.

[Mr. Preston boldly averages up not only past but future fluctuations in the price of sugar over long periods, and tells us which will be the lower. Other varying causes may or may not prove to have neutralised the loss to the consumer caused by the withdrawal of the foreigner's export bounties, and an assertion either way can scarcely be characterised as a "misstatement" yet awhile.

That the immediate effect of the change was to increase prices, even before it had actually come into force, Mr. Preston will hardly deny. How, indeed, by the rules of simple subtraction, could it be otherwise? Traders who desire legislative protection for their markets always are "satisfied" that that legislation will not raise the price to the consumer, but somehow it generally does.

As to the wisdom of distressed sugar planters cultivating fruit instead, Mr. Preston, "knowing a good deal about the West Indies," must surely be aware that we have quite respectable authority for the view we have expressed. At the worst it is a mistaken opinion on the facts, and, once more, not a "misstatement."

Advocates of legislation for the protection of a trade always deny a knowledge of the facts to those outside. But there are facts known to the consumer as well as to the producer, and at the present moment the consumer is faced with the very concrete fact of dearer sugar. It is not "by reason of political bias" that THE INQUIRER advocates the cause of cheap food. Its opposition to protective legislation dates back a little further than Mr. Chamberlain's present campaign, to days when that cause was felt to be above all party expediency.—ED INQUIRER.]

"CHRISTIANITY AND TARIFFS."

IN the September issue of his Sermons for the Day, entitled "Christianity, Economic and Present-Day Politics," the Rev. R. A. Armstrong incidentally enforces the need recently dwelt upon in THE INQUIRER, for the application of Christian ethics to the present controversy over the tariff question.

The one thing (he says) to which Englishmen of every school and party should first address themselves should be that at any rate the question raised shall not be determined by the force of covetousness in any classes, trades, or capitalists whatever.

The man who looks on these tremendous problems from the narrow standpoint of one small group of people betrays the principles of Christ. It is not the manufacturers nor the shippers nor the farmers who are to be considered first, but the people. Nay, it is not the interest of Englishmen or colonists that is to determine, but the welfare of the human race. He who sets out to solve these problems is to consider the brother nations too.

"Retaliation" is not a word that has the savour of Christianity in its accents. He who is to weigh the arguments, whether of Free Traders or Protectionists, with honest effort to reach the truth, has first of all—before he begins his reasonings—before he is qualified to weigh their force—to clear his own heart from covetousness; for all covetousness must inevitably tend to deflect his judgment and to vitiate its balance by loading with false weights.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

MESSAGES FROM AN ANCIENT CITY.

IT is worth while to remember and think about the saying, "This world is full of messages;" for the messages, if we watch for them, come to us, warning and teaching and helping us on our onward and upward way. I am going to tell you a little about a wonderful city which has some of such messages out of its past to give to us. Have you ever read Longfellow's poem called "Nuremberg," written after he had been to visit that place? Here are the first four verses. Perhaps they may make you want to read the rest of the poem, if you do not already know it.

In the valley of the Pegnitz, where across broad meadow-lands
Rise the blue Franconian mountains, Nuremberg, the ancient, stands.

Quaint old town of toil and traffic, quaint old town of art and song,
Memories haunt thy pointed gables, like the rooks that round them throng—

Memories of the middle ages, when the emperors, rough and bold,
Had their dwelling in thy castle, time defying, centuries old:

And thy brave and thrifty burghers boasted, in their uncouth rhyme,
That their great imperial city stretched its hand through every clime.

Nuremberg.

Nuremberg lies in Bavaria; and to reach it one must travel far over sea and land across the German empire. On a vast plain bounded with distant blue hills is Nuremberg, with the river Pegnitz winding under its old bridges and reflecting on its still waters the image of the quaint red-roofed houses. The city was founded a thousand years ago, and round it still stand the walls and battlements that were built to defend the people in the warlike days, when emperors "rough and bold" lived there, and were ready to fight against the enemies who threatened them, at times, on every hand.

Just outside the walls lie the plains on which the men of war came forth with banners and weapons from the old castle on a hill within the city; and in this castle, which still stands as strong as ever it did, there are dungeons to be seen, where miserable prisoners used to be confined, and terrible instruments of torture are shown to curious visitors, which tell tales of cruelty of which one cannot bear to think.

These are some of the messages which the old city of Nuremberg has to give us out of those far-away days, and I think they tell us that then men were only still gradually rising out of their likeness to wild animals, and warn us that we, in these later days, know better ways of settling quarrels than by battle-fields and torture chambers.

Work Well Done.

But there are other messages which the city of Nuremberg has to give us. There are beautiful sculptures carved in stone above the doorways; figures of saints and angels on the walls of the old churches, and within the churches, tombs of great men, whereon sculptors have told some of the lessons from their lives; and artists have painted on their walls and windows pictures of sacred subjects that waken good thoughts in those who see them.

And this is another message which the old city has to give us. It is full of good work; the wood carving and the iron ornaments on the gates and doors are all perfectly made, and the buildings strong and without flaw; all that is out of sight as true and good as the work that shows. It seems as if people then must have loved all their labour and wanted to make it as perfect and honest as it could be made. Those old workmen in Nuremberg seem to have known nothing of our modern "scamping" and carelessness; and this is a message for us from them, that "all that is worth doing is worth doing well."

Hans Sachs.

In the middle of the market-place, surrounded by a garden full of bright flowers, is a statue, more than life size, of a famous man who lived in Nuremberg hundreds of years ago. His name was Hans Sachs, and he was a cobbler who made boots and shoes for the townspeople. As he sat at work, making his shoes, he composed great numbers of hymns and poems which had a wonderful influence over the whole German nation; and by his writings he helped to spread the teachings of Martin Luther, who was the great leader of the Protestant Reformation in Germany in those days.

Long after he died the people of Nuremberg put up this statue to Hans Sachs, who is known as "the cobbler bard"; and there he sits in bronze, wearing his cobbler's apron, his kind face beaming down on the crowds below; and the story of his good life will never be forgotten in the town.

In Nuremberg, too, is a statue of the artist, Albert Dürer, who lived there at the same time as Hans Sachs, and spent his life in making beautiful pictures that do people nothing but good to look upon—never anything among them that has not something lovely and of good influence about it.

Lives of Great Men.

There are other statues in Nuremberg, which keep fresh the thought of the great men who lived there in past times. And this is one of the things best worth having in any city—the memory of those whose influence acted for good in their lifetime and will last on for ever; for the results of thoughts and deeds that are true and noble never pass away.

Think, too, of the number of unknown people to whom statues have never been raised, who have followed where these heroes have led and whose lives have been moulded by the examples set them.

This is the last message from our ancient city. We are all, each in our own small way, "making history." Even children who do well the work they have to do, however trifling it may seem, who stand bravely true to what they know is right, help to spread a good influence among their companions which extends from one to another; and thus by little and little we may all help to mend the world.

FRANCES E. COOKE.

IN this world we can only look on nature from the outside; perhaps there we shall be able to see it from within.—J. F. Clarke.

NOT to know at large of things remote
From use, obscure and subtle, but to know
That which before us lies in daily life,
Is the prime wisdom.—Milton.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom, or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 19, 1903.

ECHOES FROM AMSTERDAM.

WE have already recorded our own sense of the great success of the International meetings at Amsterdam. From all sides, among our own people, we hear expressions of gratitude and pleasure. The friends of liberal religious thought and life have undoubtedly been strengthened and encouraged, and have gained fresh insight into the significance of the cause to which they are pledged.

This experience is, happily, not ours alone. The meetings were International in the truest sense, and now that they are over, we find the same testimony borne by the representatives of other countries. Thus Professor JEAN RÉVILLE, in a first article on the meetings in Le Protestant, having described the origin of the International Council, and its ideal, not to serve the interests of any one denomination, but to promote the union of all liberals on the basis of the moral and religious principles of the Gospel, bears grateful witness to the uniformly earnest and religious spirit which characterised all the utterances of the week, and declares that any friends of the liberal faith who may have been inclined to lose heart in face of orthodox intolerance, must now be roused to a new confidence in ultimate victory, and be of a better courage.

And it is a special pleasure to find that our hosts in Holland, upon whom the arduous work of preparation fell, and who had all the anxiety inevitable in connection with such great gatherings, are amply satisfied with the result, and feel that for themselves also it was good that these meetings were held in their country.

The editor of De Hervorming writes very warmly of the results of the week, both in the delightful gatherings of friends, and the impulse given to the cause of liberal religion. "Come together from all parts of the world, we have felt how mighty is the stream of liberal religious life, and have been thereby quickened and encouraged."

Professor KNAPPERT, of Leiden, also writes in De Hervorming the first of a series of articles on the great significance of the meetings, especially as bearing on the present tendencies of religious life in the churches of Holland. He speaks enthusiastically of the happy days in Amsterdam, which have "strengthened our faith in ourselves, and have renewed our courage." Many voices, from different parts of the world, declared the strength and beauty of liberal Christianity. "It was like a new pledge of loyalty to the old flag." To those who bore the burden of the meetings Professor KNAPPERT expresses the greatest thankfulness. "They have conferred on us a great benefit. We feel more closely bound to one another. We believe again more profoundly in what we can accomplish, in our future, in the world-wide circle of our brothers."

One more witness we must cite, and that is Dr. H. L. OORT, of Utrecht, a son of the President, to whom we were indebted for the admirable report of the meetings which appeared from day to day in the Nieuwe Rotterdamsche Courant. In a concluding article in that paper, one of the most influential in Holland, Dr. OORT wrote of the thorough success of the congress, far exceeding their highest expectations, and of how greatly it had strengthened their faith in the power and significance of liberal religious life. Having happily recalled the chief memories of the week, the sermon in the old church, the PRESIDENT'S address, Mr WICKSTEED'S address, which made a deep impression, and the singing of the "Wilhelmus," by the ZALSMAN quartet in the great church at Haarlem, the article concludes :—

> We might also record how greatly we were struck by the fact that amid such differences of view as between a Wicksteed and a Bruinning, an Eliot and a Carnegieter, between Pfleiderer and Andresen of Blankenese, there was yet such a feeling of unity. What differences in Christology, in critical and historical points of view! What differences also, due chiefly to the personality of the speaker and the nation to which he belonged, in the measure of faith in the triumph of the cause of freedom. Here an almost child-like idealism, and there lamentation over oppression and misunderstanding; here one who spoke as though the cause were already won, and there as though it must always be rowing against the stream, in face of opposition and indifference.
>
> Once more the various faces pass before us and we hear again the words in many languages, interpreting the one language that we all know and which we came together to hear.
>
> Yes, they were good days, and they shall bring forth better!

Yes, we also say. They were good days. The spirit of truth and brotherhood prevailed. By that spirit we are content and happy to be led, because so the Spirit of Divine Providence holds us in life, calls us to our work, and opens to us the vision of the better days which are to be.

THE PLACE OF CHRISTIANITY AMONG THE RELIGIONS OF THE WORLD.*

BY THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A.

A DISTINGUISHED American lecturer, it is related, once dealt in an hour with the religions of the world, past, present, and to come. A theme of similar scope has been alloted to me, with precisely half the time. Under such conditions it is plain that I can offer to this assemblage only the heads of a discourse. I must proceed from assumptions which I cannot stop to justify; I must affirm conclusions which I have no opportunity to defend. I ask your indulgence, therefore, for the necessary inadequacy of this address, in addition to the inherent limitations of my thought and speech.

I.

ANCIENT RECORDS.

Wider Outlook on Religions.

The last century, as everyone knows, has witnessed the rise into historic view of an immense panorama of religions. Whole sacred literatures have come to light. They have been discovered in the temples and the tombs of Egypt; they have been dug up from the mounds of Mesopotamia; they have been gathered from the immense libraries of India, China, and Tibet. The significance of religion as a factor in social evolution has been forced on the attention of the students of human things. It is no longer possible to thrust it aside as a device of priests for their own maintenance, or an invention of cynical statesmen for the police of empires; it has its rightful place among the forces of thought which have shaped the organisation of life. Whatever be the explanations of its origin, and they are many, no one will deny that it is a part of the mind's own interpretation of its relations to the world of its experience; and the development of religion from its lowest to its highest forms is always in some way connected with the intellectual and moral outlook of the community or the individual in which any specific expression of religion may take shape.

A Uniform Standard of Judgment.

The result for the student is inevitable. It is his duty to investigate the conditions under which each new type of faith arises, to ascertain (so far as he can) the causes which have moulded its beliefs, created its moral standards, and defined its institutions. He must take account of the elements contributed on the one hand by the society around—the common medium of thought and conduct—or, on the other hand, by the personality of the teacher. Whatever method, standard, and presuppositions he applies to one must be employed with equal faithfulness for all. Religions as historical products must be judged in the same way as the other great creations of the human spirit—law, poetry, art. The ultimate explanations may be beyond our reach. I do not think it possible to account for Amos or Isaiah, any more than for Æschylus and Sophocles. There are mysteries of personality which we cannot fathom. In a certain family at Nazareth who can tell why Jesus was Jesus, and James and Joses were—well, James and Joses? But we must investigate the origins of Christianity in the same way as we should study the origins of Buddhism, even though Gotama the Buddha and Jesus the Christ, with all their ethical likeness, stand at the opposite poles of religious faith. This view has yet indeed to secure definite recognition. The General History of Religion, by Dr. Conrad von Orelli, of Basel (1899), assigns to Christianity less than 2 pages out of 848; while the brilliant treatise of your distinguished fellow-countryman, Professor Chantepie de la Saussaye, of this city, which at once takes the foremost place in this field (second edition, 1897), includes in the Semitic group the Babylonians and Assyrians, Syrians, Phœnicians, Israelites, and then leaps suddenly to Islam. Where is Christianity? Apparently it has no place at all in the history of religion. It was born in a vacuum; it grew up in the sanctuary. It was the merit of Ewald half a century ago to insist that Christianity must be treated in relation to the people of Israel, so that whatever theological account might be given of its founder, its historical continuity with the older faith should not be broken. Only thus can the true principles of enquiry and judgment be maintained.

* A Paper read at the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Amsterdam, on Wednesday morning, September 5.

The Bibles of Antiquity.

Now, among the various products of the past, the Bibles of antiquity have been brought to light. I pass by the dim collections such as those traceable in the history of Greece and Rome which failed to secure canonical recognition. Among religions still living we are confronted with the claims raised on behalf of the Hindu Veda as inerrant and eternal; of the Buddhist Dhamma to be the veracious record of the words of an omniscient Teacher; of the sacred law within the Zend Avesta to be the utterance of Vohu Mano, the "Good Mind" of Ahura Mazda, "Lord All-wise"; of the Quran to be the very word of Allah revealed to his prophet, the earthly reproduction of a heavenly book. These faiths are all analogous to that which gathered round the Christian Bible, and led a well-known Oxford theologian as late as 1861 to declare the Bible "none other than the word of God, not some part of it more, some part of it less, but all alike the utterance of Him who sitteth upon the throne, faultless, unerring, supreme." The collapse of this doctrine under the methods of historical criticism has, from another point of view, brought Christianity into line with the great faiths which divide with it the allegiance of hundreds of millions of our fellow-men. In so far as it reposes on the authority of a Scripture, its credentials must be examined with the same fearless patience which has been so faithfully bestowed upon the other deposits of the past. The result has been to reduce their claims to supernatural origin to a common level, and to declare that their permanent value must be sought in the measure to which they can be verified by our experience. "Whatever finds me," said Coleridge, "bears witness that it has proceeded from a Holy Spirit." Harmony with our best thought and feeling must in the long run determine their acceptance.

II.

TYPES OF INDIAN FAITH.

Searching Appeal of Hindu Thought.

No student can thread his way, however imperfectly, amid the vast and shadowy structures of Hindu thought, without discovering much that "finds" him. At the outset he is confronted with the subtle doctrine of Karma, or "the deed." It may be expressed most briefly in the words of the Apostle Paul: "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." It presents the universe as pervaded by a self-acting energy, which ensures that each one amid its mighty hierarchy of beings, from the topmost heaven to the lowest hell, shall always and everywhere get precisely what he deserves. The entire scene of our existence is compassed by one unerring law of Right; and absolute justice rules the mighty tissue of events which knits together the life of the meanest insect through a summer day and the unwearied courses of the stars. The operation of this justice nothing can alter, modify, or impair. Theories of satisfaction or atonement do not flourish upon Indian soil. The law of Karma abides unchanged, while worlds arise and perish; and after the great dissolutions which periodically recur, it summons new heavens and a new earth into being, to work out the unexhausted potencies of merit or of guilt. Here is a conception of tremendous power. Under its sway uncounted millions have reposed for a hundred generations with unquestioning trust. They have accepted with patience the anguish of famine or disease or death. Each stroke of pain chastised some secret sin. No problem of evil laid its dark burden on the imagination. Grant but the doctrine of the Deed, and the whole mass of suffering, human and even animal, is at once justified; all suspicion of arbitrariness or accident is barred; and the shadows of cruelty, caprice, or impotence, pass from the brightness of the shining day.

Its Radical Defects.

It is a superb and satisfying explanation of one aspect of life. It has produced resignation, but it has stiffled joy. It may be capable of reconciliation with modern science, though that has yet to be proved; but it can inspire no worship, and it can beget no love. It has lain at the back of one philosophy after another; it has harmonised itself with atheism as with theism. But Indian thought in the manifold forms of Hindu pantheism has lacked real missionary force. Its religion, on the institutional side, has never escaped out of the bonds of custom and caste, and priesthood by race is not favourable to an apostolate which might break down the bonds of immemorial tradition. And its higher theism has never allied itself with social or national life. India has never been anything but a geographical expression. No seer ever ascribed to it a personality which could claim its place among the peoples as the first-born, or (more exalted still) the bride, of any of its unifying figures, such as Prajāpati or Brahmā. Nor did any thinker ever analyse the grounds of its life in family or state. The clash of interest and the variety of achievement never suggested to prophetic vision the idea of progress, or lifted within sight of its loftier minds the conception of a world-purpose in which the evil should be worked out and disappear, while humanity (or even a portion of it) should march forward to a goal of good. Profound as are the glimpses opened by the great teachers of the Vedânta into a life of God withdrawn in inaccessible bliss behind the world-illusion which we see, these high conceptions possess no social force. God is not to be found in the realm of our experience. So far is this from really revealing him, it is the great barrier to our advance towards true knowledge. He has no interest in the phases of our strife; He does not sustain the tried, or comfort the sorrowing. Only as we get away from the conflicts and battles of our daily trial, as we withdraw from each other to sink into the deeps of being, do we come nearer to the hidden Unity, and comprehend that we too are one with the Universal Self, and our souls are encompassed with the Soul of souls. This is the secret of contemplation. It is the support of the mystic, it feeds the passion of the devotee. It has nurtured ardours of piety; it has even begotten innumerable movements of reform; but they have passed like waves upon the sea, and the immense stability of the priestly order has remained unmoved. Hinduism still lives, with a marvellous and self-renewing life. It has, however, no dreams of conquest; it is heedless of the lands beyond its ken. It is wholly destitute of intellectual curiosity. It has no conception of the unity of the race. It can never aspire to bind the nations into one polity of faith, or rule the world with an imperial sovereignty of thought.

Gotama the Buddha.

None of the sages or the saints of Hinduism, and they have been many, has ever become a permanent and general centre of religious trust. It was otherwise, however, with Gotama the Buddha. He appears in history as the opener of a path of life. He initiates a discipline which we may describe in modern terms as a system of ethical culture, and he seeks by it to deliver men from a scene of suffering, caused by lack of knowledge and consequent guilt. He is the great preacher of perfect holiness as the way of escape from an existence that lies under the doom of decay and death. This is a universal human object. It knows no limitations of caste or race; it can be proclaimed in every language and announced in every land. The immense passion of pity and love which filled the teacher's soul is communicated by him to the Order which he establishes. It is supported by his personal example, which is extended by the theory of the Buddhahood through a long series of antecedent lives all solemnly devoted to this end—the preparation by unwearied efforts of self-denial, patience, forbearance, charity, for the hour when he should be ready to lift off from the world the veils of ignorance and sin. Two elements are here combined with remarkable power. There is the actual initiative communicated by the founder, with a well-established historic tradition of a long life of devoted activity, preceded by a succession of ideal biographies all bearing to one end. And there is the immense scope of an aim which was regarded as comprising more than man. Tier after tier of heavenly powers rises above the earth, subject to the same ultimate law of dissolution; and these, too, need the Teaching to wean them from their pride of life, and impart the insight into the higher truth. The splendid sweep of this conception knit all the realms of being into one fellowship, and set before the Buddhist missionary a summons and a purpose of which his master had given him the supreme and abiding type. When the great missions were first organised under Asoka (about 250 B.C.), the Emperor's own son Mahinda went to Ceylon; and the Singhalese chronicler, reciting the wide dispersion, adds, "As the All-merciful Conqueror renounced his own blessedness, so these renounced the happiness they had won, and in this place and that toiled for the world's welfare: for when the world's welfare is concerned, who would be slothful or indifferent?"

The Eternal Buddha.

It would be interesting to show, did time permit, how this idea reacted in turn upon the conception of the Founder. In taking over from Brahmanism the doctrine of the Deed, the law of Karma, Gotama also adopted much of the cosmology through which it was expressed. The world had its periods of growth and decline, its cosmic ages and their inhabitants, its recurring appearances of earlier Buddhas. Were these all isolated and detached? Had they all passed away and ceased to be? Did no connection bind them into one order? Did nothing more unite them than a common purpose for the good of men? Gotama had begun by rejecting all ontological conceptions. He would say nothing of the infinite and absolute. He explained consciousness scientifically without the assumption of a soul, and the universe without the hypothesis of a God. But metaphysic always has a way of revenging itself for its exclusion. Some centuries after the founder's death, there arose a school which began to interpret the Buddha's person in terms of an everlasting substance. He was regarded as the svayambhū, the Self-Existent, the Eternal. The series of previous Buddhas were readily explained as his manifestations. Again and again did he enter the world, taking on him the semblance of humanity, to be the healer of men's sicknesses, their deliverer from their sins. The historic Buddha, once the sole figure in the disciple's faith, was no object of worship, no centre of communion. But the everlasting Buddha watches over all creatures in all spheres. He is the support of men's frailty, the enlightener of their blindness, the compassionate ruler, Father of the world, and to him arise the vow and prayer, temples are founded, and litanies are sung. This was the type of Buddhism which drew the long procession of pilgrims from the Flowery Land through incredible dangers, across the snows of the Himâlaya, or by hardly less perilous routes over the eastern seas. To realise this they toiled with life-long devotion in the great schools of India. They pored over Sanskrit texts, and created the gigantic canons of China and Tibet. But the missionary impulses of Buddhism have long since died away. Early tradition represented the Master as seeing clearly that a period of inertness and decline would inevitably follow the energy and devotion of the first days. The Buddhism of China which has so profoundly transmuted the ancient popular religion based on the Confucian texts has had its eras of reform, its protests against unspiritual worship, its efforts of rationalism and simplicity, its attempts to realise a philosophic mysticism. It is stricken now with the colossal decrepitude which makes the tragedy of the great empire where it once was mighty. A little band of the faithful has recently sought at Calcutta to revive the ancient zeal. It is too late. Other forces have entered the field. Buddhism and Western culture cannot be maintained together. The Western scholar will study Buddhism for its profound intellectual and moral interest. He will investigate its origins and its transformations; he will examine its legends; he will admire much of its ethical teaching; he will follow its efforts after social and political reform in the person of Asoka, or its splendid enterprises of apostolic toil. But he will perceive that its view of life cannot be combined with modern knowledge; and he will be convinced that the future of religion (if he admits that it has a future) must be sought elsewhere.

III.

CHRISTIAN INSPIRATION.

Its Progressive Force.

These brief comparisons (which there is no need to continue into Islam) must suffice to help us to fix the place of Christianity. At the outset a word must be said about its connection with general history. No other religion has had a similar career. No other religion has passed through so many phases, or embodied itself in such varied products. It is born in Palestine. Its roots lie deep in the history of a small Semitic people; the scene of its nativity is wholly remote from the aids of culture, wealth, and power. But it is very early carried forth into the world of Hellenic ideas and Roman law. It becomes heir to an empire. It establishes itself on the civilisation of a vast secular order; and, when that decays, it receives new vigour through alliance with the Teutonic peoples. Architecture and art became its handmaids. Poety and music exalt it. It awakens new ideals, and shows an extraordinary capacity for developing saints. It is quickened afresh by contact with the Greek mind, as Aristotle is brought within the precincts of the Church. It is planted beyond the sea by the great missions, and gradually extends its arms all round the globe. The corruption of its hierarchy is arrested by the shock of the Reformation; a new outlook is gained over fresh fields of thought; new types of life can still arise; eras of languor follow, but it revives once more in the nineteenth century with unexpected might, flies over continents, and wins homage in every zone from pole to pole. The noblest European literatures are permeated with it; philosophies delight to bring themselves into accord with its teachings; it endeavours to assimilate the last great product of the human spirit—modern science; and it is preparing itself to conquer new fields, and claim that its ethical ideals shall sway and regulate the relations of men as they have never done before. The alliance of Christianity with so many phases of social affairs, its union with so many forms of intellectual and moral energy, its power to create or vivify huge organisations of worship, discipline, philanthropy, its influence over the most progressive nations who have given their best endeavours to sustain it at home and diffuse it abroad,—combine to raise it, considered solely as a historical phenomenon, to the highest eminence among the world's religions.

Life and Teaching of Jesus.

And to what, may we ask, is all this due? Historically, the greater part of the triumphs of Christendom have been won under the shelter of the Church. The Catholic Church, whether Greek, Roman, or (as many English theologians would insist on adding) Anglican, is the depositary of Christian truth, the vehicle of Christian grace, the nourisher and sustainer of the Christian life. When the claims of the Church were disputed, the Bible was offered in its place. But we now know that our Bible constitutes but one division in the Greater Bible of the human race, and the claim raised on its behalf to sole authority as an infallible organ of revelation has been finally disproved. When Christianity is studied by the historical method, what do we find? Apart from the living force of the personal appeal made by apostles and saints, martyrs and missionaries, apart from the superb conviction and impassioned energy of Paul, we see the life and teaching of Jesus presented through the medium of ideas which have ceased to belong to our present thought. Yet it was to these ideas—so far as they can be separated from the individual influences just named—that Christianity owed its first successes. They are grouped in the New Testament around three foci.

The End of the Age.

In the first place, the complex elements of the Messianic expectation are centred in the conception of Jesus as the destined judge of all the world, to return from heaven in clouds of glory, and usher in the awful day of the wrath of God. It was the overpowering force of this expectation which carried Paul in breathless haste along the Mediterranean from city to city, and made his voice ring out to his friends at Philippi across the waters from his Roman prison, "the Lord is at hand." And it was the immense scale of the impending catastrophe which evoked the bewildering questions about the place of the Gentiles in the providential order with which the Apostle wrestles, and the no less bewildering arguments by which he solves them. The result of delay was the growth of a Church with the authority of the keys. The attempt made in the Fourth Gospel to transform the conception of the Messianic salvation into a mode of inward life did not dislodge the earlier type from Christian imagination. The Second Advent was indefinitely postponed, and became an article of faith embodied in a creed. That creed was the creation of the Church, it was enforced by its authority, it rested on its guarantee, and the Church was based on the original conception of Jesus as Messiah.

The Person of Messiah.

In the second place, there arose new interpretations of the person of Jesus, as the Messianic Son of God was brought into relation on the one hand with the Jewish world of heavenly powers, and on the other hand with Greek conceptions of God, the universe, and man. The seven heavens rising above the sky, filled with mysterious hosts both good and evil, have all vanished. The speculations concerning the Man from heaven occupy us no more. Doctrines of pre-existence, the ideal types which, in the Secrets of Enoch, lean in one direction towards the Persian fravashis, and in the other to the Platonic ideas, do not now hold our thought. The notion that creation itself was somehow involved in the fall, and yearned for escape from corruption and decay, cannot be harmonised with our present science. Nor does the Greek presentation of the Word prove more congenial, save when it is stripped of the elements which gave it specific power, and generalised into universal application. The different forms of Kenotic Christology in which modern theologians take refuge, are sufficient proof that whatever may be their reconciliation with the creeds, the records of the humanity of Jesus in the earlier Gospels can no longer be ignored.

The Idea of Sacrifice.

And, thirdly, the official religion of both Jew and Gentile was based on sacrifice. This was the supreme function of all ritual, the centre of every cult. Ideas of mediation, ransom, propitiation, quickly gather round Messiah's death. They have ceased to be vital for us now; they no longer constitute the framework of our faith, as they did for the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. We have, indeed, to beware that in discarding them we do not part with something which has still a value for us. I may not pause now to ask what new lights are thrown on ancient faith by the gradual transformation of the narrower individualism into the more social aspects of our common life. But it is at least clear that the roots of New Testament doctrine lie in modes of access to the Deity through altar and priesthood, which the religion of Jesus has done away for ever.

IV.

ABIDING TRUTHS.

The Man Remains.

What, then, remains when all these elements are withdrawn. The answer is simple, yet to many sufficient, there remains Jesus himself. It was the fashion of a generation or two ago to describe Christianity as the "absolute religion," whether on the field of the Hegelian dialectic, or (with Theodore Parker, for example) on the foundation of the ancient commandments interpreted in their universal sense as love to God and love to man. For us, assuredly, it is impossible to conceive a simpler, deeper, or more all-embracing truth. It is undoubtedly the case that Jesus took his stand upon the common religious experience of his people. He did not, like Gotama the Buddha, deny the authority of the Scriptures, reject the rites of the cultus, repudiate the functions of the hierarchy, or dissolve away the fundamental conceptions of the Soul and God. Nor was he called like Mohammed to engage in a polemic against idolatry, which he might justify by proving himself the inspired messenger of the only God. He appeals everywhere to familiar ideas; he coins no new terms; he shows no consciousness that he is founding a new religion. In his outlook on life, the directness and immediacy of his approach to God, he follows, but at a loftier moral height, the later Psalmists, who had helped to plant in the heart of their people the truths attained by the succession of the prophets. That is what determines his attitude to the Law in which the Jew found his special privilege. Israel might be politically subject, but it was providentially elect; and the mark of the divine choice was found in the covenant at Sinai. We know from the history of the early Church what efforts were required to break down this limitation. Jesus appears to have transcended it at once through the spontaneousness of his own religious life, his confidence in God, his trust in human nature. To the Father in heaven the access is direct for all; and the religious aim of Jesus, stated in modern language, seems to be to place all men in that relation of sonship in which he stands himself.

No "Absolute" Teacher.

It is, however, claimed for Jesus that he is not one master among many, but the Master *; his religion is "the religion," or, as we might say, religion itself, final and complete. If this plea be preferred as a reason for neglecting the study of other great manifestations of the religious consciousness, because India or China can teach us nothing, it is plainly inconsistent with the point of view from which I have spoken. If it means that we are to turn our backs on Plato and ignore Wordsworth, it must be again disowned. If it implicitly affirms that no seer to come may rise to still greater heights of insight or character, once more it must be rejected, for we cannot employ the achievements of the past to limit the possibilities of the future. But there is a sense in which the disciple finds the Master sufficient for him. We sometimes hear the well-intentioned exhortation from those who are weary of party strife and sectarian divisions that we should return to the Christianity of Christ. It is a pious aim, but it can never be attained. I do not mean that we can never put ourselves back into the contracted world on which Jesus gazed, that we can never again content ourselves with his intellectual position. That is the inevitable result of the expanding process of knowledge, but it does not touch the secret of the matter. The fact is that the "Christianity of Christ" never existed. Jesus, verily, had a religion. But the religion of Jesus is not identical with the Christianity of Christ. For the religion of Jesus broke on his soul with open vision of the Father. It rested on no historic tradition, though it had grown up beneath one. It did not depend on the realised experience of predecessors, however it might be linked in his practice or his speech with the forms and institutions of his countrymen. But the "Christianity of Christ" is known to us primarily only through Jesus. We receive it first as religion personally exemplified in him. It may be through the influences of the home, or the teaching of the church, or the study of the Gospels; but into the sanctuary where Jesus stood we come first of all with him.

* Harnack, Die Aufgabe der Theologischen Facultäten und die Allgemeine Religionsgeschichte, 1901, p. 16.

With Jesus to the Father.

There, indeed, he leaves us as we pass within, or he kneels by our side, and says "Our Father." We can only learn through higher holier souls. They are all around us, they help us on our daily way. It is the universal service of the pure and ardent to communicate their vision and inspire their trust. The Christian feels that Jesus is the most enduring help of all. But who helped him? Jesus could not be his own Christ. That personal element of reliance in times of weakness or sorrow on the strong support of some brother soul, did he find it in the ancient records of his race, when he said, "It is written," or cried in broken words upon the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" The disciple who has tried to live by the Master's teaching, and feels himself borne up in his struggles by the invisible presences of those who have trodden the same path before him, will never lose his gratitude or love. But he will not feel it necessary to protect his Teacher's dignity by claims which neither history nor philosophy appears to him to justify; he will be content that in the empire of souls there should be many leaders; he will not complain of others because they follow not with him, he will rejoice in the larger view of Jesus, "He that is not against us is for us."

The Religion of Jesus.

Christianity, then, understood as the religion of Jesus, or the nearest approach that we can make to it, is a type of spiritual life which communicates itself to his followers, and is reproduced more or less fully in them. It has many aspects, of which it is possible, in fine, to name but two. It is intensely ethical, and it is profoundly social. The Christian Church expresses its theology in three creeds. You cannot conceive Jesus himself composing them. It is sufficient to point to the contrast between the Quicunque Vult and the Sermon on the Mount.

But it will be urged that there is much in the ethical teaching of the Gospels which no longer serves us as a guide to life. It is quite true; the social sciences were unknown in Judea; charity organisation is a modern invention. To "give to him that asketh thee," at least when the request is made in the street, is no longer to fulfil a divine precept, it is to commit a recognised offence against the common weal. But no one can study the records of the early Christian communities, and fail to note the impassioned character of their ethical life, and this must be carried back to the original impulse of Jesus. Behind the current maxims of his day, behind the great expectation of the end of the age which shaped so much of his teaching, lies the conception of man as the child of God, bound to aspire after positive likeness to him, or in Gospel language, called to "be perfect as the Father which is in heaven is perfect." Here is a principle of everlasting application which sent forth Jesus at once to seek the wanderer and the lost. So far-reaching is it that we have hardly begun to work out its immense contents. We have made some progress recently in the treatment of the physically infirm, and are perpetually endeavouring to overrule nature's methods of elimination by securing full opportunity for every recuperative energy. We have yet to take even the elementary steps for the education of the morally infirm, for our methods of punishment are still in the cruder stages of retribution (to say nothing of the hideous vindictiveness of war) rather than of restoration. Still, the ethical element of Christianity is steadily winning clearer and clearer recognition. We are, indeed, deplorably ignorant of the best modes of giving it effect, for we are only stumbling and groping after new ideals of social order. But we can see that it points to large transformations and reconstructions as the principle of mutual service, instead of privilege or power, becomes the higher law of life for the children of the kingdom.

The Kingdom that shall Come.

The kingdom of God is still, indeed, as of old, only a hope. Yet it is a hope to which the immense extensions of the influence of the most progressive races in the last century have given new force and meaning. What Christian, however, does not often ask himself whether any single religion now existing can ever gather all nations into one communion of worship and trust. In face of the deep-seated varieties of race, culture, civilisation, will even any synthesis of religions ever be possible, and if, so, what will be the place of Christianity among them? Dim are the outlines of the future, and I have no prophet's vision. But I believe that the fundamental conceptions of Christianity will gradually be disengaged more clearly from their envelopments of outworn tradition. They will win more power in our social life, they will help more and more definitely—though by no means necessarily under the shelter or sanction of a single name—to shape the relations of peoples, and guide the destinies of nations. It is the goal of commerce to organise all the resources of the earth for the supply of the wants of mankind; it is the goal of science to diffuse one system of knowledge; it is the goal of politics to combine all countries in one harmony of justice, peace, and progress. Similarly it is the goal of religion to inspire one faith. But we may expect that this will rather be attained by the slow approximation of ethical and spiritual aims, than by the direct extension of any single creed. The movement which has carried Christianity around the globe, which has brought philosophy, art, poetry, culture of every kind, into some sort of connection with it, if not into formal alliance, will gather strength as the ideas of Jesus are more clearly understood. But similar movements will by degrees affect the other higher religions. They will in their turn be touched with the modern spirit; and what cannot bear the new quickening will droop and die. When the great doctrine of the Fatherhood of God is applied to the nations, it immediately suggests the presence of a purpose in the long sequences of history, working out that high end to which we give the name of the education of the race. To this mighty process we must conceive the religions of the world as all in turn contributing with varied potencies. Foremost among them, at least, in this stage of our development, is the Christianity we love. It summons us to be fellow-workers with God. In this high partnership let us go forwards. The realm of ideas is for ever open to us. There we, too, can take our part in the spiritual making of the world; there we may humbly share in the Creator's gladness, and in "the joy of the Lord" find our weakness transfigured into strength.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL.

WE concluded, last week, our record of the Amsterdam meetings; but it ran to unconscionable length, and Fate, with remorseless shears, was obliged to cut off its tail. Here it is:—

Saturday, September 5.

This was the day of departure from Amsterdam for most members of the Council, though some still lingered awhile in the city. To Leiden, to Utrecht, to Zandvoort on the coast, or northward into Friesland many went; others straight home to their own country. From Rotterdam, Dr. Eliot and the Wendtes, with others of the American contingent, sailed for Boston. This record is completed at Leiden, where, in the University, the President, Dr. Oort, Dr. Eerdmans, Dr. Groenewegen, and other members of the Council have their home. To them and to all other of our friends in this country, where we have spent such delightful days, one more final word of grateful thanks!

WHEN subordinates, or young people, are too long deprived of opportunity for judging and acting for themselves, their minds are apt to become passive and purely receptive; they become slow to start a notion or suggest an expedient; ideas of theirs, they fancy, are not wanted, and so they soon cease to have ideas at all.—Henry Latham.

THE CONCEPTION OF GOD AS "THE SOUL OF ALL SOULS."*

BY THE REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

[See "Hibbert Journal," April, 1903, p. 458.]

IN the present short essay I deal with the most transcendent problem that can engage the human mind. But I do so not with any intention to offer a solution of that problem, nor even with the idea of presenting any new materials towards the solution. My one and only purpose is to plead for accuracy of language in the treatment of the question, and to show how easily a form of words may seem to offer a solution when in reality it only covers over and disguises the incompatibilities between mutually exclusive conceptions.

I have in this essay no complaint to make against the Pantheist, and no complaint to make against the Theist, however distinctly I myself may count myself the one or the other. But I have a strong complaint to make against the man who thinks that by a skilful phrase he can exhibit a middle term between Pantheism and Theism, or that he can cunningly coin language which shall cover the essence of both these doctrines.

What is Communion?

My object being thus defined and limited, I ask you to consider with me one element of the difference between the Pantheist and the Theist.

We shall be agreed that the supreme manifestation of religion is the communion of the human soul with God. Herein the ecstasy of the prophet, the rapture of the saint, yes, and the still experience of the ordinary man of pure and faithful heart, reaches its supreme term. The fact, the phenomenon, is a fact or phenomenon which cannot be ignored or denied save by doing violence to all spiritual history. But when we ask what this experience, this phenomenon actually is, we are met by two absolutely divergent interpretations—the interpretation which leans to Theism and the interpretation which leans to Pantheism. When Paul is caught up into the third heave nand hears the unspeakable things of God, when the Puritan woman in her chamber, or the Roman Catholic peasant kneeling before the Cross, feels an ineffable peace stealing over the heart, and God or Christ seems to embrace or gently minister, what is it that actually transpires? Theism offers one account; Pantheism confronts it with another.

The Pantheist's Answer.

Pantheism, and systems approaching Pantheism, conceive this supreme religious experience of the human soul to be the realisation of the fact, obscured to our consciousness while we linger on the lower planes of percipiency, that the human soul and the divine soul are not two, but one, that the souls of all the myriads that have seemed to look out through eyes of flesh, are, in fact, no other than elements of the Universal Spirit, like drops in the boundless ocean, so many heart-beats of the One Eternal.

* A paper read at the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Amsterdam, on Wednesday, Sept. 2.

And so, when that which seems to be the separate personality of a human spirit is caught up into this hushed or rapturous communion with the infinite Spirit of God, the Pantheist would say, "See, in the moment of illumination this human soul realises its identity with God, knows itself as one with the all-encompassing Spirit." And to him the transcendent phenomenon of the communion of the soul with God is explained by the conception that the human soul and the divine soul have one centre, though the circumference of God flows at an infinite radius from that centre, and the circumference of the individual man is hemmed in by the limits of human life.

And the Theist's.

But Theism—at any rate the simple and original Theism of Jesus, the blossom and consummation of the ancient Hebrew Theism—looks upon the phenomenon of communion, not as a thrill lying at a centre with two circumferences, but as the dynamic passage of thought and feeling between two persons. For Theism does not conceive the orb of the human personality as within the orb of God, swallowed up in the being of God; but it conceives the orb of the human personality as other than the personality of God, in one sense apart from God, and for that very reason capable of a real communion or fellowship with God. And so the Theist conceives that in those high moments when the human soul is at ts best, the spark of illumination flashes om spirit to spirit, as the electric spark flashes from cloud to cloud.

Mere Formulæ no Help.

Now the pull of the attraction of Pantheistic modes of thought is so strong that religious and philosophical literature is full of efforts to frame phraseology which shall cover the differences between Theism and Pantheism, in regard to this matter of the communion of the soul with God, and merge the two conceptions in a higher unity. In the language of poetry and spiritual emotion phrases thus evolved have their high and noble uses. But for exact thinking, for philosophy, they appear to me to be full of peril. Attempts at a phraseology that shall transcend the distinctions between a Theistic and a Pantheistic conception will be found, I believe, at the last analysis to depend on some verbal ambiguity,—and verbal ambiguity is the very snare and despair of truthful thinking. The purpose of this paper, I repeat, is not to arbitrate between the two conceptions of the Sum of Being which divide between them the most majestic intellects of the human race, but to plead for distinctness of conception and expression, and against the adoption of phraseology which will fit both alternatives being received as solutions or as implications of identity of meaning.

Some Illustrations.

To take an example: In his deeply interesting article on the philosophy of James Martineau in the Hibbert Journal of April last, Professor Pringle-Pattison laments the rigidity of Martineau's theistic system. He dissents from "the sheer separation which he appears to make between the self of the moral being and its Divine source." He puts it that Martineau's great dual argument from cause and from conscience leaves us with a God only inferentially known; and he is dissatisfied that in his great treatises he presents so rigid and uncompromising a front to more pantheistic modes of thought.

Then, however, seizing a clue put into his hand by Professor Upton, he suggests that the famous Sermons supply the antidote to the treatises. And he cites the frequent phrase, "the Soul of souls," "the Soul of all souls," as indicating a way of reconciliation. Here, he thinks, Martineau reveals that his mind, after all, is tinged with the more pantheistic way of feeling. And he sets up the phrase "the Soul of souls" against Martineau's description of God as "another and higher Person."

"The Soul of Souls."

Let us consider, then, this phrase. Is it really a concession to Pantheism? Does it really take up the pantheistic and the theistic modes of thought under a unifying and reconciling formula?

The formula can certainly be used by either school. But does it therefore imply a reconciliation of view?

Is it not after all a mere accident that the same series of syllables covers both methods of conception? "The Soul of souls":—God "the Soul of all souls." It may mean that He is the substratum, the soul-essence, in your soul and mine and all men's—which is an out-and-out capitulation to the pantheist, depriving us of all real separate personality. Or it may mean that He is "the Soul of souls" in the like manner as ancient Israel called Him the Lord of lords and King of kings, certainly not meaning that He was the Lordship in every lord and the Kingship in every king, but merely that He was the great architypal Lord and King, supreme and greatest. And so our phrase would present Him as the supreme and greatest of all Spirits, before whom the individual soul is but as a grain of sand before the mighty mass of the central sun.

The solution of the formula depends simply on the interpretation of the preposition "of" and the reconciliation vanishes in the ambiguity of the controlling word.

"Thou in Me and I in Thee."

The New Testament exhibits the like straining to wrap up in one phraseology theistic and pantheistic ideas. The most striking example is in those exalted passages of the Fourth Gospel in which the Evangelist presents Jesus as striving to express his relation to his Heavenly Father. "Thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee: we are one"—language which, if not pressed into the service of philosophy, but recognised as merely "thrown out," as Matthew Arnold would say, at the spiritual truth, is full of beauty. It has been made a corner-stone of Trinitarian Christianity; yet has it really no vestige of Trinitarian doctrine, but rather is the faltering language of a spirit vibrating between theistic and pantheistic thoughts of God.

"Thou in me" and "I in thee": what does it really mean? Why, the phrases may mean either of two wholly different things. Everything turns on the little preposition "in." "Thou in me": it may mean: "Thou, God, art Thyself the essence of my soul, element of my being," so that the "oneness" is the oneness of identity; in which case it is the language of pantheism. Or it may mean, "Thou in me:—Thou, God, art very near to me, so close, so intimate, that we can commune thou with me and I with Thee, I pouring my heart into Thine, Thou pouring Thy strength into me"; in which case the language is the language of theism. It may mean either. Possibly the great Evangelist himself trembled on the verge of pantheistic thought. The words have the haze of indefiniteness. But there can be no haze in the facts. Either Jesus was God, or he was another person; and such high and rapturous phrases, seeming to bridge the abyss, cannot in fact fill up the gulf between the divergent thoughts.

The Phrase and the Fact.

So far from a skilfully devised phrase being able to solve the opposition between the contrasted modes of thought, at bottom no form of words can state the case. In the phrases cited the prepositions "of" and "in" are drawn from the vocabulary of extension; and the vocabulary of extension being only applicable by metaphor or simile to the facts of spirit, it can at best only suggest, never define, the truth in spiritual things. To say either that God is in us or that God is outside us, to say that either we are in God or that we are outside God, is to use spatial language when we are not dealing with the category of space. Such language we are, indeed, compelled, by the exigencies in which we stand to use, dwellers as we are in a world in which the spirit has no articulate speech of its own, but must employ terms whose primary significance is spatial, and which only by assumed analogy apply to mind and soul.

And, to apply this truth to our case, no conception of spirit or personality can be found which regards one spirit or person as contained in another. Such expression is borrowed from extension. And every such attempted explication of the relation of the human soul to God is fundamentally a false translation of facts of spirit into relations of space or matter.

Nor, indeed, can either words or thought itself strike any via media between the illusoriness of personal consciousness, the thinking of the seeming self as really a manifestation of God, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the absolute otherness of the individual.

Experience Transcends Dogma.

But even if the attempt to explain the spiritual phenomenon which we call "communion with the Holy Spirit" by merging the human person in the divine be doomed to fail, let the religious soul have no misgiving. The facts of religious experience are more certain than any explication of them. If the balance of philosophy should finally dip to theism, and the final human thought should be that the individual human soul is for ever other than the God from whom it sprang, the reality of the sacred fellowship can never be impaired. Pantheistic thought makes great play with the phenomena of mysticism as pointing to an ultimate unity of man and God, and good theists show a tendency to compromise a little for the sake of this advantage. But this all rests on a piece of sheer metaphysical dogma built out of the air, the dogma that there must be a medium, a tertium quid, between spirit and spirit if they are to have fellowship. Whereas it is a wholly unwarranted assumption that the One Eternal Spirit, God, cannot immediately project thought and feeling into spiritual beings on whom He has nevertheless conferred a totally independent personality.

Reality of Divine Communion.

But though these questions of interpretation are to my mind profoundly interesting, though I think that it ought to be a law of our intellectual conscience to try to think clearly and accurately, and to weigh with exactitude the meaning of words, never allowing ourselves to be caught and entangled by mere identity of sound; yet well I know, thank God! that the deep experiences of the soul do not wait to become real till the philosophers have succeeded in explaining them in logical and consistent language. Even while still warring doctrines raged, the Pauls are caught up to the third heaven to hear the unutterable words of God, the humble and simple feel the touch of God upon the heart, the tempted draw draughts of strength from the heavenly wells, the sorrowing, the bereaved, the weeping, have their tears wiped away by the ministering angel of divine compassion who stood by Jesus in the shadows of Gethsemane. Thank God! not only the wise and prudent can know the intense realities of religion. He is Father not alone of the sages and the saints. He cares for the common people, the lowly, the simple, the poor, the sick, the widows, the orphans, for all for whom this life on the nether earth has difficulties, despondencies, deep and crushing sorrows; and there is not one of them all but may know the wonderful healing of His touch upon the soul.

And so religious experience transcends the dogmas of metaphysics, and it is the poet and not the metaphysician that speaks the last and truest word:—

Speak to Him, thou, for He hears, and spirit with spirit can meet—
Closer is He than breathing, nearer than hands and feet.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGION.

(From "Unity," Chicago.)

Andrew Crawford was a successful business man. His name is identified with large undertakings in Chicago. He was a master of transportation, a director of ships and a builder of railroads.

His name was also, in his day, intimately connected with the Unitarian interests of the West. He was trustee and leader in turn of the Unitarian Church at Geneseo, Ill., Church of the Messiah, Unity Church, and the People's Church on the North Side. His last pastor, John H. Acton, has published, for private distribution only, an attractive memorial of this energetic Scotsman, who, on arriving in New York, in the twenty-second year of his age, had to sell his overcoat in order to get a start, and who, at his death, which occurred Nov. 22, 1900, in the sixty-ninth year of his age, left a vast fortune, together with a reputation for integrity, ethical sincerity and interest in things spiritual more enviable than the material millions. The present writer would scarcely venture to make this public notice of a private memorial and thus speak of an old friend and fellow-worker were it not for the purpose of introducing the faith of a business man, which indicates not only the conclusion arrived at, but also the road over which an earnest, active, practical man travelled toward such a conclusion.

As a matter of course, this Scotchman from Ayrshire started out with a rich inheritance of Presbyterianism and the associations that go therewith.

From a letter to a son in an eastern college, written seventeen years before his death, we make the following extract, to which we venture to give the title of a business man's religion:

Don't blame me, my son, if at times I seem to be too anxious about you. When I see the wrecks all around of young men and old men, many of them educated, I cannot but feel great solicitude for you. It is so easy for a young man to be led astray a little at a time; then the law once broken, it is so much easier the next time—the conscience becomes less sensitive, the decision weak. The surest guaranty for a young man is to keep good company. Keep busy about something, remembering that as you sow you must reap, and that sooner or later you must account to God for your sins of omission as well as those of commission.

I have never talked much to you about religion, because when young I was taught things that when I grew older I found were not true; that many of the religious ideas were simply theories which nobody knows to be true. I have therefore considered it best to wait until you grew old enough to think for yourself. My own religion has been, at least I have tried to have it so:

(1.) A belief in an overruling Power which I call God. That he is full of power, wisdom, and goodness. I see from his works that we are here governed by laws to the violation of which is attached a penalty. For instance, if we lie there is a penalty attached regardless of character, which in a pecuniary point of view is serious. The loss of self-respect is followed by a weakness to do almost any mean thing. My experience is that a liar will in time become a thief when necessary. This will apply to the violation of all the written and unwritten commandments.

(2.) That for what we do, either good or bad, we shall be rewarded and punished here and continuing to some extent after death.

(3.) That to be ready to die is to live right; be in all things honest and let your word among men never be questioned.

(4.) As to the office of Christ, I look to him as showing the possibilities of man and the results of right living and being in harmony with God.

(5) I look upon prayer as a means whereby we may come nearer and nearer to harmony with God. For instance, if you should find yourself in trouble, or in darkness as to what to do, then go to your closet and there before God ask him to help you to see how to help yourself. I believe that out of that effort put forth there will come strength and light. I have no faith in God giving one material things; but in some way—we cannot tell how—he clears one's vision and often comforts those in sorrow and trouble.

(6) Lastly, in connection with my religious views it is proper I should refer to the effect, and the remedy thereof, when sin is committed by violating the law. No man is perfect. Now, when a person has violated the law, my idea is that, so far as he can, he should make restitution. As the first step confess to those he has injured and to God, and then turn his face the other way, with great sorrow that he did sin, and a determination to sin no more, asking God's help.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Accrington.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday week, the preacher being the Rev. J. Mason Bass, M.A., of Chesham. In the afternoon a "Service of Song," entitled "Two Golden Lilies," was rendered by the choir, with connective readings by Mr. Bass. There were many strangers present afternoon and evening.

Attercliffe (Unitarian Mission).—The holiday season being practically over, the members and supporters of this mission are now rallying in good force, and the Sunday evening meetings are again showing signs of vigorous life. On Saturday, August 29, a ramble took place at which twenty-five were present. As this mission is an offshoot of the historic Upper Chapel of Sheffield, it is hoped that with the advent of the Rev. C. J. Street to the pastorate of Upper Chapel a great impetus may be given to this already promising mission.

Cardiff (Appointment).—The Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., of Leicester, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the congregation to the ministry of the West Grove Church, and expects to be able to commence his duties on the first Sunday in December. During September the services are being conducted by Professor Weatherall, of Carmarthen.

Choppington.—The annual flower and thanksgiving service was held on Sunday, the church being tastefully decorated with flowers, fruit, corn, and vegetables. The children of the Sunday-school took part in both services, singing special hymns and reciting appropriate pieces for the occasion. Addresses were given by Mr. W. Glover, afternoon and evening, to large audiences. Prizes were awarded to the children for bouquets of wild and cultivated flowers.

Colne.—The annual harvest festival was held on Sunday week, the preacher afternoon and evening being the Rev. Matthew R. Scott, of Ainsworth, whose eloquent discourses were highly appreciated. In the morning a scholars' service was held, when Mr. J. W. Hird, superintendent, gave an address.

East London Unitarian Sunday-School Union.—The annual excursion of this Union took place on Saturday, when teachers and friends journeyed to Chingford, and spent a pleasant time in Epping Forest. On Sunday the annual aggregate service was held at College Chapel, Stepney Green, when an address was given by Mrs. C. A. Ginever, Miss A. C. Read officiating at the organ.

Guildford (Appointment).—The Rev. E. Rattenbury Hodges, of Newark, has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of the Ward-street Church, in succession to the Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland.

Lewisham.—Arrangements for the coming winter's work have all been made, the great event of the autumn being the coming of Mr. Carpenter with lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience." There is to be a hazaar in aid of the building fund in the last week of November, a fact of which friends at a distance are invited to make a note.

Macclesfield.—Under the will of the late Mr. Peter Pownall Brocklehurst, of Hurdsfield House, who died at Colwyn Bay on June 2, the trustees of King Edward-street Chapel receive £5,000, to be applied in augmentation of the minister's stipend.

Sheffield (Yorkshire Lay Preachers' Union).—On Saturday week a very enjoyable meeting of lay-workers was held at Sheffield, resulting in a unanimous resolution to form a centre in Sheffield to facilitate the working of the Yorkshire Union. Mr. Thurston G. Turton was elected secretary pro tem.

Stockton-on-Tees. — On Saturday, September 5, the teachers, scholars, and friends were entertained by Mr. and Mrs. G. R. Wright, at their farm at Eaglescliffe, to tea and games. On the 12th the choir had their annual pic-nic at Barnard Castle and Bowes.

The best Box Iron. No Gas, no Fire, no Smell. Hot in a few minutes, and remains hot. Double the work done in half the time.
Price of the "DALLI," 6/-.
Price of the "DALLI" FUEL, 1/9 per Box of 128 Blocks.
Ask your Ironmonger to show you the "DALLI."
Beware of worthless imitations.

Terms for Advertisements.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex-street Strand, London, W.C., and should reach th, office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY to appear the same week. The scale of charges is as follows:—

	£	s.	d.
PER COLUMN	2	0	0
INCH IN COLUMN	0	3	6

Special Terms for a Series.

Appeals 6d. per line; repeated matter, 3d. per line.

Calendar Notices, 10s. per year, for two lines; extra lines, 4d. each.

Births, Marriages, Deaths, 6d. per line. Minimum charge 1/6

Situations Vacant and Wanted,

Twenty words, 1s. Every six words after, 4d. Three insertions charged as two.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. The requisite remittance should accompany all orders and Advertisements.

BIRTH.

WADE.—On Sept. 12th, at Bracondale, Broadlands-road, Highgate, the wife of Harold Wade, of a daughter.

MARRIAGE.

RUSSELL—OLDHAM.—On Sept. 15th, at Platt Chapel, Rusholme, by the Rev. C. T. Poynting, B.A., and the Rev. E. T. Russell, of Glasgow, father of the bridegroom, Edward John Russell, D.Sc. Lond., of the Agricultural College, Wye, Kent, to Elnor, younger daughter of Walter and Elnor Oldham, of 60, Clarendon-road, Whalley Range, Manchester.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, September 20.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton, Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M., Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY, "Religious Life in the 17th Century."
Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.
Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. A. THOMPSON.
Brixton Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M and 7 P.M., Rev. F. W. STANLEY.
Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. J. JUPP.
Deptford, Church-street, 11.15 A.M. and 6.30, Rev. A. J. MARCHANT,
Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M., Rev. GORDON COOPER, B.A.
Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.
Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. R. H. U. BLOOR.
Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. GOW, B.A.
Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. R. H. GREAVES.
Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.
Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.
Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.
Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.
Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7.0 P.M., Rev. H. S. PERRIS, M.A.
Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Rev. JOHN ELLIS.
Peckham, Avondale-rad, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. G. CARTER.
Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.
Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M., Rev. S. FARRINGTON.
Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.
Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.
Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M., Mr. A. PHARAOH, and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. H. ROSE.
Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, East-hill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.
Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Dr. MUMMERY.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. McDOWELL.
BEDFORD, Library (side room). Vacation.
BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.
BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Church, The Hall, Lytham-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS.
BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. C. C. COE.
BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.
BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET.
CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., Rev. J. REMINGTON WILSON, M.A.
DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.
GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.
HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. GARDNER PRESTON.
HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. J. MARTEN.
LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.
LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. ERNEST PARRY.
LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 A.M., Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. W. HAWKES.
LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. R. A ARMSTRONG, B.A.
LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON.
OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. W. E. ADDIS, M.A.
PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.
PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 P.M., Mr. THOMAS BOND.
SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. B. C. CONSTABLE.
SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.
SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.
SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.
STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church Tyler-street, 7 P.M., Rev ARTHUR RYLAND.
TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.
TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.
WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M., Mr. J. W. DAVIES.

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH.
SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS

SOUTH-PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.—Sept. 20, at 11.15 A.M., JOHN M. ROBERTSON, "Babylon and the Bible."

ETHICAL RELIGION SOCIETY, STEINWAY HALL, PORTMAN SQ., W.—Sept. 20, at 11.15 A.M., Dr. WASHINGTON SULLIVAN, "Julian: The Apostate."

PULPIT SUPPLY.—Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY, 28, Downshire-hill, Hampstead, N.W.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. A. JOINSON, Pier-street.

Schools, etc.

VACANCY for one Boarder, not under 12, in September. A high percentage with Public Examinations has been gained. In July eight pupils passed R.A.M. and R.C. Associated Boards (Local Schools), one aged 14 gaining distinction in Higher Division. Music or Art can be made a specialty. Excellent references.—PRINCIPALS, Bestreben High School for Girls, Brondesbury, N.W.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN,
NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON
(Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

Board and Residence.

BOURNEMOUTH. — ARNEWOOD. En Pension. Grand position in West Cliff-road; sea views; South aspect; close to Winter Gardens, Promenade, and Pier.—Apply, MANAGERESS.

BOURNEMOUTH.— Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table. Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

EASTBOURNE.—Comfortable private BOARDING HOUSE, close to sea and Devonshire Park. Terms moderate.—Mrs. FRANK HARRIS, Falconhurst, Jevington-gardens.

SIDMOUTH. — Wanted in private family, one or two Boarders (permanent or otherwise).—Address, H., Office of INQUIRER, Essex-street, Strand.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged. — Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH.— An ideal HOLIDAY RESORT for Young Ladies or School Girls. Charming Devonshire village. Perfect sanitation. Sea and moorland. Bracing. Favourite summer or winter residence. Through trains from London and the North. 35s. to 42s. weekly. Prospectus from THE PROPRIETOR.

BOURNEMOUTH—Educational home offered to Young Ladies and Children needing warm climate during winter. Special advantages for languages and music. Good references. 4 guineas monthly —Miss BEYERHAUS, Pine Tree Glen.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

SIT ACCOUNTS

2½% repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES

Purchased and sold for customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS

By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

DAILY MEDITATIONS

(Fourth Edition Revised.)

NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.

Cloth, red edges, 6d.; roan gilt, 1s.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C

THE SPARK IN THE CLOD.

Evolution as Related to Religion.

By J. T. SUNDERLAND, M.A.,
Author of "The Bible: Its Origin and Growth," &c.

162 pp., price 4s. net; postage 3d.

A study of the larger and more worthy conception of religion that is coming to the world as the result of Evolution. Chapters on "The Evolution of the World," "The Evolution of Man," "The Evolution of Religion," "Pain and Evil in the Light of Evolution," "Immortality in the Light of Evolution," "The Bible, Jesus, and Christianity in the Light of Evolution."

"A remarkable and inspiring book."—Toronto SATURDAY NIGHT.

"A work of profound scholarship; an important addition to religious literature."—Boston JOURNAL.

For sale by PHILIP GREEN, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

36 pp. 8vo, price Sixpence.

THE FREEHOLD FARM. THE GARNER'D SEED-CORN OF ALL INTUITIONED THOUGHT.

LOOKING INWARDS TO THE INTUITION.

By F. LINFORD WILSON.

Published by H. SEERIGHT, and obtainable of REEVES, 83, Charing Cross-road, W.C.

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

"THE MILL HILL PULPIT."

VOL. XI., No. 12.—"THE NEW POPE."

A Sermon by

Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A. (Leeds).

Price 1d.—A new Volume commences with the October number. One copy of each monthly issue posted to any address for 1s. 6d. per annum. A complete catalogue of the last 11 years printed numbers sent free.—CHAS. STAINER, 82, Ravenswood-terrace, Hyde Park, Leeds.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17, Mincing-lane, E.C.
Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.
F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.
Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.
STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

Situations, etc.

AS ORGANIST.—A Minister's Daughter, having had many years' experience, requires a position as above.—Address, Organist, INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, W.C.

WANTED, by Lady Artist, Home in family, partial board on very moderate terms, in return for Evening Lessons in Painting and French. S.W. district preferred.—M. F. H., 7, Roehampton-street, Vauxhall-bridge-road.

GOVERNESS, Resident, seeks re-engagement. Certificated English, Drawing, Sciences, French, Music, Drill. Or as Secretary, Companion.—ELLINGHAM, Thorpe St. Andrew, Norwich.

WANTED, re-engagement as Governess or Nursery Governess. Good French, Botany, Latin, Elementary Music, and Mathematics.—M., 12, Richmond-terrace, Cardiff.

WANTED, an experienced trustworthy Nurse for boy two years and five months old.—Address, Mrs. SWIRE, Bank House, Sutton-in-Ashfield, Notts.

YOUNG LADY, experienced in care of children of all ages, practical and domesticated, seeks post in refined household. Good references offered.—W., Glenholm, Burgess-hill, Sussex.

LADY offers good Home, with education and every care, for one or two refined children. Near South Coast. Resident governess. High-class references given.—Mrs. STEELE, Burgess-hill, Sussex.

WANTED, a capable girl as Nursemaid to three children, ages 10 to 3 years. Must be well recommended.—Apply to 105, Hartington-road, Liverpool.

MR. JOHN HARWOOD is prepared to give DRAMATIC RECITALS of two hours' duration to Societies connected with our own Churches and Schools, upon exceptional terms. Selections from Dickens's "Christmas Carol," "Cricket on the Hearth" (original adaptations), Shakspere, Colman, Sheridan, and other Authors; also a novel "Lecture," entitled "The Art of Public Recitation: its Humours and Difficulties—a Leaf from my own Experience," followed by one hour of illustrative Recitals.

Address, Fair View, Pendleton, Manchester.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses.—For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

FREDK. LONG & SON,

AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,

4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

NUT FOODS.

The following Nut Foods are specially suited for the hot season:—

Banana and Nut Food, 7d, 1/-, and 1/4 per Tin. A new delicious food made from ripe fresh Bananas and Nuts. Can be sliced for sandwiches, or used as cheese.

Almond Cream, 3½d., 1/-, and 1/10 per Tin. Unrivalled as an accompaniment for fresh or stewed fruit.

Malted Nuts, 2d., 6½d., and 1/- per tin. Promotes digestion of all cereal food.

Full descriptive Price List from the Manufacturer:

HUGH MAPLETON,

COLONIAL HOUSE, ARDWICK GREEN, MANCHESTER.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate. — Saturday, Sept. 19, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3196. NEW SERIES, No. 300.] LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 633
ARTICLES—
A Weighty Protest 631
Mysteries of Matter.. 635
Secular Education and Moral Instruction 639
The Revived Interest in Mediæval Religion 641
The Forest 644
LITERATURE—
The Meaning of Good 636
The Boy's Ideal 637
Short Notices.. 937
LEADER—
People's Services 640
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 638
CORRESPONDENCE—
Passive Resistance 645
The Conference Appeal 646
Macedonia 646
MEETINGS—
Band of Hope Union Conference.. .. 645
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 646
ADVERTISEMENTS 647

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE publish this week an article by Professor J. H. Poynting, of Birmingham, on "Radium at the British Association," and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed's International paper on "The Revived Interest in Mediæval Religion," which is the last of the Amsterdam papers which we contemplate publishing in full, though next week we shall publish a great part, if not the whole, of the "Report" of the International Council, presented by the Rev. C. W. Wendte. Next week we hope, also, to publish another of Mrs. Bosanquet's articles on Questions of Social Economics.

——

SIR JOHN BRUNNER proposed and Mr. Philip Stanhope seconded the resolution brought forward by the English delegates at the Peace Conference held last week in Vienna. This resolution recalled the facts that in response to the Russian invitation, the Hague Conference considered, among other subjects, the growing burden of military expenditure by the Great Powers, that it appointed a commission which reported in favour of further consideration of the subject by the Powers, but that nevertheless the burden of armaments had continually increased. It asked the Inter-Parliamentary Congress to adopt the following declaration:—"This Conference is of opinion that the time has arrived when the project submitted by Russia in 1898 should be again submitted and considered by another conference of Great Powers." The resolution was carried unanimously.

——

THE ministerial resignations announced immediately after we had gone to press last week do not produce a political situation any less extraordinary from the point of view of the student of ethics than that immediately preceding them upon which we commented seven days ago. The Free Trade ministers who have resigned are, apparently, not to be followed by the Duke of Devonshire, but his failure to take the only proper course open to him is for the moment less remarkable than the position adopted by his titular chief. Mr. Balfour agrees with Mr. Chamberlain that the "interdependence" between the various fragments of the Empire "should find expression in our commercial relations." He believes with him "that closer fiscal union between the Mother Country and her Colonies would be good for the trade of both, and that if such closer union could be established on fitting terms, its advantages to both parties would increase as the years went on, and as the Colonies grew in wealth and population." But Mr. Balfour is also convinced with Mr. Chamberlain that public opinion is not yet ripe for the taxation of food stuffs which this ideal involves. He deplores the great loss to the Government which Mr. Chamberlain's resignation involves, but he expresses the belief that the gain to the cause he has at heart to be secured by his freedom to advocate it on the public platform "may be greater still."

——

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, then, has failed to persuade the Premier to commit the Cabinet to his propaganda, not because Mr. Balfour does not believe in its wisdom as a measure of Imperial consolidation, but simply because Mr. Chamberlain has been unable to convince him that it would "pay" with the constituencies. Mr. Chamberlain sets out, therefore, to convert the constituencies, and Mr. Balfour gives him his blessing, together with a very plain hint that if he is successful in his mission he (Mr. Balfour) will be ready to aid in giving practical effect to the new policy. Meanwhile, the rump of the Cabinet will devote themselves to "that other branch of Fiscal Reform," the institution of retaliatory tariffs against all and sundry who refuse us an open market for our goods.

——

WITH this cynical bargain made openly in the face of all men, it would be foolish indeed for opponents of dear food to imagine that anything more has been won than the first battle in a prolonged and arduous campaign. So far as the Cabinet is concerned, all that has happened is that the point of attack is slightly varied from that chosen by Mr. Chamberlain; so far as Mr. Chamberlain is concerned, all that has happened is that this most powerful advocate of Protectionism is now free to devote his whole energies to the task of persuading the people into the surrender of the boon conferred upon them by Peel and Gladstone. The lesson of the business is that Free Traders must not be content with combating this or that minor Protectionist heresy, but must seek to familiarise the people with the root principles upon which our whole Fiscal Policy is based—principles with which differential tariffs, food taxes, and retaliation are all alike inconsistent.

——

IF anything were needed at this time of day to show the utter futility of mere "remonstrances" with the Turk on the part of the Powers over the terrible excesses in Macedonia, it is afforded by this week's account of the results of the interchange of views on the subject which has been going on among the Chancelleries. It is announced from Constantinople that, their "remonstrances" notwithstanding, "certain Powers have given Turkey a free hand to suppress the insurrection vigorously and quickly." M. Delcassé, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, has announced to his colleagues in Paris that "Russia and Austria have manifested their firm resolution not to intervene except for the purpose of expediting the carrying out of reforms recommended by them"; reforms which, as has been repeatedly shown, are entirely inadequate to the occasion.

——

THAT the story of the "free hand" is not a mere boast of the Turk without foundation in fact is shown by the statements of the Vienna correspondents, one of whom declares that "the pourparlers between Count von Bülow and Count Goluchowski related to the question of giving Turkey greater freedom of action in suppressing the insurrection," while another vouches for the fact that "Austria has been won over to Count von Bülow's proposal to allow Turkey a free hand in dealing with the Macedonian outbreak." Russia's consent to this course, it is stated, had been obtained in advance, and the decision has already been notified at Constantinople, "where it has given the utmost satisfaction," and we are told that the Sultan has decided to write a personal letter of thanks to the Emperor William for the happy outcome of his efforts, both at Vienna and St. Petersburg, to "secure" the recognition of Turkey's sovereignty over the Macedonians, and the right to restore order within her own dominions unmolested."

——

ONE small grain of comfort there is for Englishmen in all this humiliation. The Powers have "supported the declaration of Austria and Russia to Bulgaria, that in the event of war with Turkey she could not count on help from any quarter "—with the exception of Great Britain, which "considers such a step to be inopportune." We fear that this is not to be taken as implying any present intention on the part of our Government to intervene on Bulgaria's behalf should occasion arise. If we are willing to leave the Turk a free hand with the Macedonians—and we have done nothing to stay his hand hitherto—there seems no particular reason why we should hesitate to let him work his will on the Bulgarians as well. But that Ministers should be unwilling to put matters quite as bluntly as Count von Bülow is a sign of grace, for which we must be duly thankful.

MEANWHILE the sense of shame and passionate indignation in those who realise Great Britain's responsibility in this matter grows continually deeper. More than a week ago the Bishop of Hereford wrote in a letter to the public press:—

The people of England have, indeed, been far too patient in this matter. The younger generation of Englishmen have not realised how great is England's responsibility in regard to it.

But for the action of our own representatives Macedonia would have been free from the miseries of Turkish misrule during the last quarter of a century, and there would have been none of these indescribable agonies to-day. What a responsibility was incurred, with a light heart and in a cynical temper, when this province was handed back to the tender mercies of the Turk.

Do the members of our Cabinet sufficiently recognise how this humiliating memory, as it becomes fully realised, is stirring men and women throughout the land to remorse and anger, and how in consequence they, as our representatives to-day, will never be forgiven if, after present events, they make no strong effort to secure such reparation as is still possible by insisting on autonomous government, adequately guaranteed, for this distressful people?

* * * * *

"God looked for judgment, but behold oppression; for righteousness, but behold a cry."

Is this to be the last word? We cannot believe it. If so, what a mockery it is for the Great Powers of Europe to call themselves Christian Powers; and what a gilded hypocrisy is the Coronation Service of every Christian Emperor or King! It is no exaggeration to say that the stain of an indelible personal discredit will rest upon every monarch and upon every statesman in Christian Europe who, from whatever motive, can be held to have been in any sense primarily responsible for the continuance of such atrocities as you have to report day by day.

ON Tuesday evening next a public meeting of protest, organised by the Balkan Committee, is to be held in St. James's Hall, when the Bishop of Worcester is to preside, and among the speakers announced are Mr. James Bryce, M.P., the Bishop of Hereford, the Rev. Stephen Gladstone, the Rev. J. R. Campbell, Sir Edward Fry, and Sir T. F. Buxton.

THE Rev. Walter Lloyd is a keen hunter of "Free Catholics," and recently made an inquiry, which elicited the following reply from Mr. F. T. Hibgame in Notes and Queries for Sept. 19, under the heading "Free Catholic Christians":—

Some years since I came across a Church of this denomination in New York. The announcement on a board outside the building was "Free Catholic Church of Christ," and the services, one of which I attended, were similar to those of an ordinary Protestant Church of the Methodist type. From the sermon, which was delivered by an ex-Catholic priest, I should imagine that a proportion of the congregation had formerly belonged to that communion. Though one of the smallest denominations, it is included in the registered list of denominations in the State of New York. There was formerly a small chapel of the same sect in the vicinity of Russell-square, but I do not know if it still exists.

IT is good news that, in spite of the exhaustion of the subscription of the Federation of Trade Unions, those who have the matter in hand see good prospect of permanent provision for all the men on strike against Lord Penrhyn. For two reasons the fortunes of the Bethesda quarrymen have been followed with solicitude by people who show little interest in strikes in general. In the first place, it is felt to be anomalous that wealth given by nature to mankind at large should be locked up by the uncontrolled will of a single individual, depriving a whole community of the means of livelihood it has pursued for generations past. And in the second place, Lord Penrhyn, in refusing his men the elementary right of collective bargaining through their chosen delegates, is felt to have made an unwarrantable use of the power which is so anomalously his. It is a happy circumstance that relief from this intolerable state of things should come through the opening of another quarry worked under common ownership and management for for the common good.

THE Rev. R. J. Campbell, taking up again the Thursday noon services at the City Temple, spoke out strongly last week on the terrible condition of Macedonia. On Sunday the Rev. C. Silvester Horne entered on his new ministry at Whitefield's Chapel in Tottenham Court-road, now the Central Mission of the London Congregational Union, and on Tuesday a special service of inauguration was held, the Rev. J. H. Jowett being the preacher, after which there was a public meeting of welcome, under the presidency of Mr. George Spicer. Among those who joined in the welcome were Earl Carrington, who spoke as a Churchman, and the Rev. C. E. Walters, of the West London Methodist Mission.

PROFESSOR JEAN RÉVILLE concluded in last week's Protestant his interesting account of the International meetings at Amsterdam. The supreme value of such meetings he finds not in the information imparted and the reports presented, but in the personal touch of men from different lands, speaking different languages, with various national and ecclesiastical antecedents, and the mutual understanding thus gained for the realising of a genuine spiritual kinship.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—E. S. L. B.; H. B.; L. T. B.; A. H.; A. J.; M. T. M.; G. B. S.; A. D. T.; F. H. W.

A WEIGHTY PROTEST.

THE following Protest has been addressed to the members of the Surrey County Council and the Rating Authorities of West Surrey. Among the signatories were the Rev. G. B. Stallworthy, of Hindhead, the Hon. Rollo Russell and Lady Agatha Russell, Mr. Charles McLaren, M.P., Mr. Hugh Stannus, Mr. A. M. S. Methuen, and others:—

GENTLEMEN,—We find that we are being called upon to pay rates which have been levied under your sanction for the support of elementary schools in which religious education is given of a sectarian character, and we find also that it is intended to entrust the control of considerable sums of public money to the administration of committees of which the majority of the members are of private appointment.

We desire to enter our earnest protest against the application of public funds to the payment of school teachers who are subject to religious tests, and who, though virtually public servants, are liable to dismissal by ecclesiastical managers, on grounds other than those of personal character or educational efficiency.

Most of us who are parties to this memorial are unwilling to refuse payment of the rate that appears to have been already made, but we feel compelled to point out that when the Statute Law contravenes, as in this instance, the elementary axioms of Constitutional Principle and Religious Liberty, many peaceable members of society who have been constant in maintaining obedience to reasonable authority are placed in an unfair and intolerable position.

We hold that we have the right to call upon you, in a grave constitutional crisis like the present, to discourage in every possible way, by your collective and personal influence, a procedure so opposed to the public weal as the levying of rates that are used for the furtherance of ecclesiastical objects. There have been times in our history when the guardians of public interests have allowed themselves to become the instruments of odious enactments, nor has the judgment of posterity ever been more severe than when their compliance has subserved ecclesiastical ends. We believe that in the present crisis the manifest unwillingness to be thus employed, which has been shown by great numbers of gentlemen in official positions, will be a potent factor in the furtherance of right and liberty.

We desire to place it on record that, while there is no part of the public burdens that we bear more cheerfully than that which has relation to the training of the young, we regard with utter detestation the persistent endeavours that are made by ecclesiastical bodies to take advantage of the money and machinery of the State for inculcating dogma, and for maintaining ascendency over the public teacher. We wish, therefore, that it should be fully understood that if we pay the rate now levied we do so under protest, and with strong feeling that deep wrong is done to us as citizens in compelling us to become parties to the support of an educational system which is unjust to a very large part of the nation, which is destructive of harmony, and which can, therefore, be no true basis of efficiency.

MYSTERIES OF MATTER.

RADIUM AT THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION.

ONE of the most interesting features of the recent meeting of the British Association at Southport was the discussion on Radium in Section A, which was initiated by Professor Rutherford of Montreal, a worker who has done much to unravel the tangle of puzzling phenomena presented by this most remarkable substance.

I propose to give some account of the properties of radium as described to the members of the Association, without attempting to follow the actual course of the discussion.

The Discovery of Radium.

Almost immediately after the discovery of the X rays by Röntgen, came the discovery by Becquerel, that salts of uranium emitted something with properties akin to those of the X rays. These salts act on a photographic plate in the dark, even through thin sheets of metal; they make certain substances held near them glow with a phosphorescent light, and they make the air around them capable of conducting electricity more or less freely. A little later it was found that salts of thorium possessed these properties in even greater degree, and that they were shared too by certain minerals, notably by pitch-blende, a mineral which is a complicated mixture of salts of uranium and of many other metals. All these substances are classed together as "radio-active."

M. and Mme. Curie, two distinguished French physicists, found, that by certain chemical processes, they could extract from pitch-blende a small quantity of something far more radio-active than the original mineral. From this, again, they could extract a still smaller quantity of something still more radio-active, and by repeated actions they ultimately extracted from tons of pitch-blende a few grains of a substance which appeared to be a pure salt of a new metal, which they termed "radium." This salt is thousands of times more radio-active than the mineral from which it has been extracted. The metal itself has not yet been obtained, but only its compounds with other bodies such as chlorine, bromine, and nitric acid. It is evidently of the calcium and barium family, but with an atom heavier than these—heavier, indeed, than any other atoms except those of thorium and uranium, the other two radio-active metals. The immense labour in the preparation of radium salts involves great expense, and the value of radium has been expressed as some hundreds of thousands of pounds sterling per pound weight of the substance. But these big figures are only arithmetic. There is probably not yet an ounce of pure radium salt in the whole world. The Curies some time back possessed about a thirtieth of an ounce, and other workers rejoice if they possess a grain of it.

Properties of Radium.

Let us see what are the most evident properties of radium, noting that uranium and thorium share these properties, but in far less degree.

First, and most easily observed, is the property of discharging electrified bodies. Suppose, for instance, that we have a gold leaf electroscope. This is a simple instrument consisting of two strips of gold leaf which hang down vertically, side by side, from the end of a metal rod held in an insulator. If the metal rod is stroked with flannel or fur, it becomes charged with electricity, which passes down to the gold leaves. The leaves then repel each other and stand out like an inverted V. If, when the leaves are thus charged, a particle of radium is brought near them, they rapidly fall together again, showing that the air has become conducting, and that the charge has passed away through it.

Another most remarkable property is that of making certain substances glow with phosphorescent light. Thus, if zinc sulphide is pasted on to a sheet of cardboard, a small piece of radium brought near the screen so formed will make it glow with an intense green light, giving out sometimes as much light as two or three candles. Even if sheets of metal are interposed, the glow, though fainter, is still apparent. Sir William Crookes discovered that if a particle of radium is held just above the screen and the glow is examined with a pocket lens, it is not continuous, but consists of a series of little flashing points—a most beautiful exaggeration of the twinkling of the stars on a clear night.

Again, the radium itself glows in the dark, and when in air it makes the nitrogen in the air glow, though very faintly, just as that gas does when an electric discharge is being passed through it.

Emission of Heat.

But most remarkable of all the phenomena exhibited by radium is the continual emission of heat discovered by the Curies. Many substances can emit heat as long as they are undergoing spontaneous decomposition and entering into new and less energetic chemical unions. But as yet the radium salts have shown no such changes. Further, all chemical changes hitherto examined take place far less actively when the bodies are extremely cold, whereas radium, so Professor Dewar told us at Southport, gives out more heat when immersed in liquid hydrogen at 250° below the freezing point of water than at ordinary temperatures. Indeed, if a freshly prepared radium salt is put into the liquid hydrogen, it goes on giving out heat at an increasing rate for several weeks, and no experiment has yet been carried on long enough to show a decrease, though we can hardly suppose that the supply of heat is really endless.

We have, then, the surrounding air made conducting, the glow in the dark, the excitation of glow in neighbouring bodies, and the continuous evolution of heat from no apparent store.

Manifold Activities.

The power of discharging electrified bodies provides some means of examining more minutely what is going on in the space round the radium, and it has been found that there are at least four emissions from it. In the first place it is giving off what appears to be a heavy gas, which Professor Rutherford terms the emanation. This I will return to again. Next it is shooting out positively electrified particles, apparently molecules about as light as those of hydrogen, darting forth with the almost inconceivable velocity of 20,000 miles a second. Thirdly, it is shooting out slower moving negatively electrified particles, apparently far lighter than those of hydrogen, identical indeed with the atomic fragments which Professor Thomson has taught us to see in the Crookes tube; and fourthly, a kind of wave disturbance of the X-ray sort, but much more penetrating than ordinary X rays. Probably the flashing on a zinc sulphide screen discovered by Crookes is due to its bombardment by the positively electrified particles, each flash marking the clash of a particle against the screen. Probably, too, the heat evolved in the radium itself is due to the clashing against the molecules of radium of those positively electrified bodies which do not aim straight out from the salt into the air, but bombard their neighbours. Their enormous energy of motion is converted by the clash into heat, just as the energy of motion of a bullet is converted into heat when it strikes a target. Some of the negatively electrified particles also do not get out, but knock against the radium molecules, and so probably give rise to the X-like rays.

Probably the positive and negative particles which escape, and the X rays, all conspire to knock or shake to pieces the molecules of air round the radium, and in this disorganised state we know that the air will conduct electricity. Probably, too, when they strike their neighbours, instead of escaping, they make those neighbours glow with the phosphorescent light which is seen in the dark. All, probably—for it is too soon yet for unqualified assertion.

The Emanation.

Now let us return to the emanation investigated by Professor Rutherford. This emanation slowly diffuses out from the radium just as if it were a gas with molecules about a hundred times as heavy as those of hydrogen, and it can be carried away by a current of air blown over the radium and led into vessels at a distance. It is far too small in quantity to be weighed or measured, but it splits up slowly and shoots from itself the positively electrified particles which I have just described, and these can be detected by their effects. The portion of each molecule remaining behind is, of course, negatively electrified, but soon a fragment is shot off, it seems, with the negative charge, to constitute one of the negatively electrified stream of particles. The neutral mass remaining may break up again, but here we will leave it. So the emanation appears to be the parent of all the remarkable progeny. The particles shot out from the radium with their positive and negative charges are most likely produced by emanation which has been formed from, and is still entangled in, the mesh of molecules of the radium salt. This emanation can be dissolved out from the salt, which is then quite inactive. But gradually fresh emanation is formed, and the activity rises again.

From the Radium Atom itself.

Now this emanation, this heavy unelectrified gas, as we may regard it, does not appear to be due to a change in the chloride or bromide or nitrate part of the salt, but in the metal part and in that alone, for its rate of issue is the same for the same weight of radium whatever the radium may be combined with. Professor Rutherford believes that it is due to a splitting up of the radium atom itself. The radium atoms, he supposes, are in rather a shaky condition, and every now and then one breaks in two pieces, one piece constituting the emanation and going off, the rest remaining to form a new and smaller atom not yet known. But the emanation is still more shaky and breaks in two, or rather it throws off a positively electrified bit, itself thereby becoming negative. Now the enormous energy of projection of the positive bit implies that in the emanation molecule, and therefore in the parent radium molecule, there is an enormous store of energy, far beyond that in any ordinary chemical union. It is perhaps enough to say that we can imagine an atomic system which shall contain a store of energy not manifested as heat, and which shall fling away bits of itself with some of this store converted into energy of motion, ready in turn to be converted into heat.

Intense Energy.

But, at once, a difficulty arises. If the radium atom is breaking up and forming a new kind of atom, why do we not find the new atom? Why does not the appearance of the radium salt change? Why does not its store of internal energy visibly lessen when its heat expenditure is so lavish? The difficulty lessens and almost vanishes if we look at the Crookes screen flashing under a piece of radium no bigger than a pin's head. There are, perhaps, a hundred or a thousand flashes in a second, a hundred or a thousand positively electrified bits hurled against it in a second, a hundred or a thousand atoms of radium broken up in a second. At the larger figure it would take thirty years for a billion atoms to break up, and there are probably a thousand to a million billion atoms in the pin's head. Looking for signs of change and decay in the radium, then, is like looking for the grey hairs and wrinkles of old age on a newborn child.

Divisible Atoms.

These ideas of the atoms as storehouses of immense quantities of energy, and as systems which can break up and so give out their stores, may seem wild and extravagant. Indeed, so wildly extravagant do they seem to many chemists and to some physicists that they will not consider them with any patience. But the facts are extraordinary, and had anyone described them ten years ago he would have been set down as fit for an asylum.

The discoveries of Lenard, Röntgen and Thomson, however, have shown that they do not stand alone. We are face to face with new phenomena, for which the old scheme of matter, with its indivisible atoms, has so far utterly failed to find a place. All attempts yet made to give an account of these new facts on old lines are, to say the least, more wildly extravagant than anything which Rutherford or Thomson have suggested.

This year we have been celebrating the hundredth birthday of Dalton's atomic theory, a theory which appeared to set the indivisible atom on a sure foundation. It is a curious coincidence that in the same year we should all be discussing this new hypothesis, which would remove that foundation, and shake the atom to pieces.

J. H. POYNTING.

LITERATURE.

THE MEANING OF GOOD.*

THE appearance of a second edition usually signalises the success of the first; but there are features about this issue which suggest, rightly or wrongly, that it has not been with any such encouragement that author and publisher have decided to launch a second challenger. The book is not of that type which makes its way easily to public favour. We would say that it is too good, but for a doubt whether the word would not be deemed by its author too ambiguous to be strictly definitive.

Appealing, however, to the strength of his own elaborate argument for some appreciable significance in the terms, we will venture to say that the book is really very good. Our conjecture is that the first edition having failed to secure adequate public recognition, its author, having become subsequently widely known and appreciated as the writer of the remarkable "Letters from John Chinaman," sought to gain a new and wider hearing for his earlier work by identifying himself on the title-page of a new edition with the later.

It is rather pathetic. Somewhat as if Milton had been obliged to get a hearing for "Paradise Lost," by advertising it as "by the author of 'Comus.'" Anyhow, here comes along the second edition of a good book, under the auspices of a new publisher, but in all respects the same, save for a different format and some new misprints, the more remarkable since the same printer is responsible for both editions. The book is an attempt to arrive by the dialectic method at some intelligible and reliable meaning in the word "good," as applied in the language of moral, æsthetic, and intellectual judgments.

It is really the old quest for the summum bonum, under stress of demands that are no longer to be satisfied with the old solutions.

It is a commonplace of description to call dialogue of this type "Socratic"; and it is convenient, probably, to our readers to have the familiar phrase used again; as it may truthfully be, if qualified with the addition that it is much less tedious and far more incisive than any such dialogues with which we are familiar outside Plato himself. We cannot say that this book has the dramatic vividness and poetic spontaneity of the best of Plato's dialogues.

It has a certain savour of the literary laboratory which one does not quite lose even in the suggested aroma of Alpine hayfields and the plash of falling waters which help the reader's fancy to a really delightful and congenial setting for the play of thought and imagination in which he is summoned to consider himself a combatant. This means that we have not got here the best thing of its kind that has ever been done. Allowing so much, we do not unsay the opinion that we have something in this volume that is quite remarkably good.

A modern instance of a similar attempt is Rogers' once so widely read and highly esteemed "Eclipse of Faith," as compared with which we may say without hesitation, a greater than Rogers is here!

Perhaps, by a few quotations, we may best in brief compass, give an idea of the book's scope and aim.

A knot of university men, some fresh from academic study and reflection, and others after varying periods of active conflict with the difficulties of practical life in divergent spheres of scientific, political, or civil activity, are gathered together for a brief holiday amongst the Swiss mountains, and take occasion to review their theories of life in the light of a very various experience of life's practice, and the differences of individual temperament and philosophic outlook.

> The trouble with me is (says one) that while I seem to see that we are bound to trust our judgments about what is good, yet I cannot see that we know that they are true. Indeed, from this very diversity, it seems as if they could not all be true. My only hope is, that perhaps they do all contain some truth, although they may contain falsehood as well. (P. 33.)
>
> But, after all, how small a part of our life is affected by our theories! As a rule we act simply and without reflection; and such action is the safest and most prosperous. . . . But how do you know that? What standard are you applying? Where do you get it from? From common sense. And what is common sense? Oh, a kind of instinct, too! A kind of instinct? How many are there, then? And does every instinct require another to justify it, and so ad infinitum? (P. 35.)

We are familiar with the fact that the soundest judgment will not save us from the most palpable errors of conduct. For judgment can only act upon reasons; reasons are deducible from premises, and these premises are frequently the merest assumptions.

Nevertheless, we venture the opinion that it is better to err in accordance with right Reason than to go right by a mere lucky stumble of "instincts"; "better," we mean, of course, in reference to individual character. It may be bad enough for a person's "worldly chances," which depend solely upon actions, not at all upon motives. For character motive is everything; and "he is not the wisest man who never proved himself a fool."

The force of the dialogue is occasionally weakened by a drift into a too consciously literary form. For instance, in conversation, do we meet with the phrase "as follows" in reference to our next sentences? (P. 36.)

That rather hag-ridden phantom, "the social organism," not as it is and should be appreciated, but as it is presented in the loosely adjusted biological analogies of economists, more popular than wise,

* "The Meaning of Good." By G. LOWES DICKINSON. Second Edition, 1902. (R. Brimley Johnson. 4s. 6d.)

comes in for some good-humoured banter and sound criticism. (P. 40, sqq. 119–20.)

The following is, as far as it goes, a fair critique of the Utilitarian substitute for moral criteria.

"Why," I said, "if all conduct turned upon such simple choices as that between thick soup and clear, then perhaps its rules might be fairly summed up in the utilitarian formula. But in fact, as everyone knows, the choices are far more difficult; they are between, let us say, a bottle of port and a Beethoven symphony; leisure and liberty now or £1,000 a year twenty years hence; art and fame at the cost of health, or sound nerves and obscurity, and so on. Through all the possible cases, infinitely more complex in reality than I could attempt to indicate here, all of which, no doubt, could be brought under your formula, but none of which the formula would help to solve.

Valuable as this book is as a summary of the failures of great and historic systems to define and inculcate "the good," its main value is in the fact that it does not stop short with criticism and analysis. It has a strong, though tentative, constructive element: not the less strong because tentative. The very weakness of most attempts to substitute new hopes for old is the presumptuous parade of dogmatic assertion where intelligent questioning can elucidate no sufficient evidence.

The argument all comes back, as such argument logically must, to the claim of immortality as alone giving scope to any intelligible conception of good. Good in this life's experience is so far cognizable as good as it conduces to an upward tendency of individual and racial development. The old Adam must be daily dying that we may rise on stepping stones of our dead selves to higher things. The feeling of light precedes the sense of sight. In our upward progress we have already acquired the use of five senses. But what are five senses for the apprehension of a universe of infinite wonder and variety? We know what we are, but "it doth not yet appear what we shall be."

And so the volume concludes with a reference to that inspiring exclamation of St. Paul when baffled for language adequate to convey his faith in the destiny and dignity of our race: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him."

We should like to see the constructive side of the book more clearly elaborated. It is to be found for the seeking, but is rather obscured and weakened than enforced and illuminated by presentation in the too hackneyed form of a suppositional dream, brilliantly though that dream is related.

Moreover, the induced consciousness of anæsthesia is too real and far too interesting a problem of genuine psychology to allow of our reading without a protest any fanciful introduction of such an agent in the character of a deus ex machina. The dream-consciousness may yet have revelations in store for us. Let us not play at their possession while we work and wait for them. The dream, however, amounts to this: We cannot express the good in terms of logic. That were to see it. We walk not by sight, but by faith.

And what is that faith, but a feeling, an instinct, a something that is but sight in the making?

Knowledge to guide us, Faith to urge us forward;
For wherefore onward, were no goal in prospect?
And how to walk in blindness o'er the mountains?
Knowledge and Faith: or call that Faith but Feeling,
It is the Feeling of a bird that travels—
A track in view, but lost in unseen issue
On distant shores—by knowledge and by Feeling.
By Feeling only? Swift some cruel concussion
Thwarts life or effort: or alone by knowledge?
See aimless wandering end in blank confusion.

H. A. R. J.

THE BOY'S IDEAL.*

THOUGHTFUL boys, and their elders no less, will be the better for reading this little book. "My long experience of school and college life," says the Master of Trinity in his brief introduction, "leads me to believe that the thought of Responsibility, which is the key-note of these pages, can hardly be too early brought before boys, provided it is presented to them in a genial and sensible, and not in an austere or pedantic way. Boys gladly rise to the thought of being trusted, and of being deemed worthy to help and protect others." The appeal, in that sense, to the best that is in a boy's nature Mr. Butler has well made, and we are glad that these notes, written originally for his own boy, should be now made accessible to others. The fact that they were thus written, without any thought of publication, seems to give a directness and earnestness to the appeal, which is particularly welcome.

How Mr. Butler talks to his boy will best be seen by quotation:—

It is an unspeakable privilege to come in contact with a great character. They to whom it has been vouchsafed see more clearly because of it all their days. Who could resist its charm?

John Nicholson fell at Delhi forty-six years ago, but to this day his name is one to conjure with in India. The impulse of the qualities that made up his life—his character—lingers like a fragrance. Men who knew Charles Gordon will attempt to describe him, with a look in their eyes as if searching for a word to express their meaning, and end by simply saying, "He was different from other men." The Ministers of the late Queen Victoria found it well nigh impossible to describe her power, the force of personality, which made her, for decades, the adviser of the sovereigns of Europe.

For if it is true that we have a relationship with the degraded man, how gloriously true is it that we have a part in all that a noble man does! His truthfulness, his strength, his obedience; his chivalry, his self-control, his gentleness; his dignity, his willingness to forgive, his tenderness; his energy, his patience, his faithfulness; his breadth of view, his hopefulness, his refinement of heart and courtesy of manner, all concern us. For is he not human, and are not we? We are not to copy him: that would be but a slavish tribute. We are to be inspired by him to do with our lives not what, but as, he has done with his.

Then follow some stirring instances of heroism, and of the power of noble character over men, and much wholesome counsel as to honour and generosity and truthfulness, and other qualities which go to the making of a true manhood, with warnings against the folly of conceit and other pitfalls of eager youth and self-seeking manhood. The notes do not always grip with equal firmness, and the one real failure in the book appears to us the attempt (the most elaborate of all) to picture the great race at Athens seven years ago; but that is only one illustration, the failure of which we regret the more because others are so vivid, so true in their encouragement of the most generous aims. And why, in the concluding passage, should not the name of Phillips Brooks have been recorded? For we take the words of final counsel to be his: "Shall you be God's or the world's? Be both. Not in any miserable compromise. Not by the effort to serve God and Mammon. But by a brave and filial questioning that God may tell you just how He wants a child of His to live in your peculiar time, under your peculiar circumstances."

SHORT NOTICES.

The Life of Richard Cobden, by JOHN MORLEY, has been for more than twenty years before the public, and has had a very wide circulation both in library and in cheap popular editions. There was a shilling abridged edition in 1882, and ten years later a sixpenny "Free Trade" edition. Now, with special appositeness, comes a new popular edition, complete in one volume, to which is added a valuable bibliography of Cobden, based on the British Museum catalogue. (Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

In Lakeland Dells and Fells is another book by W. T. PALMER, whose "Lake-Country Rambles" last summer received so warm a welcome. In the same pleasant vein of one thoroughly at home in the country he writes here of "Shepherd Life among the Fells," of "Dalesmen's Sports," of "Fell-walking Records," and other things. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

The Journal of John Woolman, "beyond comparison the sweetest and purest autobiography in the language," as Channing called it, a book known and loved by Coleridge and Charles Lamb, by Theodore Parker and by Whittier, who published the best known modern edition, with a valuable introduction, cannot be too earnestly commended to all lovers of simplicity of life and a faithful Christian discipleship. A popular shilling edition in paper covers was recently issued, and since then we have received another very handy edition, with Whittier's introduction and some interesting illustrations and a full bibliography. (Headley Bros. 2s. net.)

True and False Life, by Leo Tolstoy; and Man the Reformer, by Ralph Waldo Emerson, are two more booklets in the series of which Mr. E. H. Crosby's study of "Tolstoy and His Message" was the first. The issue is admirable in form, and handy for the traveller's pocket. (The Simple Life Press, 5, Water-lane, Ludgate-hill, E.C. 3d. each.)

* "The First Year of Responsibility: Talks with a Boy." By Maynard Butler. Second Edition. With an Introduction by the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. (Sonnenschein and Co., 1903. 1s. 6d.)

Discourses on War, by William Ellery Channing, with an Introduction by Edwin D. Mead, is issued by the International Union, to mark the centenary of the beginning of Channing's ministry in Boston. In his study was organised the Massachusetts Peace Society, at the instance of Noah Worcester, in 1815, and out of it, thirteen years later, grew the American Peace Society. Channing's searching words have by no means lost their force, nor their application, often startlingly direct, to present day circumstances and problems. Mr. Mead's sixty pages of introduction contain a careful study of Channing's teaching, and the discourses and selections from discourses, collected in this well-printed volume, furnish an armoury for the war against war, for which we must desire a very wide distribution. (Ginn & Co., Boston, Mass. 50 cents, net. By post, 60 cents.)

A History of the Adult School Movement, by J. Wilhelm Rowntree and Henry Bryan Binns, is a re-issue in a revised form of the interesting series of articles originally published last year in successive numbers of the Present Day Papers. The book is enriched by portraits of Samuel Fox of Nottingham, Joseph Sturge, and William White. The authors see in the Adult Schools, under the care of the Society of Friends, a great opportunity for service, and possibly for new religious developments of "congregational worship, free in its practice, but spiritual in its foundation." The need indeed is great, and they conclude with this aspiration: "The war between labour and capital, the bitterness of selfish competition, the poverty that shames our land, the lovelessness of souls that know no Christ, call with one mighty voice for the labours of self-sacrificing love. May teachers and scholars share alike the mantle and the staff of this service, and build in their measure, and under God's redeeming power, the City of the Happy Souls." (Headley Bros. 2s. net).

DURING the coming week our American brethren will be holding the twentieth meeting of their National Conference, in Atlantic City, N.Y. On Monday evening the opening sermon is to be preached by the Rev. S. R. Calthrop, of Syracuse, while on Thursday evening the closing address and benediction will be by the Rev. Robert Collyer, of New York—both men English born, but long naturalised in America. Among the subjects to be considered by the Conference are "Training for the Ministry," "The Minister and his Opportunity," and "Congregationalism and Religious Development." On the programme is an address by Dr. S. A. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association, and a report of the International Council by the Rev. C. W. Wendte, both of whom are doubtless already safe home again from Amsterdam.

IN the hope of making the Children's Column more systematically useful, we propose during the coming months to have several short courses of consecutive lessons on definite subjects. The first series, on the Sermon on the Mount, by the Rev. E. P. Barrow, of Manchester, will begin next week.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

IN HOLLAND.

How many of you are learning French or German, I wonder? and how many of you are learning these languages as mere lessons, just because you have to do it, or because you will need it for some examination which you want to pass?

But if you had been with us in Holland, last week, you would have felt something of the joy of being able to understand what people around you were talking about, if you had learned their language; or would have had rather the feeling of being tongue-tied and spell-bound, if, when wanting to know about things, and wanting to speak to those around you, you had not possessed the power to do so. So make the best of your opportunities now, and look forward to the time when you, too, may have the pleasure and the privilege of taking part in one of these gatherings that we have just been enjoying in Holland, where men and women from the East and from the West, from the North and from the South, came together to grasp the hand of friendship, and to encourage and strengthen one another in the spirit of religious freedom and noble endeavour.

We did have a glorious time; not only in hearing what others had to say, but in enjoying the generous hospitality of our Dutch friends, who had arranged all kinds of entertainment for us. And in the midst of all you were not forgotten either; for on one of our excursions a Dutch lady, whom I had never before had the pleasure of meeting, came up to me and, thrusting something—I will tell you what, presently—into my hand, said, "I have read THE INQUIRER for many years; please take this and write something about to-day in the Children's Column." So, obedient to command, I now want to tell you about the excursion made that afternoon.

Most of you know, I dare say, that Holland is a flat country, only kept from being inundated by water by the constant watchfulness and industry of its people. Canals are as plentiful as streets, and barges carry the goods from place to place, just as carts and wagons do in England.

Ships in the Meadows.

Well, on this afternoon we went from Amsterdam, first, to a little place called Edam, to reach which we had to pass broad stretches of grassy fields with windmills, big and little, dotted about all along the way. Presently, looking at the green landscape, we saw ships gliding about in the fields. Yes, little sailing vessels were making their way through the green grass. I fancy I can hear you say, "Now, Aunt Amy, you are telling travellers' stories. Everyone knows that can't be true." But I saw it myself; surely I ought to know. I saw little sailing vessels going through the fields.

In spite of that, do you still persist that boats can't sail on land? Perhaps you ask, with just a little bit of a sneer, "Are they magic boats, then?" Well, had we lived five hundred years ago, possibly I might have thought that they were, but now I have learnt to know that "there is a why and a because" for everything, even though we may not be always able to find it out. But I had to try to find a solution of the apparent mystery, and a moment's thought told me that they must be on tiny canals threading their way through the fields, though the grass on either side completely hides the water from our sight. "Of course that was it," you exclaim; "what a fuss to to have made over such a simple thing."

Perhaps; but after all it illustrates what causes many difficulties and misunderstandings in our intercourse with one another; and in future, when you and somebody else feel very positive about things which seem to contradict each other, just remember the hidden stream of water, and look for the unseen factor which may bring harmony to the other two points of the problem.

At Edam.

But all this time we are keeping our friends waiting; let us get out of the train and go up one of these quaint old streets in Edam, streets pleasantly shaded from the hot sun by the trees, and lined by one of the canals. In that house is a museum, and there we shall find a couple of rooms kept as they were in olden times. We go in, and find ourselves in such tiny apartments; so little light and so little air that we are glad that we do not have to live in them. There is the place for the bed let into the wall, and below this I was told a drawer was often found, which was pulled out at night for the child's bed. I hope they never shut the drawer in the morning before taking out the little one, don't you? In one corner of the room was baby's chair—similar to those which are still in use, so I heard—and this was closed in all round below the seat by a door. Opening the door one saw that the footboard had holes in it, and under this was an empty space. Here in winter a pan of hot peat is put so that the heat, coming through the holes, can keep baby's feet quite warm.

Volendam.

We must not linger any longer, for our party is making its way, some on foot and some in barges, to the fishing village of Volendam, a little further off. Half an hour's walk and we have reached it. I wish you could have seen the brightly coloured group of country folk on that sunny afternoon crowding around to welcome us, the men and boys wearing the widest of trousers, with two large bright buttons in front, while the women and girls looked most picturesque in their short skirts of various colours, and on their heads a snowy white cap of curious shape. Some of us asked if there was any shop where these could be bought, but no! the women had made them themselves, embroidering the crowns with patterns in chain stitch, and trimming the edge with a simple kind of lace.

But I was to have one after all. I told you about the lady who put something in my hand; well, that something was one of these caps. She said that the women and the girls, both big and little, put on a clean cap on Sunday, and their great pride is to make it last as clean as possible all the week through. Some of us who live in big cities with smoky chimneys would find that impossible, I fancy.

All the people wear the useful but clumsy sabots, the wooden shoes, and these they leave outside the door when they enter the house; and I think, if I were them, I should be glad to throw them off, and be able to run about in my stockinged feet. But they are used to them, and don't seem to feel them awkward at all; indeed, as we passed the schoolhouse, a group of girls were skipping in the playground, and the shoes went clatter, clatter, clatter on the ground, making a kind of primitive musical accompaniment to the exercise which they were enjoying as much as any of our own young folks in England.

One thing was most striking about the dress of the villagers; no torn or ragged garment was to be seen; patches, yes, patches of different shapes, sizes, and colour; no invisible darns, but good honest patches, without chance of mistake; even the clothes of the beggars themselves were neat, and tidy, and whole.

After wandering about for a couple of hours, the word was passed that it was time to return, so we made our way to the quay, and on to the steamer which had been chartered for us. Such a bright group we made, visitors and villagers all mixed up together into one long picturesque mass of humanity. Gradually we got on board, and then, amid waving of handkerchiefs, happy looks, and friendly shouts of farewell, our good vessel steamed away back to the city of Amsterdam.

AUNT AMY.

A NORWEGIAN KING.

IN the old days, near the beginning of the Christian era, Norway was inhabited by a wild and warlike race of men, who were governed by chieftains as wild and warlike as their subjects. In those days, might was considered right, and if the Earl or King who owned a province, took a fancy to possess the next province also, he had no hesitation in attacking his neighbour, and, if possible, conquering him, and taking possession of his dominions.

And so, gradually, large tracts of land, made up of small, conquered kingdoms came to be united under one successful chief. War seemed to be their natural condition, and so these successful chiefs continued fighting with each other, until gradually a great ambition came into the minds of some of them; that was, to have all Norway united under one king, instead of divided among many rulers. But this was a difficult thing to accomplish, and for many years the fighting went on, and the country seemed to draw no nearer to a settlement.

Christianity had been preached in the land, but it had only been accepted by a few men here and there, and paganism was still the religion of the people.

How Norway became Christian.

But at last, in the year 1016, a king called Olaf Haroldsson came to the throne of one of these kingdoms, and he determined to make Norway, not only a united land, but also a Christian land. He had a hard task before him, and though many of his actions seem to us now to have been cruel and barbarous, yet, considering the uncivilised state of the country, the wonder is that he was not more barbarous still. He seems, at any rate, to have been just, and to have impressed his countrymen with a power and goodness which they acknowledged after he died, while he frequently showed to criminals a degree of mercy which in those days was not common.

A story is told that on one occasion, some of the small kings who had sworn allegiance to him, but who were devoted to the old pagan faith, formed a conspiracy to murder him. The plot was discovered and the conspirators were captured, but Olaf spared their lives, though he punished them severely, even blinding Rörek, the ringleader; whom, however, he afterwards treated kindly, for he took him away with him, gave him servants and money, and a seat at table next his own, and tried by kindness to make him forget his hard fate.

But Rörek could not forget that he had once been a king, and though for long he disguised his feelings, yet in his heart he was nursing plans of vengeance, and after two attempts to murder King Olaf, he was banished to Iceland, the king even then sparing his life, though he was urged to kill him to ensure his own life against a third attempt. Olaf could be very severe, but he was always just, and punished people of high and low degree alike.

The Guldbrandsdale Legend.

There is a curious story of how the people of Guldbrandsdale accepted Christianity. The King was journeying through the land to ascertain who were continuing, contrary to law, to make sacrifices to the heathen gods, and at Guldbrandsdale he was met by 800 armed men under Dale-Guldbrand, the great chieftain of the valley.

The peasants fled, however, so, instead of fighting, the chieftain invited the King to hold a meeting with them, and discuss the proposed change of faith. At this meeting, the King told them he wanted them to believe in one God, and be baptized, and the Bishop who was travelling with the King, preached to them. They met thus for three days, and on the third, the people brought with them a great image of the god Thor, which they placed upon the green.

In his speech that day, the King said to the chieftain, "Thou wishest to frighten us with thy god, who is both deaf and blind, and can save neither himself nor others; who cannot stir from the spot unless is he carried. Now I have a foreboding that he will soon come to grief."

What the Idol Contained.

It was a dull, cloudy morning, but just at that moment the sun burst through the clouds, and the peasants all turned towards the east. And instantly, at a sign from the king, one of his men struck the idol with his club, so that it was broken into many pieces. Out leaped rats, snakes, and lizards, which had been living on the delicacies with which the idol had been daily fed.

A terrible consternation seized upon the peasants, when they saw what their god contained. They fled to the river, but King Olaf, who had foreseen this, had bored holes in their boats, so that they were unable to float them.

Quite subdued in spirit, they were compelled to return to the meadow where the meeting had been held, and the King said, "Now you see what power there was in your god, to whom you bore silver and gold and bread and meat, and who it was that enjoyed it all. It was mice and snakes, vipers and toads. Now I will give you the choice of two things. Either you shall accept the Christian faith, or you shall fight with me this day. He will win to whom the God in whom we trust will give the victory."

The First Church.

The peasants were in no mood to fight, so they declared their faith in Christ and were baptized by the King's Bishop. And when the King travelled on, he left priests behind to give them Christian teaching; and Dale-Guldbrand, the chieftain, built the first church in Guldbrandsdale.

There are many more curious stories about King Olaf. He made many mistakes, and his way of forcing Christianity on the people was often unwise, and quite opposed to the true spirit of Christianity. But he lived in a barbarous age, and he acted according to his light. And he made his people respect and love him so much, that after his death they called him "Olaf the Saint," and ever since then Christianity has remained the religion of Norway.

O. M. RAWNLINS.

SECULAR EDUCATION AND MORAL INSTRUCTION.

MR. HARROLD JOHNSON, Hon. Secretary of the Moral Instruction League (19, Buckingham-street, Strand, W.C.), writes to us:—

"I read with interest Mr. Whitaker's advocacy of purely Secular Education in your last week's issue. The letter (for me) contains, however, one serious omission, as did also the resolution passed by the recent Trade Union Congress. It is to be hoped that in future the championship of Secular Education will be in the hands of those who include under this heading (and make it clear that they do so) systematic non-theological moral instruction. The platform cry is to be, in brief, not Secular Education, but Secular Education and Moral Instruction. Mr. Whitaker refers in his letter to Mr. J. Allanson Picton, Rev. J. Page Hopps, and Mr. F. J. Gould as staunch upholders of secular education. It is strange that he should not mention at the same time that they are also staunch upholders of moral instruction. They are all members of the Moral Instruction League."

Mr. Johnson, who will be glad to send literature in regard to the League to those who desire it, adds the following information:—

"The late Leicester School Board introduced moral instruction into all its schools, and also drew up a syllabus of moral instruction, with illustrations and instructions for teachers, to be had of the Assistant Secretary, Education Committee, Town Hall, Leicester, by post, 3s. 3d., for all the standards. The late Bradford School Board recently followed Leicester's example and adopted its syllabus. Education committees will be speedily following in their wake. The Moral Instruction League is at present engaged in preparing books of teachers' notes based on the several standards of its Graduated Syllabus of Moral Instruction, published in full in THE INQUIRER, of February 13. A book on standard five is nearly ready."

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are :—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 26, 1903.

PEOPLE'S SERVICES.

IN the scheme of new and enlarged work elaborated by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to meet the fresh call to active duty, which came early in the present year with the munificent addition to its income, a prominent place was given in the programme of home work to the holding of "popular religious services in public halls and theatres, with a view to reaching the unchurched masses, particularly in large cities and towns."

During the coming winter a beginning is to be made with this work, and the capacity of our churches to offer just this kind of helpful ministry is to be put to a searching test.

It must be distinctly understood that this is not an effort of theological propagandism, nor is it undertaken in the interest of our own existing churches, or with the thought of extending our denominational borders. That such work, faithfully and effectively done, will strengthen the life of the churches engaging in it, is undoubted; and possibly it may indirectly bring new members into our fellowship, a result over which we should unfeignedly rejoice. But that is not the object with which it is undertaken, nor must any such thought be allowed to weigh in judging of its measure of success.

What is aimed at is simply the giving of the bread of life to those who are hungry, looking for nothing in return. As JESUS, when he looked upon the multitudes, "was moved with compassion for them, because they were distressed and scattered, as sheep not having a shepherd," and both spoke himself and sent out others to declare to them the good news of the better life, of the brotherhood open to all alike in the present Kingdom of GOD, so we, by this simple and direct means of a man speaking to his brother men, desire to tell them the good news of what we know of the true life with GOD. It is to be a message of frank human sympathy, offered to all who will come and hear, offered just for its own sake, in the hour of brotherly communion, because it is good thus to share the most precious things of our deeper life, because so the weary and heavy laden may be refreshed and strengthened, the dim light in which they have been groping an unfriended way may be made clearer, and a new joy be brought to them with faith in the Divine realities of life.

Chosen men are to speak the word, and many others are to help to make the fit occasion. In London a series of four Sunday evening services in the Greenwich Theatre is to begin on Oct. 11, and a further series in the Grand Theatre at Islington on Nov. 8. In Manchester a series of four services in the Theatre of Varieties, Oxford-road, begins on Nov. 1, while at Devonport and in other places similar services are to be held. Chief among the speakers are the Revs. J. PAGE HOPPS and JAMES C. STREET, long tried in this service, and others, including the Revs. W. COPELAND BOWIE and W. G. TARRANT, are to have a share; but what we desire specially to emphasise here is that many other helpers are required to make the fit occasion. That is to say, in each district, where the word is to be spoken, the invitation must first be given to the people by means of a house-to-house visitation; then on the Sunday the atmosphere of brotherly welcome must be provided by the number of those present to take part in the service, already in the true spirit of the occasion, and particularly by those who can sing, whether in the choir, which must be of commanding power, or among the people in the body of the hall. This is no light undertaking, but appeal is made for many willing helpers, and each one, whatever his or her task, must feel that it is part of a true act of ministry, an offering of help, out of the heart of brotherly love, to those who are in need.

With regard to the London services we refer our readers once more to the letter from the Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, which appeared in THE INQUIRER of Sept. 5. The work in Manchester begins later, but there also, we have every reason to believe, adequate preparations will be made, and helpers organised for the effective carrying out of the effort.

For such work we have the sanction, and we may feel that we have the benediction, of our greatest teachers. The work, as we have pointed out, is in the very spirit of the ministry of JESUS. This was clearly recognised by Dr. MARTINEAU, who in his letter to the first meeting of the National Conference, at Liverpool, in 1882, wrote so beautifully and with such searching power of the privileges and the duties of the Christian congregation. As to the demand for faithfulness in missionary effort, he said :—

"No Christian Society can subsist upon its own internal relations alone, and, like a monastery, shut out the confusion and the cries of the world around. We acknowledge, with all Christendom, that the Missionary spirit is inseparable from the religious life; and that it is impossible for a people to train themselves in the school of CHRIST, yet remain quiet neighbours to the victims of passion, ignorance, and wrong. Where there is no sorrow felt for those to whom GOD is dead, and the heavens are dark, no pity for those whose life is a flight from pursuing Fate into the grim arms of 'the last enemy,' no longing to seek and to save the lost, how can there be either love of GOD or 'enthusiasm of humanity'? No Christian Society gives any adequate expression of its essential character, unless from its heart goes forth some message of healing and entreaty to its neighbourhood; and it is but a selfish membership that looks coldly on such evangelising work."

Of this work there are two main types, that of our Domestic Missions, based upon the ideal of ministry in the homes of the neglected poor, and that of such wide appeal beyond the borders of the churches, as is aimed at in these theatre services. Of this latter kind of effort Dr. MARTINEAU wrote in the same letter :—

"I remember nothing more cheering in the contemporary history of our churches than the admirable experiments of Mr. BEARD in Liverpool, and more recently of Mr. HOPPS in Leicester, for extending the circle of religious sympathy to classes that too rarely feel its embrace. From my heart I honour the faith and courage evinced in these efforts, and wonder what we have been about that they have not sooner been born within us, and more widely wakened us to our duty."

With these words of Dr. MARTINEAU's we will recall another well-known utterance of his closest friend and brother in the ministry in Liverpool. It was in 1859 that the Rev. JOHN HAMILTON THOM preached a sermon on the missionary project of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, to which, when it was published, he gave the title "A Religion, Not a Theology, the Want of the Times." In that sermon he said :—

"Our ideas of the administration of religion are too much shut up within congregational conditions. To make men religious, we think only of organising them into such societies as this. That may be the end, but it will not be the beginning. Men may be quite open to spiritual influences, if they are brought to bear upon them, who are quite averse to fixed forms and periodical habits, and all deliberate seeking of that which yet they would welcome if it came. There is something of superstition in our feeling, as if religion consisted in the supporting of churches or in church-membership; for it will often consist in a feeling to which this will seem too much of a limitation; and at all events, it is clear that it is not in this way that the working classes are, in the first place, to be made religious, for you cannot organise what does not exist.

"I have seen in Rome a monk of the preaching order emerge into the sunlight from one of the numerous churches in the neighbourhood of the Capitol, into whose open doors as you look from the outer brilliance the depth of the shadow seems dark as night, and with a few attendants bearing an elevated cross pass through the dense populations of the narrow streets that surround the Forum. First one and then another follow him, until by the time he has reached the Coliseum a vast crowd is in his train. There, in the centre of the mighty amphitheatre, with thousands upon thousands grouped around him, he drops the priest and the theologian, and speaks with that direct earnestness of spiritual things which never reaches its height except when the speaker is in the presence of the naked majesty of men, and is looking into faces on which are depicted only the stern and solemn realities of life and nature; and when the throngs break up they carry away a spiritual impression, a new sentiment of GOD and of existence, which they never would have received but for the living invitation that called them there. Some substitute for this agency we must find in this country, for the great class that have now no living relations with religion; it is plain that we cannot begin with Church-membership."

Could there be a nobler ideal for our preachers to the people? And for all helpers alike, and for our people as a whole, in face of such efforts, we will add the warning and the encouragement of this further passage from the same sermon:—

"We may satisfy ourselves of this truth—that a contracted sphere of operation implies a languid centre, an unenterprising soul—that a Church that has not faith enough to set its heart, and stake its fortunes, on great deeds of love, will never provide a religion for human nature—will never be acknowledged by any large number of men as their nursing mother, their highest encourager on earth of the endeavours that GOD'S Spirit prompts—and that when it has served its temporary purpose, it must pass away, and yield its place to some nobler representative of CHRIST. Any Church must perish, and deserves to perish, that does not occupy the hearts of its disciples with great projects. It dies because it does not ennoble men's lives, nor employ their energies, nor feed the highest of all appetites, the hunger and thirst of the soul for service and sacrifice."

To our churches the appeal of a special ministry to the neglected poor in our Domestic Missions is constant, and now comes this further appeal, in London and in Manchester for a new act of faith, in ministry to the unfriended, in demonstrations of the joy and the true helpfulness of a sincere religious life. Let it touch the imagination and kindle an ardent zeal in brotherly willingness to help, that our churches may not be proved unworthy of their call to this service.

THE REVIVED INTEREST IN MEDIÆVAL RELIGION.*

BY THE REV. PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A.

A RECENT literary critic has said that what is generally in our minds when we speak of mediæval conceptions is something which did not take definite shape until the twelfth century. However this may be, it is certainly true that what is in my own mind when I speak of the revived interest in mediæval religion is the form of Christianity that the twelfth century prepared, that the thirteenth century expressed in life, in architecture, and in philosophy, and to which the opening of the fourteenth century gave deathless poetic expression. Francis of Assisi, the Schoolmen, the perfect French cathedrals, and Dante's Comedy, are the representatives of the religious ideas which appear to me to have acquired fresh force during the last twenty years, and to constitute an essential factor in the religious life of our own day.

That age and our own.

Now, I am fully aware that every student is in danger of laying undue stress upon the analogies of any two periods of history or fields of inquiry with which he may chance to be more or less familiar; but, nevertheless, I find it difficult to believe that I am mistaken in tracing our revived sympathy with the religious utterances of the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries to certain fundamental similarities between that age and our own. Then as now a vast inrush of fresh intellectual material constituted a challenge to the accepted and traditional ideas of religion. Christian teaching was called on to revise and re-construct its own fundamental constitution, and, at the same time, to preserve its spiritual continuity. If there was to be peace and not war between faith and knowledge, Christian teachers must develop aspects of the traditional beliefs which might embrace the new intellectual life and amalgamate with it.

When, alike from the West and the East, through translations from the Arabic on the one side and translations direct from the Greek on the other, the science and philosophy of Aristotle and of the Greek and Arabic astronomers were thrown open to the Christian scholars of Central Europe, the fundamental problems that presented themselves to the Christian consciousness were closely analogous to those that have come upon us within the last fifty years.

Ideas to be Harmonised.

Roughly speaking the task of the Schoolmen was to effect a union between Aristotelianism and the fundamental truths, as they conceived them, of Christianity; much as the problem of our own day has been to find the formula of harmony between physical science and the doctrine of evolution on the one hand, and what we conceive to be the ultimate spiritual realities on the other hand. In neither case was or is it possible to sacrifice either the newly-acquired wealth of knowledge (or at least of intellectual conceptions), or the old cherished spiritual realities; and in neither case was or is a mere eirenicon to be thought of as final. Religion must live, not in spite of knowledge but supported by it; there must be not a reconciliation but an assimilation between that which is most intellectually unassailable and that which is most vitally significant in our thought and experience.

Doctrine of the Soul.

The ground on which the conflict seemed most direct and most inevitable, then as now, belonged not so much to the domain of theology proper as of anthropology. To any doctrine of the human soul as an independent entity, severed on the one hand from the natural order of things and on the other hand from the ultimate divine ground of being, Aristotelianism lends itself no more readily than do modern evolutionary theories. The Aristotelian doctrine of the soul, or life, has within itself two hardly reconcilable factors both of which reappear in the thought of our own day, but neither of which seems capable of easy reconciliation with the Christian doctrine of an imperishable human personality, created with each human individual.

Aristotle's Doctrine of Life.

Aristotle's general doctrine of life, like that of Auguste Comte, or, I suppose, of Thomas Huxley, is that we are to accept the vital phenomena which certain forms of matter exhibit, exactly as we are to accept the physical phenomena which other forms of matter exhibit. If this line of thought were consistently followed out we should have to say that just as a tree may be alive or dead, and when alive presents a group of vital phenomena which it does not present when dead, so a living man presents a group of vital phenomena, transcending those of the plant. But we should no more conceive of the vital principle, or soul, in man as a thing separable from him and capable of independent existence, than we should so conceive of the "life" of a tree. As, when a tree dies, it has ceased to exhibit the phenomena of life, and we do not ask whether its individualised life exists, as an entity released from its trunk and branches, so neither should we ask, when a man's body ceases to exhibit vital phenomena, what has become of the detached life of the individual man. This, I say, would be the result of a consistent working out of one side of Aristotle's teaching with regard to the soul; and we are perfectly familiar with it in modern times.

Another Aspect.

But there is another aspect of the Aristotelian doctrine of the soul, to which again we find analogies in modern thought, not this time on the scientific side, in the narrower sense of the term, but on the philosophic. Consciousness is, after all, the only thing of which we have direct knowledge; and metaphysically, the conception of mind as a function of matter is a grotesque self-contradiction, for it is explaining the known by the unknown. When we try to give ourselves an account of the ultimate base of things, we must base it rather on the fact of consciousness than on the hypothesis of an unknown something external to consciousness, which acts upon it. We are therefore compelled to formulate our ultimate philosophy of being in terms of consciousness; yet our own consciousness had a beginning, is intermittent, and appears to wane as the body shrivels. Therefore, since we postulate an abiding reality, and since consciousness is the only reality of which we have direct knowledge, we conceive of an abiding consciousness as the ultimate basis of things. This consciousness is the Aristotelian nous, swirls or vortices of which, so to speak (I am not now using Aristotelian phraseology), seem to focus themselves upon and touch the organic animal frame, and by contact with it to create our transient personalities.

* A Paper presented to the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Amsterdam, Thursday, September 3. Mr. Wicksteed did not read his paper, but both in Dutch and English spoke of the substance of it.

Thoughts and Thinkers.

We have consciousness and personality, then, when our animal frame has found its mysterious point of contact with Thought itself; and when this contact is broken, Thought abides, Thought is the Thinker, but our transient individual personality has vanished with the shifting of the point of contact which constituted it. There is then an eternal element in man, separable from his bodily frame, but that eternal element is not a permanently detached spiritual entity, and the human personality is not permanent. This, I take it, is, broadly speaking, Aristotelianism, and in any case it is the Averroistic interpretation of Aristotle which the Schoolmen fought. Surely it is needless to dwell on the closeness of the analogy between the situation they had to meet and that which confronts the modern theologian.

The Schoolmen's Protest.

The Schoolmen faced the problem boldly on both sides. They elaborated from Aristotle's teaching a very sharp distinction between that part of the soul, or life, which is organic to the human frame, and that part which has not bodily organ and is essentially eternal. This latter consisted essentially in the power to apprehend abstract or general truths, and the power to recognise the spiritually good and beautiful, together with the developed self-consciousness. All the lower range of faculties, including memory, judgment, and so forth, being common to the higher brutes, were organic to the animal frame and constituted no separable entity. The soul, as an entity, endowed with the higher gifts, was a separate creation. It was breathed into the animal frame at the due moment, and it then absorbed into itself the lower vital phenomena.

Thus, on this side, the domain of the immaterial, directly created, soul was fenced off from that of the naturally propagated organic frame, with its range of vital phenomena. And so far there was little difficulty in making Aristotle the support of Christian doctrine.

Self and the Eternal.

Far more formidable were the difficulties presented by the other aspect of Aristotle's teaching. The Schoolmen were themselves mystics, and there is an aspect of all mysticism under which the individual consciousness seems to lapse into the universal consciousness and to lose its separate existence. Bernard himself speaks of the rapt soul as being fused into the consciousness of God as the glowing iron is fused into the furnace, and lapsing completely out of itself into God. Now, Averroism deliberately teaches that the spiritual element in man is continuous with "spirit" as a cosmic principle, and that the defining personality imposed on human consciousness is organic not spiritual. Against this the Schoolmen contend with all their might, defending the human personality as eternal and refusing to make any terms with their adversary.*

The point of interest to us is the marked indications in recent psychology of a reversion to Aristotelianism or Averroism, and the uncertainty of the attitude of modern theologians towards it. All that we hear of the "subliminal consciousness" of the "more of the same kind" with which the human consciousness is in contact, of the "conjunct self" and the bee-like "esprit de la huche" that takes collective possession of communities or assemblies, seems to point towards the breaking down of the sharp definition of personality, and the reversion to a conception of shifting and transient foci of consciousness, and of transient individual floating, as it were, in a permanent element of spirit.

Mystic Element Secure.

I know that this is not the view taken by many modern investigators, and that on all sides attempts are being made to re-establish and confirm the doctrine of personal immortality upon these very facts or speculations. I have little right to judge, but I cannot help thinking that in this matter the Schoolmen had keener sight than the modern thinkers to whom I refer; and that these latter are leaning upon a reed that will pierce their hands. But the essential point to which I desire to call attention is the close analogy of the situation then and now. How long present tendencies will continue to dominate our thought who can say? But it seems safe to say that, whatever they are worth, they point to a solution somewhere within the limits of Averroism on the one side and the teaching of Albertus and Thomas on the other. There is nothing that I can see in the vital movements of Thought to-day which points to even a temporary triumph of merely materialistic explanations of consciousness. The sense of an eternal element in man, nay, the mystic sense of union with the Eternal Spirit, seems to be not only secure from disturbance, but secure of support, by the tendencies of contemporary thought. Some will demand a hope for more, or, at least, other assurance than this; none need fear that this will be threatened by the intellectual forces now actively in the field.

The Doctrine of God.

The analogy between the problem of the thirteenth century and the problem of our own day becomes even more striking when we turn to Theology proper. The religion of Aristotle, like the religion of Evolution, had a sublimity and grandeur of its own which made it a purifier of anthropomorphic conceptions and a challenge to what, after all, had been something of a clan religion to raise itself to true universalism. But with this came the inevitable tendency to Pantheism. God, conceived as the cosmic principle, as the immaterial background of all material things, as the intelligible which lies behind all sensibilia, the point (in Aristotelian phrase) upon which all heaven and nature hang, the unmoved source of motion, the abiding ground of all succession and alteration—God, as conceived, exalts, purifies, and braces all our spiritual conceptions. But this great unifying conception of unconditioned being seems to give us a Deity who includes in himself everything—except God. On the other hand, the close sense of personal communion with the Supreme, the warmth of personal devotion, which breathes through the Psalms of Israel and the hymns and prayers of Christendom, seems both to tell of and to demand a featured character or personality in the Supreme; and this, in its turn, seems to condition the absolute and unconditioned; and to leave us with the support of a great fellow-subject under the eternal laws; but looking beyond our family deity into space, and asking "what then is that supreme underlying, unconditioned power by which even our God Himself is bound?"

Personality in the Eternal.

The attempt to harmonise the intellectual demand for an unconditioned first cause, with the spiritual experience of a divine personality, is the hinge upon which the theology of the thirteenth century turns, even as it does of our own. The problem is focussed in the closing scenes of Dante's Paradiso, where the Deity is revealed to the seer, first as the whole sum of things, all beings and all their relations fused together into one, the scattered leaves of the universe bound into a single volume, wherein all things are seen, not in their fragmentary imperfection, but as a perfect and related whole; yet this vision of all things is no more than a single limpid flame, the flame of love. But as he gazes into the depths of this light and sees the three interlaced circles which symbolise the Deity, Dante perceives the symmetry of the self-contained circle combining itself mysteriously with the features of humanity. One of the three circles, while still remaining itself, becomes a human countenance; and with supreme effort the poet strives to comprehend the thing he actually sees—the union of the intellectually incompatible, the identification of featured character with unconditioned self-existence, and all-containing symmetry. Then, in a flash of insight wherein his soul transcends itself, he sees the thing he sought, but may bring back no word of it to earth, for human language cannot embody the highest experiences of the human soul.

Our Own Problem.

It hardly needs insisting on that this is essentially the problem of our own day. All our modern philosophical and scientific conceptions tend to purify our religion from anthropomorphism, and to give it sublimity; and all the deepest spiritual experience seems to tell us of a kinship of the defined, limited, conditioned, personal, human soul with God. The two conceptions can hardly be formulated without intellectual contradiction, but the degree to which the religious imagination can practically confine them seems to give the measure of the strength and the elevation of our religious life.

* We have nothing here to do with their attempts to prove that Averroism was not only untrue but un-Aristotelian; nor with the support that they attempted to derive from the doctrine of the resurrection of the body.

Need we wonder then that the poem which gives us the ripe outcome of the spiritual life of those to whom the religion of Aristotle and the religion of the Bible were equally vital, feeds and strengthens our spiritual life to-day? Need we wonder that the cathedrals wherein the "word of God became stone" to men nurtured in that same atmosphere appeal to us as, perhaps, they have never appealed to any other age save that which produced them? Need we wonder that the scholastic philosophy itself is ceasing to be a by-word, and that more and more it is coming to speak to us once again?

Greek Thought Assimilated.

We have been dwelling on the points of similarity between two periods. It would, of course, be equally easy to dwell upon the differences. But if I am right in my general estimate, it has been no mere curious exercise to find points of deep analogy. I think we may sum up what we have so far observed by saying that when first the study of Aristotle revived in Europe, it threatened to bring about a conflict between faith and thought, and was accordingly suspected or resisted by the theologians; but presently the truly religious element in Greek thought, was instinctively felt, and Christian mysticism, that is to say, the direct power of vision, the sense of Deity and of eternity, were ultimately not encumbered but quickened and purified by the stimulus of Greek thought.

And this the more easily because in the early centuries Christian thought had felt the influence of Plato. Though Plato was little read in the Middle Ages, there was a great deal of Platonism in the Christian tradition; and, perhaps, still more in the Christian attitude of mind. And so the Christian Aristotelians unconsciously Platonised; and it need not be said how much this habit of mind facilitated their task of "Christianising Aristotle."

Besides, the Timæus was still read in a Latin translation; and it is in the Timæus that the Platonic doctrine of Eternity may be read, a doctrine upon which I have barely touched here,* but which enters into the very tissue of the thirteenth century religion, and, if I mistake not, is beginning to enter again into our own.

Divine Immanence.

Ultimately, therefore, it was mysticism, the present vision of God, the present sense of eternity, upon which the thirteenth century was thrown back, and upon which our age and every age which finds its intellectual traditions disturbed, must be thrown back. The thirteenth century reached intellectual equilibrium, and we are still in intellectual chaos. The solution then reached can never help us; but the sense of the immanence of God on which all solutions must rest was there and is here, and, therefore, that age speaks to this.

Heaven and Hell.

And this same conception of immanence is carried by Dante at least into the sphere of Ethics. Dante is the poet of hell, purgatory, and heaven, yet there is no writer or thinker who enables us more fully to enter into the spirit of a mediæval story* that treats all belief in future rewards and punishments as ethically and religiously irrelevant. Someone met an old woman with a chafing dish in one hand and a cruse of water in the other, and asked her what she was about. She answered, "I am going to put out hell with this water and burn up heaven with this fire." "Why will you do that?" "Because I would have man serve God not for fear of hell, nor for hope of heaven, but for love of Him." Dante, more than any other, shows us that hell is inherent and immanent in the evil choice; that purification is inherent and immanent in the sense of having made a baser, and now making a nobler choice; that heaven is inherent and immanent in the love of things eternal and essentially lovable. It is strange, but I think true, that the period of history which seems to throw the whole stress and weight of its thought and speculation beyond the grave, and to regard this world as wholly corrupt and negligible, except as the scene of discipline, speaks most directly and unmistakably to our age of the immanence of ethical good and evil, and of the eternal quality of our temporal experiences.

Present Spiritual Facts.

To the mediævals the earth was the centre of the universe, but their minds persistently turned away from it. Any light of God that came to it must come from outside and must take them away from it. To us, the earth is physically insignificant, a mere cosmic grain; yet to us it is the earth rather than the heavens that must become the garb of Deity, our hopes and longings reach forth into the future of the earth, we pray and work for the Kingdom of God on earth, it is in the life of earth that we must feel and know the light of God; and from this whirling speck in illimitable vast rays out our consciousness of Deity to fill—nay, rather to annihilate— all space. But as we carry with us God, and eternity, and heaven, so we carry with us hell. The deep abysmal mystery remains. It seemed for a moment that by dismissing from our minds that hideous dream of an eternal torture-house beyond the grave we had got rid of hell. But it is not so. When we challenge the universe we are not to be put off by a proposal to shift the venue and an offer to "justify the ways of God to men" by an appeal to restitutions hereafter. Our faith must bear the burden of the contradiction between the God we know and the misery and sin we see; and that faith may be strengthened by the faith of those in whose minds the very flames of hell paled in the light of heaven. No disbelief in a heaven to come could quench the joy of the heaven that is to them that love God in sincerity, and no disbelief in a hell to come can exorcise the hell that is, wherever there is sin or dehumanising suffering and wrong. But the mediæval religion that quickens our sense of Eternity teaches us that evil has not the eternal note in it, and the preachers of an eternal hell therefore inspire us with fresh courage to fight against evil. Heaven is, and shall be; hell is, but shall not be.

Francis of Assisi.

And here, I believe, we touch upon the true meaning of one of the great revivals of our time—I mean the revived love of Francis of Assisi. It is not his asceticism, but his pity for suffering combined with his joy in life that captivates us. There is much unreality, much sentimentality in our cult of Francis; but there is a kernel of sincerity in it, for we feel that Francis attacks hell upon every side. The grasping spirit that would urge us to appropriate the sources of blessing to ourselves is rebuked by Francis, and divine streams of ministering love and pity flow forth from his lips, and both alike are joy more than sacrifice. He teaches us to give life more freely and to enjoy it more fully, and he teaches us to dissociate the joy of life from the multitude of the things that we possess. He "simplifies life" indeed! for he helps us to care for life itself more than for the adjuncts of life. "Is not the life more than meat, and the body more than raiment?"

Francis and Wordsworth:

In the most characteristic and passionate utterances of Wordsworth, the modern religious poet par excellence, we hear little about heaven. In Dante the earth and its tender beauty is dwelt on only by the yearning souls in hell. In Purgatory and Paradise it is only spoken of with contempt. Yet Dante and Wordsworth interpret each other, and in the mind of him who loves them both interpenetrate one another, for both are mystics, both have the sense of eternity.

The love and the pity of Francis may live again in Tolstoy, but it is in Wordsworth that his joy lives again, and his deep conviction—nay, his passionate sense—that the highest life and the highest joy require neither elaborate apparatus nor high intellectual gifts, nor anything that might not be within the reach of all, did we know the true values of things and had we love.

The immanence of God, the present possibility of touching the life eternal, the essentially indestructible nature of good, the essential possibility of eliminating all poisonous evil from life, these are the beliefs, or rather the experienced facts, upon which all religion is built. The revived interest in mediæval religion means a quickened sense of these things. The believers in an eternal hell are amongst our great inspirers in our dauntless hope to prevail against hell, and in our absolute knowledge of the reality of heaven. "God whispered them in the ear," and they "knew." They help us to hear that whisper too, and when we hear it we too "know."

THAT which we are we shall teach, not voluntarily, but involuntarily. Thoughts come into our minds by avenues which we never left open, and thoughts go out of our minds through avenues which we never voluntarily opened. Character teaches over our head.—Emerson.

---

* I have attempted elsewhere to show something of the significance of this doctrine for the thirteenth and the nineteenth centuries alike.

* Recorded, I believe, by many mediæval authors or collectors, but known to me from Joinville's "Life of St. Louis."

THE FOREST.

THE weather lately has hardly been of the kind to tempt the holiday rambler to search out the shadiest depths of the woods where to fling himself at full length on the ground as a relief from the heat. Yet, rain as it may, the paths of the forest are firm, and to a less passive spirit of contemplation the magic of lights and shadows, the silent conclave of stems, the mystery of interwoven boughs have much to tell. The trees of the earth have always had much to tell. Their dominion began long before ours, and will last, it may be, long after ours has ended.

Trees in the Bible.

The Bible has much to say significant of trees. "The tree of the field is man's life"; "There is hope of a tree if it be cut down." Of wisdom it is said that "she is a tree of life to them that lay hold on her"; "Where the tree falleth there shall it be"; "Every good tree bringeth forth good fruit." At the restoration of Israel, so the poet sang, "all the trees of the field shall clap their hands," and in the vision of the days of peace and brotherhood that are yet to be, the dreamer dreamed of every man sitting under his own vine and under his own fig tree; while of the great nation, the nation blessed and exalted by God to fulfil his purpose, the prophet Ezekiel speaks as "fair in his greatness : : : : the cedars could not hide him . . . . nor was any tree in the garden of God like unto him in his beauty"; "I made him fair by the multitude of his branches."

But few Flowers.

In curious contrast with this abundance of green trees, in the prospect which lay before every Hebrew writer and moralist, is the absence of flowers. Even more significant than this numerical disproportion is the thought generally associated with flower and tree respectively by the Biblical writers. Flowers are, for the most part, simply frail creatures which, by their speedy fading, point the moral of the brevity of life. Just now and again we have indeed a cheerful and healthy delight in their beauty with no morbid reflections ensuing, as when the singer in the Canticles welcomes the spring with its blossoms and its birds, and when Jesus bade men stop in the midst of their important transactions of eating and drinking and getting a living, to consider the lilies of the field whose tender beauty rivalled the glory of King Solomon. But these are almost solitary instances of the glad and simple appreciation of flowers for their own sake. If we are to judge by what we find in the Bible, it was trees, not flowers, on which the Hebrews set their affection.

Not even in Eden.

This is a point which was not likely to escape so exact and thoughtful a reader of the Bible as John Ruskin; and he draws attention to what is perhaps the most remarkable illustration of the Biblical preference for foliage over flower. There were no flowers even in the Garden of Eden. Trees in plenty, and among them the fateful trees of life and of the knowledge of good and evil; but the flowers of Paradise were unknown until John Milton planted his thornless roses and all the varied blossoms which "breathed their morning incense" to their Creator. But this is English, not Oriental.

Wealth in Trees.

How different is it in the case of the trees, for "the tree of the field," as the Deuteronomist said, "is man's life." And, considering to what extent reliance was placed on the fig and the olive and the date for daily food, on the timber for roofing the home and building the ship, on the spreading shadow of the bough for protection from the terrible heat of the sun, there is little wonder that the tree was called the life of man, and that the chosen emblem of the righteous man is that of a tree growing on the bank of a river; and that a later author should set in the midst of his heavenly city a tree of life whose leaves should be for the healing of the nations. Was it to be wondered at that there were those who, from time to time, could not be restrained from letting their joy and gratitude run to irrational and even demoralising limits when they worshipped their groves to the neglect of Him whose power alone creates every green thing. Then prophets were needed to cry shame on the oaks which their fellow countrymen desired.

But, after all, it is not the affection of ancient Jews for their forests and orchards which have long ago, even the most enduring of them, mouldered into the soil, which most concerns us. It is our own trees. Here, in perfectness of beauty and stateliness, is the English summer's pride of leaf and bough.

What they do for us.

And do we not owe much to the trees of the field and the forest? Independently of the goodly products of the orchard, how much comes to us by grace as well as by utility. Not that the bare utility of our vegetation is limited to the food it produces for us. Far from it. The trees uphold the soil on our hills, defend the tenderer herbage from winds that would blast and wreck it, and modulate our capricious climate. They draw the bounty of the clouds. They take no small part in the building of our houses and in the furnishing of them for our comfortable habitation. We are munificently blessed with the service of the trees of the earth.

But there is a higher consideration than that of practical utility, and the trees have still more benign transactions with us than to negotiate with the skies for the watering of our gardens and to find us seats and shelter. They awaken thoughts in our minds. Other thoughts they banish from our minds. They weave affections between themselves and us. They call up voices of veneration and prayer to the spirit which is their strength and beauty and our intelligence and virtue. They are "the trees of the Lord," for not only are they His planting, but they are ministers of His to do His will, helping to lift the minds of the children to the Father.

Eyes to See.

Lockhart tells us that Sir Walter Scott was once entertaining at Abbotsford a young girl friend from the Orkneys. There are no trees there, so Scott thought to give his guest the greatest pleasure by taking her to see some of the stateliest woodland in the Lowlands. But his expectations were not realised. Used only to the companionship of the sea, the girl could not understand these weird creatures. She felt no sense of fellowship with them, complained that they had no voice, and were as dumb, dead things around her.

The instincts begotten in us by other associations and by other comradeship than that of the restless waters have admitted us to something of the religious awe, to a measure of the gratitude and delight which a vision of trees gave to the Hebrews. They are harps to the winds, and harbourage to the birds, and friends of man. Like watchmen they stand in our hedgrows guarding the farmland. Long-lived and faithful, we wondered at their human likeness as children, we nestled at their feet, we climbed their mystery of branches, and when the toil of life has tired us out, we will nestle among their roots while the birds sing praises above.

Their Social Virtue.

There is a strong bond of fellowship in trees; they are sociable; they tend to group themselves together. They show us the advantages of collective being in mutual protection. They teach us the right and beneficent use of strength, how noble it is to have the might of a giant if we do not use our might as giants are wont; but, as Ezekiel says, to be "fair in greatness." Even as the burliest trunk does not repel the frailest moss, even as the bough which would uphold a church roof is not too great to be the squirrel's bridge and the wood-pigeon's house, the big brain and the broad heart, the strong arm and the long purse shall find honour if they lose pride in simplest service, homely obedience, patient self-surrender. It is when nature's life becomes embodied in trees that it attains grandeur. It is the trees of the forest which have taught us the only design in which a Christian church can be built to the glory of God. The trees of the forest have taught us to pray. "Take off your hats, boys," said Emerson, as he rambled with a party of young friends into the woods, "for a spirit dwells here." If the solemn pillars and the great shadow roof of the forest do not impress us with this fact, I know not what else will.

Emblems of Vigour.

"The trees of the Lord," said the Psalmist, "are full of sap," or, in the R.V., "are satisfied." They are full of sap. They are at the maximum of their growth and glory of living foilage. Nature has made them all she could, and if we may attribute something like our consciousness to them, they may well be "satisfied"—satisfied as work well and completely done gives satisfaction; satisfied with largeness of life and soundness of health; satisfied as God at the creation, when viewing His own work He pronounced that it was all very good. In short, the trees are at this season an emblem of triumphant vigour and health, an exhibition of the union of sturdiness and loveliness which is attainable by creatures much lowlier than ourselves through life being led entirely according to Nature's wisdom. Such is our human state and comeliness with a life of air and daylight and simple food—with all the industry required of us by duty done, not shirked; with a mind not ashamed to abide wholesomely near to the earth and its kind; a life in which the body is sacred as well as the soul, and restful pleasure known without gross indolence or contemptible frivolity. A healthiness of being which should lay hold of religion and make it real and naturally desirable.

Health in Body and Soul.

No one has striven to promote this all-round sacredness, this vigour of faculty, this fulness of being, more gallantly than the late Dr. Almond, the deservedly famous headmaster of Loretto. This is how he looked at things. In one of his sermons he is speaking of the religious training alike of body and mind, so as to render the most entire service to God, and says, "Why, oh why, cannot there be a holy alliance between the athlete and the Christian, an alliance against the common enemies of both, against intemperance and indolence, and dissipation, and effeminacy and æsthetic voluptuousness and heartless cynicism, and all the unnatural and demoralising elements in our social life? Why will some take so narrow a view of the true aims of physical training, that they bound their horizon by the vision of prizes and athletic honours, not seeing that in themselves and by themselves these things are as worldly and as worthless as unsanctified wealth or knowledge, or literature or art? Why will others, again, who would not willingly break any of God's commandments, who would not pass a day without prayer, who believe and trust in a risen Saviour, why will they not regard sedentary habits, and softness of living and feebleness that might have been strength, and delicacy that might have been hardihood, as physical sins? Why will they not devote to the service of the kingdom of heaven blood as pure, limbs as supple, condition as fit, energies as buoyant, as if they were aspirants for a championship, and so do something to wipe out the reproach that religion is a feeble, emasculated thing, good enough for sick-beds and solemn functions, but out of place amid the strong, rough work, and the more manly joys of life?"

It is just that kind of sermon that these stately forest trees, vigorous, satisfied, full of sap and buried in leafage, are preaching to us here. Healthfulness in body and soul. Healthfulness at once our glory and our duty, departure from it our sin,—sturdiness of character, energy of life, decision of action, beauty of mind, liberality of loving kindness, and depth of repose.

H. M. LIVENS.

BAND OF HOPE UNION CONFERENCE

THE United Kingdom Band of Hope Union has, this week, held its autumnal conference at Portsmouth in conjunction with the Hampshire and Isle of Wight Band of Hope Union, and a large number of active and earnest temperance workers have been brought together from all parts of the country. After a series of local conferences in neighbouring towns, the general assembly was inaugurated last Saturday afternoon by a great demonstration of some 7,000 Band of Hope children in the United Service Men's Recreation Ground. Then followed a concert in the Royal Sailors' Rest, the scene of the activity of Miss Agnes E. Weston, LL.D., who has carried on here a most useful work amongst sailors of the Navy and mercantile marine.

Sunday was a very busy day. Advantage was taken of the presence of so many workers from distant places for a number of special services, sermons, and addresses in the various places of worship of all denominations, in which Unitarians took their part. Portsmouth was the home of John Pounds, the pioneer in ragged school work, whose shop in Highbury-street has been preserved as a memorial of his noble self-sacrifice by the Unitarians of the High-street Church, with which he was connected. At this church on Sunday special temperance sermons were preached morning and evening to good congregations by Mr. Rowland Hill, of Bedford. The Sunday-school was addressed in the afternoon by Mr. F. A. Edwards, F.R.G.S., who represents the National Unitarian Temperance Association at this conference. Miss M. A. Sale, of Northampton, and Mr. W. D. Fritchley, of Derby, addressed Sunday-schools connected with Congregational and Baptist churches. One of the best features of this Band of Hope movement, indeed, is the breaking down of theological barriers, and the union of all sections of the Christian Church for the common cause.

The united meetings were continued by breakfast meetings and conferences in the Town Hall, Portsmouth, on Monday and Tuesday, besides an evening reception and public meeting; and on Wednesday the scene of activity was removed to the Isle of Wight, where, after a brief visit to Newport, a conference and public meeting were held in the Town Hall, Ryde. On Thursday the proceedings of the united party concluded with a garden party at the Mount, Bishopstoke, by invitation of Mr. T. A. Cotton, J.P., C.C., and Mrs. Cotton, and a conference at Southampton. To-day (Saturday) a conference of day-school teachers from all parts of Hampshire and the Isle of Wight is to be held.

FROM an article on Methodism in Scotland in the Methodist Times, it appears that the circuit system, as it obtains in England, does not suit the atmosphere of Scotland at all. Each church expects to have its own minister. For fifty-two places of worship there are forty-three ministers and six lay pastors. Hence the local preacher has hardly a chance to develop; and hence the churches are more costly to their members than the average Methodist churches of England. Several counties have not a Methodist church, and the ministers who are working in Scotland feel greatly the difficulty of isolation.

These particulars are interesting as illustrating some of the problems of our own work in Scotland; and, further, as showing that even the most matured and most complete organisations for religious work have to undergo modifications in adapting themselves to a people whose habits of life and thought differ from theirs among whom the organisation grew. If the different churches could take frank counsel together and trust each other, what mutual help might be rendered. But the hour is not yet come.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

PASSIVE RESISTANCE.

SIR,—On the 12th inst., you published an extract from a sermon of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong explaining his hesitation to resist the Education Rate. I confess I do not understand how so many of "our people" seem to excuse themselves in not keeping certain promises, often enough loudly published, to go into the vineyard. Some haze seems to come in the way, and I venture to ask for space to try to blow away some of this unfortunate fog.

It is not quite easy to determine exactly what Mr. Armstrong's "natural bent" or "strong temptation" to resist may be. I presume the desire and the inclination to promise to go.

He seems, however, to offer "sectarian animosity" and "aversion to sacerdotal hierarchy" and "temper of self-assertion" as objections to be kept from biassing his judgment, and even to fear, that "Nonconformist intolerance" or "political resentment" may be secretly colouring his own scruples.

I have no skill in verbal encounter, nor any in what often appears to one subtle sophistication, with only too seductive fluency, to impose views of my own rather than to help others to realise for themselves.

It must be allowed that in many cases a determined Independent has grounded his resistance on his conscientious objection to be made to contribute towards the maintenance of education in so-called religious matters under the charge of the clerics of the self-seeking hierarchy of the English Church, or the subtle intrigues of a Roman alien priest-craft; and it may very possibly be with excited sectarian animosity and Nonconformist intolerance.

In the present case, while there is no purpose of interfering with the freedom of any neighbour in the pursuit of his own course in such matters, there is a resolute resistance of all Pharisaic compulsory proselytising of children in schools to be supported by the community or denominational administration of popular public schools or finances.

And, again, when we recollect that the Act of Parliament of last year, carried by a weak and unprincipled Government, by means of a menial majority, the offspring of electoral chicanery and vulgar appeal of the coarsest kind to the lowest passions of our constituencies, we may well resent the contempt for the civil and religious liberty of our people and our constitution, and claim the right to manage our own schools and to administer the funds which we delight to contribute for their support ourselves.

Political resentment of such a policy of outrage is simply the pressing duty of every Englishman.

I do not doubt that Mr. Armstrong's heart's blood is as red as ours in these respects; and, with regard to this Act which has been passed in defiance of the principles and law of our country, challenge him to declare, as we do, with heart and voice and at every sacrifice, that we will not pay this tyrannical, this shameful Ship money!

That is all.

R. D. DARBISHIRE.

September 17, 1903.

P.S.—I am asked what I mean by promises to go into the vineyard, which appear to me to have been most sadly broken here as too often elsewhere.

I meant to refer to the pledges to faith and principle which our fathers gave in the Ejectment. Pledges to civil and religious liberty, which truly are less talked about nowadays except in fashionable oratorical displays, which indeed never seem to move seriously speakers, or to influence hearers.

I know well how much I shall appear to suffer under misapprehension, and I do not even wish to appear to judge any who are so much wiser and better than myself; but only to represent the impressions on my own unskilled layman's mind of what I hear and see.

THE CONFERENCE APPEAL.

SIR,—Is the Unitarian still a sane, temperate body? or does it want to "copy" other dissenting people, and create a "representative" body? What for? unless to over-ride the freedom of the individual?

Now we are asked to get a hireling to pick up money and grievances, and make inquiries, fiscal or otherwise, destroying our individuality. Presently, we copy the Wesleyan experience meeting, and by excitement raise funds. And the glory of this is that it is to be "representative." No man or woman is many-sided enough to represent our free congregations of Units. It is an insane attempt to follow the fashion, that of the sects.

May God strengthen our individual souls to resist the attempt to weld us into a sect.

STEPHEN S. TAYLER.

Streatham, September 22, 1903.

MACEDONIA.

SIR,—Many of our ministers have raised their voices, and many congregations have made their protests, against the revolting proceedings of the Turkish Government in Macedonia, but cannot something be done to give fuller and more effective expression to the sentiment of the denomination? If the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed and others of our Unitarian leaders would take the initiative, they would be assured of abundant and earnest support.

HARRY E. HAYCOCK.

Chester, Sept. 23, 1903.

MANY of our friends, who were at Amsterdam, will regret to hear that the genial President of the International Council, Professor Oort, suffered from a serious accident on Sunday week, having fallen in alighting from a train, and injured his hip. Good progress towards recovery has been made, and last Monday our correspondent found Dr. Oort on the sofa in his study, and in excellent spirits, but it must be some weeks before he is able to lecture again.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Chester.—Harvest services conducted by the Rev. H. E. Haycock took place on Sunday, Sept. 20. The subject of the evening sermon was "The Harvest of Death in Macedonia." As usual the chapel was tastefully decorated, and collections were made for the City Infirmary. Preparations are being made for the winter's work, and, very shortly, the many activities of Church and school will be resumed.

Chichester. (Presentation.)—On Thursday, the 17th inst., a special Sunday-school social was held to take leave of Miss D. Morley, senior teacher, on her departure for University College, Southampton. The Rev. C. A. Hoddinott, on behalf of the teachers and scholars, made a presentation of a handsome and substantial leather writing-case, with accessories, and spoke with much appreciation of the services rendered by Miss Morley, who had been connected with the school as scholar and teacher from early childhood. Mr. Morley, on behalf of his daughter, gratefully acknowledged the gift.

Cullompton.—A most successful bazaar was held on Thursday, the 17th inst., in the well-arranged rooms recently erected by the Parish Council, the object being to effect certain structural and sanitary improvements in the chapel premises; and also, if possible, to provide a new organ in place of an instrument kindly presented many years ago by Sir Roland and Lady Wilson, and now probably to be removed to the school-room. At the opening of the bazaar the Rev. Jeffery Worthington was able to announce that, in response to their appeal in the spring for help to raise £70, a sum of £50 was already in hand. He then asked for £10, additional to the original estimate of £70, to provide for expenses. The result of the sales at the bazaar and since, however, is that about £88 has now been raised; and, if certain remaining articles are disposed of, over £90 will doubtless be secured. This success is most satisfactory in the case of an entirely working-class congregation. The account is not closed, and further contributions will enable a more efficient dealing with the needs of the quaint Cullompton Chapel and its warm-hearted people. The bazaar was opened by Mr. P. J. Worsley, of Clifton, treasurer of the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches, and a sympathetic message was read from the Rev. Walter Lloyd, of Gloucester, the President of the Union for the current year. Mr. Worsley alluded to the interesting fact that the original Western Unitarian Society was founded by a gathering at the private chapel of Bridwell Park, near Cullompton, when it was opened in 1792 by Dr. Toulmin, but of which only a few stones are now standing. The hall in which the bazaar was held was brilliant with colour, and the stall-holders of Cullompton were assisted by various ladies of Devon and Somerset; friends from Taunton and elsewhere also helped in the musical arrangements. The large gathering, indeed, included visitors from Bristol, Bridgwater, and Taunton, from Exeter, Crediton, and Tavistock, from the North Country, even from Canada and Australia. The minister and members of the Cullompton congregation are very grateful for the personal presence of friends from far and near, and for the support so generously given.

Edinburgh.—On Sunday last, Rev. R. B. Drummond preached in St. Mark's Chapel on the Macedonian massacres, and after service the following resolution was submitted to the congregation and unanimously adopted:—"That this congregation desires to express its approval of the statement of the Balkan Committee concerning the present situation in the near East, in so far as it suggests that the British Government should invite the other great Powers to immediate concerted action, with a view to putting an end to the present appalling state of things, and securing good government for the oppressed provinces."

Horsham.—The annual report of the Free Christian Church, lately issued, shows a record of steady work. The Sunday-school has rather more than held its ground, the winter evening lectures have been successful, the gymnasium has returned to its original quarters in the school-room, and the Museum Society reports progress. After evening service on Sunday week the representatives of the church who were at Amsterdam, made an interesting report of their experiences at the International meetings.

Leeds (Hunslet).—At the harvest services on September 20, the cantata, "A Day of Praise," was given in the afternoon, and in the evening the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, was the preacher. At a social meeting on the following evening the fruit and vegetables were disposed of, and the opportunity was taken of presenting a small sum of money, collected by one of the teachers, to Mr. Charles Lofthouse, as a token of affection and in recognition of his long and faithful services to the church for a period extending over thirty-seven years.

Manchester (Bradford).—The harvest services, at the Mill-street Free Church last Sunday, were full of encouragement. At evening service nearly 200 were present; the collections amounted to £2 7s. 6d., an advance on previous years.

Manchester District Association.—The regular series of visits to the churches was resumed, after a two months' vacation, on Saturday, the 12th inst., when members of the Governing Body and friends from nearly all the churches attended a service and a public meeting in the beautiful little chapel at Middleton. The service was conducted by Rev. A. Leslie Smith, of Hale, and the sermon preached by Rev. P. M. Higginson, from the text, "It is written, My house shall be called a house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of robbers." Tea followed the service, and then, as there was an attendance apparently larger than had been expected, it was deemed wise to hold the meeting in the chapel. A vice-president of the Association, Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood, took the chair, and in addition to his address, others were delivered by Revs. John Harrison, James Ruddle, and Mr. J. T. Taylor (Oldham). The attendances were 130 at the service and 150 at the meeting; and both were generally considered good. There was a holiday feeling in the air; the command of Young Days, greatest general had obviously not been relinquished; but there was a desire to get again into the movement which is doing so much to bring the members of the district churches into touch. Those who have had to do with the arrangements felt some degree of anxiety as to what the experience would be when a second session was begun, but their doubts were allayed, and they feel confident that a series of meetings even more successful than that of last winter will follow during the coming winter. There have been seen at the various meetings all, or nearly all, the familiar faces, but many not familiar have grown to be so, and in a wider sense than one excellent friend expressed, "you can tell just who will be there." Interest in the general work and life of our churches is being extended, and already the possibilities that lie open to those, who, while guarding their own independence, recognise the oneness of aim and aspiration in the associated churches, are being felt. The next service will be held at the Moss Side Unitarian Free Church on Saturday, October 10, when Rev. S. A. Steinthal will be the preacher.

Manchester (Oldham-road).—Harvest services were conducted on September 13 by the Rev. W. Reynolds, when there were good attendances afternoon and evening, and offerings of wild flowers were made by the children.

Shepton Mallet.—By the death of Mr. John Phillis, at the ripe age of 84, the Cowl-street congregation has lost its oldest trustee, and one of its most honoured members. Mr. Phillips was no ordinary man. He was the local authority on all geological and archæological matters, and the museum in the town originated with the gift of his own splendid private collection of fossils, minerals, and Roman remains. As a Freemason Mr. Phillis was widely known, and held some of the highest offices in that fraternity. He was one of the founders of the local lodge of the "Ancient Order of Druids," and was also vice-president of the "Natural History Society." He was a staunch Unitarian from conviction, having outgrown, in early manhood, the limits of his Wesleyan training. The funeral, on the last day of August, conducted by the Rev. L. T. Badcock, was attended by leading residents in the town and neighbourhood, and on the following Sunday evening a memorial service was held in Cowl-street Chapel.

Swansea.—It is with sorrow that we record the death of the senior member of the Unitarian Church—Mrs. Williams, of 11, Walters-road, who passed away in her 82nd year. She was a native of Swansea, and had been all her lifetime a member and constant attendant at the church until the last few weeks. Even during last winter she attended the sewing class which worked for charitable institutions in the town. She was a woman of strong intellect, and her sterling character endeared her to all who knew her. Her reminiscences of Unitarianism in the early part of the 19th century were very interesting. She was buried in the Swansea cemetery by the minister (Rev. W. Tudor Jones) on Wednesday, September 23.

Wolverhampton.—A sale of work in aid of the building fund of the new church was held in the school-room of All Souls' Church on Wednesday and Thursday, September 16 and 17. The first day the opening ceremony was courteously performed by the Mayor and Mayoress, Mr. and Mrs. Thorne, and on the second day by Mr. Frank Evers, J.P., of Stourbridge. The Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, and Rev. E. D. P. Evans, of Kidderminster, were among the friends present. A sacred concert was given in the church each evening, while hat-trimming, penny cleaning, and other competitions in the school-room were among the attractions provided. The result of the sale quite exceeded the expectations of the workers, nearly £50 being raised out of a sum of £75 required to pay off the debt on the new church building.

UNITARIANS visiting ABERYSTWYTH are requested to make themselves known to the Chairman of the Congregation, Mr. JOHNSON, Pier-street.

NEW LANTERN LECTURES ON PALESTINE AND WORDSWORTH COUNTRY.—Fee, One Guinea and Expenses.—For List apply to H. RIX, Limpsfield, Surrey.

MR. JOHN HARWOOD is prepared to give DRAMATIC RECITALS of two hours' duration to Societies connected with our own Churches and Schools, upon exceptional terms. Selections from Dickens's "Christmas Carol," "Cricket on the Hearth" (original adaptations), Shakspere, Colman, Sheridan, and other Authors; also a novel "Lecture," entitled "The Art of Public Recitation: its Humours and Difficulties—a Leaf from my own Experience," followed by one hour of illustrative Recitals.
Address, Fair View, Pendleton, Manchester.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK
Southampton Bldngs., Chancery Lane, London, W.C.
INVESTED FUNDS TEN MILLIONS.
CURRENT ACCOUNTS
2% Interest on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%
DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
2½% repayable on demand. 2½%
STOCKS AND SHARES
Purchased and sold for customers.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars free.
C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

DEATHS.

CUNLIFFE—On Sept. 21st, at 75, Bangalore-street, Putney, George Arthur, aged 4 months, son of Tom and Margaret Cunliffe.

TURNER.—On Sept. 18th, at his Stockport residence, 98, Kennerley-road, Henry, fourth son of the late James Aspinall Turner, M.P., aged 69 years. Funeral at the Manchester Crematorium, Monday, Sept. 21st.

OUR CALENDAR.

SUNDAY, September 27.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Afternoon.

Acton, Central Auction Room, Market-place, High-st., 7 P.M

Bermondsey, Fort-road, 7 P.M., Rev. EUSTACE THOMPSON.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. E. LOCKETT.

Brixton, Unitarian Christian Church, Effra-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. F. W. STANLEY.

Croydon, Free Christian Church, Wellesley-rd., West Croydon, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. A. A. CHARLESWORTH.

Deptford, Church-street, 11.15 A.M. and 6.30, Rev. A. J. MARCHANT.

Essex Church, The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, 11 A.M., Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON.

Forest-gate, corner of Dunbar-road, Upton-lane, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. H. WOODS PERRIS.

Hackney, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham-place, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. R. H. U. BLOOR.

Hampstead, Rosslyn-hill Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. GOW, B.A.

Highgate Hill, Unitarian Christian Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. R. H. GREAVES.

Islington, Unity Church, Upper-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS, M.A.

Kentish Town, Clarence-road, N.W., 11.15 A.M., and 7 P.M., Rev. G. CRITCHLEY, B.A.

Kilburn, Quex-road, 11 A.M. and 7 A.M., Rev. J. E. STRONGE.

Lewisham, Unitarian Christian Church, High-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M. Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE.

Little Portland-street Chapel, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. H. S. PERRIS, M.A.

Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, 7 P.M., Rev. JOHN ELLIS.

Peckham, Avondale-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. G. CARTER.

Plumstead, Common-road Unitarian Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. L. JENKINS JONES.

Richmond, Free Church, Ormond-road, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. S. FARRINGTON.

Stepney Green, College Chapel, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M.

Stoke Newington, The Green, 11.15 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. WOODING, B.A.

Stratford, Unitarian Church, 11 A.M., and 6.30 P.M.,

Wandsworth, Unitarian Christian Church, East-hill, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

Wood Green, Unity Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. Dr. MUMMERY.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH, Trim-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. McDOWELL.

BEDFORD, Library (side room). Vacation.

BLACKPOOL, Banks-street, North Shore, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. D. DAVIS.

BLACKPOOL, South Shore Unitarian Church, The Hall, Lytham-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

BOOTLE, Free Church Hall, Stanley-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. E. A. MALEY.

BOURNEMOUTH, Unitarian Church, West-hill-road, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. C. C. COE.

BRIGHTON, Christ Church, New-road, North-street, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M

BUXTON, Hartington-road Church, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. GEORGE STREET.

CANTERBURY, Ancient Chapel, Blackfriars, 11 A.M., Rev. J. REMINGTON WILSON, M.A.

DOVER, Adrian-street, near Market-square, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. S. BURROWS.

GUILDFORD, Ward-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

HASTINGS, South Terrace, Queen's-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. GARDNER PRESTON.

HORSHAM, Free Christian Church, Worthing-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. J. J. MARTEN.

LEEDS, Mill Hill, 10.45 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.

LISCARD, Memorial Church, Manor-road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. ERNEST PARRY.

LIVERPOOL, Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, 11 A.M., and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. J. JUPPO.

LIVERPOOL, Hope-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

LIVERPOOL, Ullet-road, Sefton-park, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. F. B. MOTT.

NEWPORT, Isle of Wight, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. C. E. PIKE.

OXFORD, Manchester College, 11.30 A.M., Rev. W. E. ADDIS, M.A.

PORTSMOUTH, High-street Chapel, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR.

PORTSMOUTH, St. Thomas-street, 6.45 P.M., Mr. THOMAS BOND.

SCARBOROUGH, Westborough, 10.45 A.M. and 7 P.M., Mr. J. DUNGWORTH.

SEVENOAKS, Bessell's Green, The Old Meeting House, 11 A.M. and 6.45 P.M., Rev. F. TEASDALE REED.

SIDMOUTH, Old Meeting, High-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. W. AGAR.

SOUTHPORT, Portland-street Church, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON, Free Christian Church, Tyler-street, 7 P.M., Rev. ARTHUR RYLAND.

TORQUAY, Unity Hall, Lower Union-street, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M., Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS, Mechanics' Institute, Dudley road, 11 A.M. and 6.30 P.M.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Stephen's Green West, 12 NOON, Rev. G. HAMILTON VANCE, B.D.

WARRENPOINT, co. Down, Unitarian Church, Dromore-road, 12 NOON. The attendance of visitors cordially invited.

WALES.

ABERYSTWITH, New Market Hall, 11 A.M., Mr. J. W. DAVIES.

CAPE TOWN, Free Protestant (Unitarian) Church, Hout-street, 6.45 P.M., Rev. R. BALMFORTH.

SYDNEY, N.S.W., The Australian Church, I.O.O.F. Temple, 11 A.M. and 7 P.M., Rev. G. WALTERS.

SOUTH-PLACE ETHICAL SOCIETY SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY.—Sept. 27, at 11.15 A.M., HERBERT BURROWS, "Civilisation: Its Cause and Cure."

ETHICAL RELIGION SOCIETY, STEINWAY HALL, PORTMAN SQ., W.—Sept. 27, at 11.15 A.M., Dr. WASHINGTON SULLIVAN, "Arius the Libyan."

PULPIT SUPPLY.—Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY, 28, Downshire-hill, Hampstead, N.W.

ZEBRA
Grate Polish
In Packets or as a Paste in Tins.

Schools, etc.

HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
GLAN-Y-MOR, PRESTATYN,
NORTH WALES.

Bracing sea air; field for games; special care given to young and delicate children.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS ETHEL HICKSON
(Teachers' Diploma, University of Cambridge).

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
14 & 15, SOUTH MARINE TERRACE,
ABERYSTWYTH.

PRINCIPAL ... MISS MARLES THOMAS.

This School is splendidly situated in one of the healthiest parts of Wales, overlooking Cardigan Bay, and close to excellent golf links. Pupils have passed the London and Welsh Matriculation; Cambridge Higher Local; Senior and Junior Cambridge Locals, besides the usual Theoretical and Practical Music Examinations. Scholarships have also been obtained at the Welsh University Colleges.

Gymnasium, Swimming, and excellent Hockey Club.

WAVERLEY SCHOOL, 24, HAMILTON ROAD, SHERWOOD RISE, NOTTINGHAM.

PREPARATORY TO THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
HEAD MASTER, Mr. H. T. FACON, B.A.(Lond.).
Prospectus on application. BOARDERS received Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, Essex House, Campden-hill, W.

Board and Residence.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Elvaston, West Cliff, BOARDING ESTABLISHMENT Unrivalled position on sea front, close to the Highcliffe Hotel. 50 rooms. Full-sized billiard table Lovely grounds, with access to Cliff Promenade. Due south. Near Unitarian Church.—Mr. and Mrs. POCOCK.

BOURNEMOUTH. — ARNEWOOD. En Pension. Grand position in West Cliff-road; sea views; South aspect; close to Winter Gardens, Promenade, and Pier.—Apply, MANAGERESS.

ST. LEONARDS.—"Crantock," 59, Warrior-square. First-class BOARD and RESIDENCE; newly furnished and redecorated. Sea View, excellent cuisine, billiard room, sanitary certificate.—Mr. and Mrs. SIDNEY P. POTTER.

SIDMOUTH. — Wanted in private family, one or two Boarders (permanent or otherwise).—Address, H., Office of INQUIRER, Essex-street, Strand.

BOARD and RESIDENCE.—Superior quiet HOUSE for Ladies and Gentlemen. Central. References exchanged. — Miss PENNY, King's Way House, 18, Bedford-place, Russell-square, London, W.C.

LANGLEY HOUSE, DAWLISH.—An ideal HOLIDAY RESORT for Young Ladies or School Girls. Charming Devonshire village. Perfect sanitation. Sea and moorland. Bracing. Favourite summer or winter residence. Through trains from London and the North. 35s. to 42s. weekly. Prospectus from THE PROPRIETOR.

BOURNEMOUTH—Educational home offered to Young Ladies and Children needing warm climate during winter. Special advantages for languages and music. Good references. 4 guineas monthly.—Miss BEYERHAUS, Pine Tree Glen.

BOARDING HOUSE.—THE FELL, TROUTBECK, WINDERMERE, is situated 550 feet above sea-level, and about 2½ miles from the station at Windermere. Every home comfort.

CHELTENHAM. — Comfortable, refined home in best part of town offered. Moderate terms.—Address, S.L., INQUIRER Office, 3 Essex-street., W.C.

DEVOTIONAL BOOKLETS
By the REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

DAILY MEDITATIONS
(Fourth Edition Revised.)

NIGHT UNTO NIGHT.
Cloth, red edges, 6d.; roan gilt, 1s.
PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C

THE SPARK IN THE CLOD.
Evolution as Related to Religion.
By J. T. SUNDERLAND, M.A.,
Author of "The Bible: Its Origin and Growth," &c.

162 pp., price 4s. net; postage 3d.
A study of the larger and more worthy conception of religion that is coming to the world as the result of Evolution. Chapters on "The Evolution of the World," "The Evolution of Man," "The Evolution of Religion," "Pain and Evil in the Light of Evolution," "Immortality in the Light of Evolution," "The Bible, Jesus, and Christianity in the Light of Evolution."

"A remarkable and inspiring book."—Toronto SATURDAY NIGHT.

"A work of profound scholarship; an important addition to religious literature."—Boston JOURNAL.

For sale by PHILIP GREEN, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

36 pp. 8vo, price Sixpence.
THE FREEHOLD FARM. THE GARNER'D SEED-CORN OF ALL INTUITIONED THOUGHT.

LOOKING INWARDS TO THE INTUITION.
By F. LINFORD WILSON.
Published by H. SEERIGHT, and obtainable of REEVES, 83, Charing Cross-road, W.C.

RELIGION AND LIFE: A Plain Essay. By the Hon. ROLLO RUSSELL.
Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
London: LONGMANS, GREEN, and Co.

JOHN PAGE HOPPS' MONTHLY.

THE COMING DAY.

ENLARGED. PRICE THREEPENCE.

Contents for OCTOBER.

The Pope's Prayer.
Soaring above the Dust.
Our Bodies to God.
Personal Prayers.
The Gods of the Bible.
A Reminiscence of Robert Owen.
The Little Devils and the Lady's Train.
Ruskin the Socialist.
Notes by the Way. Notes on Books, &c.

London, Edinburgh, and Oxford:
WILLIAMS and NORGATE, and all Booksellers.

SOCIAL EDUCATION.
SCHOOL OF SOCIOLOGY AND SOCIAL ECONOMICS.

SESSION BEGINNING OCT. 16TH, 1903.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE. — Mr. JAMES BONAR, LL.D.

LECTURER AND TUTOR.—Mr. E. J. URWICK, M.A.

Social Theory in Relation to Practical Work, 1st Term, Mr. Urwick.

Observation and Method in Sociological Studies, 2nd Term, Professor Geddes.

Co-operation and Copartnership in Relation to the Economic Competence of Artisans and Labourers, 1st Term, Mr. R. Halstead (Leicester), and others.

Administrative Work and Training, Mr. Urwick, Miss M. Sewell (late Warden Women's University Settlement), and others.

Temporary premises for Lectures, Caxton Hall, Westminster, S.W.

For information, apply to Mr E. J. URWICK, 11, Stainsby-road, Limehouse, E., and to Mr. G. F. HILL (Hon. Sec.), 10, Kensington-mansions, Earl's-court, S.W.

Situations, etc.

GOVERNESS, Resident, seeks re-engagement. Certificated English. Drawing, Sciences, French, Music, Drill. Or as Secretary, Companion.—ELLINGHAM, Thorpe St. Andrew, Norwich.

WANTED, an experienced trustworthy Nurse for boy two years and five months old.—Address, Mrs. SWIRE, Bank House, Sutton-in-Ashfield, Notts.

WANTED, a capable girl as Nursemaid to three children, ages 10 to 3 years. Must be well recommended.—Apply to 105, Hartington-road, Liverpool.

CAN ANY LADY recommend a thoroughly trustworthy, capable Nurse for three children, 6½, 3¾ years, and 7 months. Good wages.—Mrs. P. ROSCOE, 28, Denning-road, Hampstead, London.

CARE-TAKERS (Man and Wife) for Mission. Husband can have other employment. No children.—Apply by letter to Dr. READ, Domestic Mission, Rhyl-street, Kentish Town, N.W.

WANTED by Young Lady, situation as Governess to young children, or as Companion.—Address B., INQUIRER Office, 3, Essex-street, W.C.

FREDK. LONG & SON,
AUCTIONEERS, SURVEYORS, HOUSE & LAND AGENTS,
4, Adelaide Place, London Bridge, E.C.

Rents Collected, and the entire management of Property in any part of London or Suburbs undertaken. Valuations for Probate, &c.

NUT FOODS.
The following Nut Foods are specially suited for the hot season:—

Banana and Nut Food, 7d., 1/-, and 1/4 per Tin. A new delicious food made from ripe fresh Bananas and Nuts. Can be sliced for sandwiches, or used as cheese.

Almond Cream, 3½d., 1/-, and 1/10 per Tin. Unrivalled as an accompaniment for fresh or stewed fruit.

Malted Nuts, 2d., 6½d., and 1/- per tin. Promotes digestion of all cereal food.

Full descriptive Price List from the Manufacturer:
HUGH MAPLETON,
COLONIAL HOUSE, ARDWICK GREEN, MANCHESTER.

19TH CENTURY BUILDING SOCIETY,
ADELAIDE PLACE, LONDON BRIDGE, E.C.

Assets, £158,000.

DIRECTORS.

Chairman—Sir H. W. LAWRENCE, Bart., J.P., 17, Mincing-lane, E.C.
Deputy-Chairman—MARK H. JUDGE, A.R.I.B.A., 7, Pall Mall, S.W.
Miss CECIL GRADWELL, 7, Victoria-street, S.W.
F. H. A. HARDCASTLE, F.S.I., 5, Old Queen-st., S.W.
Miss ORME, 118, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W.
STEPHEN SEAWARD TAYLER, "Fairholme," 8, Mount Ephraim-road, Streatham, S.W.

PREFERENCE SHARES £10, Interest 4 per cent. DEPOSITS received at 3 and 3½ per cent., withdrawable at short notice.

BORROWER'S INTEREST 4 per cent. Monthly Repayment, including Principal, Premium, and Interest for each £100.

10 years.	12 years.	15 years.	18 years.	21 years.
1 1 1	0 18 4	0 15 6	0 14 2	0 12 11

Compare the above rates with those of other Societies. Survey Fee to £500, half-a-guinea.

Special facilities given to persons desiring to purchase houses for their own occupation. Prospectus free.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

Printed by UNWIN BROTHERS, LTD., 27, Pilgrim-street Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., and Published for the Proprietors by E. KENNEDY, at the Office, 3, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. Sole Agent, JOHN HEYWOOD 20 and 30, Shoe-lane, E.C. Manchester (Wholesale), JOHN HEYWOOD, Deansgate. — Saturday, Sept. 26, 1903.

The Inquirer.

A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

ESTABLISHED IN 1842.] [REGISTERED AS A NEWSPAPER.

No. 3197. NEW SERIES, No. 301.] LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1903. [ONE PENNY.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK 649
ARTICLES—
Social Economics 651
Social Work in Villages 652
International Council Report 657
The Evolution of the Modern Street Play 658
The Registrar-General's Report for 1901 660
LITERATURE—
Anna Swanwick 653
New Educational Methods 654
LEADER—
The Call to Service 656
To Save Macedonia 656
CHILDREN'S COLUMN 655
OBITUARY—
Lieut.-Col. Henry Turner, J.P. 655
CORRESPONDENCE—
A City University 660
MEETINGS—
Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association 660
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES 661
ADVERTISEMENTS 662

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

"OH, for one half-hour of Gladstone!" That, said the Bishop of Worcester in his earnest speech at St. James's Hall, on Tuesday evening, had been the wish constantly recurring to his mind of late. In view of the terrible situation in Macedonia and the inactivity of this country, in common with other Great Powers, he could not escape the fear that enthusiasm for righteousness was, in the present day, at a discount in politics; and yet, whatever its mistakes in the past, moral enthusiasm in a people was the only force capable of accomplishing any great thing.

THE St. James's Hall meeting was held to make a public protest against the inaction of our Government, and its voice was unmistakable as to the urgent need for immediate and effective intervention on behalf of the Macedonians. The hall was crowded long before the time for the meeting to begin, and, in spite of most unfavourable weather, would probably have been filled twice over by those wishing to take part. The most impressive feature of the meeting was the manifest depth and strength of feeling in the audience. The speaking was clear and sometimes forcible, making out an unanswerable case, as expressed in the resolutions, passed without a dissentient vote, condemning the "long continued and incurable misgovernment of Macedonia" by the Turk, demanding an independent administration, expressing the obligation of Great Britain on account of 1878 and the Treaty of Berlin, to intervene effectually to stay the massacres and secure liberty to the oppressed people. Yet, looking from the orchestra upon the great sea of upturned faces, and noting the immediate response to every generous sentiment, one longed for one eloquent voice kindled to prophetic fire to give adequate expression to what that great concourse of the people clearly felt and desired.

THE Bishop of Worcester spoke with fearless directness and earnestness, making, at the outset, generous acknowledgment that in this matter Nonconformists had taken the lead and spoken out (as notably on Thursday week in the meeting at the City Temple), expressing his deep dissatisfaction with Mr. Balfour's letter, and declaring that the "irreducible minimum" of reform was something far more than what Austria and Russia were asking, and must include an independent Christian Governor of Macedonia. Mr. Bryce spoke with the authority of ample knowledge in moving the first resolution, which was seconded by Sir Edward Fry (who also took the chair, when the Bishop had to leave), and supported by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, who nearly wrecked his speech by a most ill-judged allusion to the South African war, of which he was a defender. Among the subsequent speakers were Mr. Evelyn Ashley (Lord Shaftesbury's son, and private secretary to Lord Palmerston at the time when the Lebanon was taken out of Turkish control), Mr. Will Crooks, M.P., Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., and the Bishop of Hereford, who received the most enthusiastic reception of all, when he rose to move the third resolution, calling for the relief of the homeless refugees in Macedonia, and asking the Balkan Committee to organise a fund.

ONE of the clearest statements of the actual position in Macedonia, with a suggestion of the true solution, is made in this month's Fortnightly by Mr. H. N. Brailsford, who with first-hand knowledge of the country follows up the article which he contributed in September to the same review. Macedonia, he agrees with all other authorities on the subject, must be freed from direct Turkish rule, and be placed under an independent Christian Governor. And he concludes:—

Unless England and the two Liberal Western Powers can find the courage to insist that humanity counts for something in European politics, the future of Macedonia will simply be the cooling of its ashes. The scanty but quite definite news that comes from the two or three English correspondents in Monastir is a repetition of the earlier phases of the Armenian massacres. Before the winter is over there will be nothing to occupy but the ruins of a fertile province, no one to rescue but famishing orphans and dishonoured widows. Such scenes can stir only one impulse in England, France, and Italy. It is unthinkable that these peoples should stand idly by, as incapable of organised protest as they were when the first Turkish hordes menaced a semi-civilised Europe.

MR. BRYCE also has an article in the new Independent Review on "The Near East," pointing clearly to the same inevitable solution of the problem. He gives an account of the different races in Macedonia, between whom no love is lost, but pointedly adds:—

They are not the cause of the present miseries and the present dangers. It suits the cynical politicians who would leave the Turks to carry out their programme of massacre and rapine, to put the discords of the Christian races in the foreground of the picture. But the real evil, the horrible reality which overshadows everything else, is the incurable misgovernment of the country, a misgovernment which is the result, not of stupidity or carelessness, but of a deliberate purpose to plunder the tillers of the soil for the benefit of a handful of landlords, tax-gatherers, and officials, coupled with the contempt of the armed Mussulman for the defenceless Christian.

ENGLAND'S duty, says Mr. Bryce, is undeniable, after her action in 1878; but, unhappily, it is more difficult to do good now than it was to do evil then. Yet, with the co-operation of France and Italy, he is confident that we could insist on the withdrawal of the Turks from Macedonia and secure an independent government.

The peril is imminent, for Bulgaria may be at any moment drawn into the conflict; and every day sees hundreds of non-combatants slaughtered, women violated, villages destroyed, and the area of ruin extended. No one is entitled to suppose that Austria and Russia, callous as their policy has seemed to be during the last few months, will refuse to accede to such a proposal, coming from a Power which has the fullest right to make it, and has no selfish interest to serve. If they do refuse, on them let the guilt rest.

Be the result of her efforts what it may, England at least is bound to do her best to serve the interests of humanity—interests which seem to be so much less regarded in our days than they were forty years ago. Let England at least clear herself from the disgrace of having stood coldly or timorously by, while horrors, unexampled even in the East, are being perpetrated, a country devastated, a people blotted out.

IN pursuance of the resolution of the St. James's Hall meeting, an appeal for a Macedonian Relief Fund has been issued, signed by Mr. Evelyn Ashley, Mr. James Bryce, Mr. A. J. Evans, Sir Edward Fry, and the Bishop of Worcester. Sir J. Fowell Buxton, Bart., G.C.M.G., has consented to act as treasurer. Cheques will be received by the hon. secretary, Mr. H.

N. Brailsford, 11, Brunswick-square, W.C., or by the bankers, Messrs. Barclay and Co., Limited, 1, Pall Mall East, S.W. One of the European Consuls in Monastir has estimated the numbers of these homeless fugitives at about 40,000 persons. Winter, which in these upland districts is extremely severe, is approaching. The crops and granaries have been systematically destroyed. Famine on an appalling scale is imminent, and the weaker fugitives are already dying of hunger.

At the meeting of the General Committee of the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches held at the Memorial Hall on Monday, the question of the condition of the Balkan States was discussed, and the following resolution was unanimously passed:—

That this Committee expresses its horror and indignation at the present condition of Macedonia. It considers that no remedy for the present disorder can be satisfactory which does not provide, at least, for the appointment of a Christian Governor by the Great Powers of Europe, with an effective police at his disposal for the protection of life and liberty, upon plans approved and supervised by the Powers. The Committee recognises the great responsibility in this matter resting upon the British nation, and respectfully but urgently calls upon his Majesty's Government to seek to bring about a concert of the European Powers to press such proposals, failing a more effective remedy, upon the Government of Turkey.

A circular has been sent to the 800 Free Church Councils asking them to have the resolution read before the congregations assembled in all the Free Churches in England and Wales next Sunday, and urging that special reference should be made from the pulpit.

Mr. Henry Norman, M.P., writes in the October number of the World's Work on the Passive Resistance movement as follows:—

In considering a movement of this kind, one's judgment must necessarily be affected by the class of men who feel themselves compelled to break the law. The "passive resisters" stand high, when so considered. Ministers of all the Free Churches, magistrates, aldermen, councillors, overseers, and the very salt of private citizens make up the long and growing list. It is no exaggeration to say that when such a body of men take the step of refusing compliance with a law, there is something in that law which ought not to be there and which cannot permanently be enforced. The revolt of the anti-vaccinators will occur to everyone in this connection. They succeeded, though there was far less of principle at stake, in their protest. As a matter of fact, no student of politics and life, whether Churchman or Nonconformist, supposes that the obnoxious clauses of the Education Bill will remain permanently on the statute-book. They are surely doomed, and "passive resistance" is at once the symptom and the assurance of their condemnation.

The housing of the working classes is receiving serious attention in Germany. The German "Central Department for Working Men's Benefit Institutions," which was founded in 1891 on the suggestion of the Prussian Minister of Commerce, and is subsidised by the Governments of the German Federal States and the Imperial and Prussian Ministries, has sent over to England a party of thirty-seven specially qualified men to inspect British methods of housing, and institutions which are for the benefit of the poor. Dr. Von Erdberg, one of the leaders, in an interview with a representative of the Manchester Guardian, said that what had most struck them so far was the Rowton House at Whitechapel, "its completeness and its perfection, the care bestowed in details, its superb cleanness and the inspiring determination that everything about it should be beautiful." Such an institution, able to pay four and a half per cent. interest on the capital, he thought might well be imitated by German Working Men's Societies.

The visits of inspection will include blocks of dwellings and other housing schemes of English municipalities, houses provided by philanthropic institutions, University Settlements, the Polytechnic, Salvation Army institutions, the People's Palace, Bourneville and Port Sunlight, municipal baths, lodging-houses, and practically everything possible that aims at improving the homes and surroundings of the people. Such international visits are of great significance, and, while Germany may learn much from England, it is no less true that such a party of experts from England might find many things worthy of imitation in Germany and other countries. Dr. Von Erdberg expressed surprise at the proximity of slums to some of the finest thoroughfares of London, and said, "Why does not Parliament interfere?" He considered that German working-men pay much less rent than English workingmen in proportion to their income, and that they do more to help themselves.

The London School of Economics and Political Science, of which Mr. W. A. S. Hewins is director, in its fine new building in Clare Market (behind Clement's Inn, from the Strand) offers during the coming session a number of courses of lectures bearing on philanthropic, charitable, social, and public work. To meet the increasing number of students some of the courses are duplicated, giving a choice of hours, and the attention of settlement workers, rent collectors, district visitors, Poor Law guardians, borough councillors, and public and philanthropic workers of every kind, is called to the opportunities of instruction thus offered. "The Organisation and Structure of Modern Industry," "The Economic Position of England," "Public Administration," "The Principles of Public Finance," "The Old Poor Law," "English Local Government," "The Theory of International Trade," are among the subjects to be treated in full courses by such well-known lecturers as the Director, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb, Mr. Ashley, Mr. Cannan, and others.

The twenty-fifth annual report of the Social and Political Education League, which has just been issued, shows that 164 lectures were delivered last winter. Sympathetic allusion is made to the death of the Rev. Henry Solly, one of its founders, and a most constant and earnest supporter of its principles and work. Gratification is expressed at the institution by the University of Cambridge of a special tripos in economics and political science, subjects which Mr. Solly and Sir John Seeley had long advocated for all our universities. Professor Percy Gardner is the successor of Mr. Choate in the presidency. The League offers admirable opportunities to literary and other kindred societies in arranging for the discussion of social and political topics from a non-partisan standpoint. All lectures are given gratuitously, although societies and clubs are urged to contribute towards the expenses according to their means. The organising secretary, Mr. A. H. Reed, 23, Old-square, Lincoln's Inn, will be glad to forward copies of the Lecture List on application.

Last Sunday was the seventieth anniversary of the death of Rajah Rammohun Roy. He died Sept. 27, 1833, at Stapleton Grove, Bristol. The Rev. W. H. Burgess preaching on the life of that "Morning Star of Reform in his native land," as the Rajah has been called, quoted the remarkable testimony of Protap Chandra Mozoomdar set down in 1874 in the visitors' book at Arno's Vale Cemetery, where lie the remains of Rammohun Roy. It is in these terms:—

England will for ever remain a land of pilgrimage to every patriotic and pious Hindu, so long as the sacred remains of our beloved Rajah lie enshrined in her free soil; and if, in the course of time, all other relations that bind India to the land of her rulers come to be loosened and ineffective, this shall for ever unite the two countries which represent the East and the West, that the last days—the noblest days of Rammohun Roy—were spent and the last efforts of his great soul were made in England, after he had successfully established in his fatherland the institution which proposes to itself the object of introducing into the world the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. May others be inspired as I have been by the sight of the Rajah's grave.

We are sorry to see from the fashion columns of a leading paper that efforts are being made by those interested in the trade and the fashion, to extend the use in England and on the Continent of plumed hats with a crown of bright-coloured birds. We sincerely hope that no woman who reads this paragraph will be tempted to follow this barbarous fashion, involving so much cruelty and the wanton destruction of beautiful creatures. We have heard of those who let themselves be soothed with the supposition that they were wearing imitation plumes, but a man well acquainted with the trade wrote recently that there were very few imitations on the market, that the cheaper kinds as well as the dearer were nearly all real, and that the retail milliner probably knew no more about their origin than her customer whom she tried to satisfy. Besides, what true woman wants to pretend to follow a cruel fashion? If we were living among a race of people who decorated themselves with human scalps as trophies, should we order imitation articles from the hair-dresser that we might appear to be savages?

Very few of us will have the chance of heroic self-devotion; but every day brings the petty, wearing sacrifice which weighs full weight in God's scales.—Samuel Osgood.

SOCIAL ECONOMICS.

WORK IN THE PARISH.

"IF I had a parish," I sometimes think, and visions pass before me of the many parishes and congregations I have known. Sometimes it is a parish in the poorer quarters of a town, of which the clergyman is the strenuous, overworked centre, with the whole organisation of schools and guilds and clubs and mothers' meetings revolving around him; the source of a stream of benevolent almsgiving, the originator of soup-kitchen and relief works, the general authority on all questions of local administration. Or in contrast with this, I envy the incumbent of a quiet country parish, growing placidly old in a calm routine of tyrannical beneficence, still the source to which his parishioners look for all material aid and its accompanying spiritual counsel. "Parson means just person," as a very young curate once explained to me, "and the Parson means the person in a parish"; the attraction is irresistible.

But in my wiser moments, I am grateful for the limitations by which Fate has cut me off from the temptation to such a position, surely the hardest of all to hold wisely and firmly. And after condoling with one parson on the hardship of having to spend all his energies in raising money in the West End to be distributed in the East, and with another on the humiliation of being regarded mainly as the source of treats and tickets, my imagination flies to the other extreme, and I think, "If I had a parish, my first step would be to organise it so that I myself as spiritual director should sit absolutely free from all questions of raising or distributing money."

Priest and People.

The relation of the parish priest to the material needs of his people has a long history, and at all times there have been difficulties and vexations arising out of it. Long before the days when the State entered upon the thorny path of Poor Law Administration, we find these difficulties between priest and people illustrated in "Piers Plowman":—

> For the parisshe priest and the pardoner
> Parten the silver
> That the poraille of the parisshe
> Sholde have, if thei ne were.

And it is still a question hotly combatted by the Church, whether a third of the tithe does not rightfully belong to the poor, although in practice it has not done so for many centuries.

Care for Material Needs.

But our modern difficulties are not of this kind. The grasping priest is a monster of bygone days, and even the indifference of a few generations ago has melted away before a sympathy which is almost too fervid in its glow. It is a strange paradox, but fully in accordance with other signs of the times, that many if not most ministers of religion are far more touched and afflicted by the material needs of their flocks, than by their spiritual struggles and shortcomings; they will feel themselves crushed by the burden of the poverty in their parish or congregation, and will exhaust themselves in fruitless struggles to relieve it, while they maintain an attitude of almost cheerful leniency in face of the burden of selfishness, irreligion, and drunkenness, for which one would think them more especially responsible. This attitude brings with it evils of its own; the people are only too quick to divine and accept the parson's view as to the relative importance of spiritual and material goods; but it is at any rate more hopeful than either the rivalry or the indifference of the past.

Parish and Congregation.

Strictly speaking, "parish" work is territorial in its nature; that is to say, the clergyman feels himself responsible for all the people living within the area which constitutes his parish. But in practice the congregational system is far more prevalent; and the efforts of the Church, whether Established or Nonconformist, are concentrated upon those who attend its services. Others again are confined by no limits, but carry their proselytising activities wherever they can enforce an entrance or command a hearing.

From our present point of view, that of secular work, all have their merits and defects. The territorial is good, just so far as the giving of relief is dissociated from the idea that it is to be got by attending religious services; it fails just so far as the assistance proffered ceases to be the mutual help of friend to friend, based upon previous intimacy and sympathy. The congregational is good so far as its charity has its roots in the deeper soil of religious brotherhood, and serves as a further bond between those already knit together in real faith; it fails, it is indeed in danger of becoming thoroughly bad and mischievous, in so far as it leads to professions of faith being made for the sake of material benefits. This, too, is the great danger attaching to the relief work undertaken by proselytising agencies amongst people unknown to them. "We have tried teas, and we are going to try hot suppers," is the naïve description of its work given by one of these; but what the religion can be worth which has no firmer foundation than teas and hot suppers, is a question too seldom asked.

Mutual Helpfulness:

But parish work, wisely conceived and soberly carried out, may be one of the strongest forces making for social progress; especially, when it takes the form of mutual helpfulness amongst the members of a congregation. To encourage such mutual helpfulness should be the constant aspiration of the minister of religion, a nobler idea in every way than that of being himself the collector and dispenser of relief funds. Some clergymen, indeed, I have known, of wisdom and experience, who have thought the only safe plan was to relieve themselves entirely of the work of almsgiving, at the most exercising only a general supervision over their almoners.

Without necessarily going as far as this, it is certain that unless the minister is prepared to devolve a great part of the parish work upon lay assistants, his own peculiar functions will stand in danger of being swamped, or degraded from the highest that they might be. Just what arrangement will be best will differ with the needs of different parishes, but I will sketch a system which has been found to work well in London.

The Parish Committee.

Probably, in most congregations all those who take any part in church work or administration meet from time to time to take counsel together. The most experienced of these may be formed into a committee to meet regularly at more frequent intervals, and having for its especial business all matters concerning the material or secular needs of the parishioners. Of the actual work of such a committee I will write in detail in another paper, but it should be qualified to assume the entire responsibility in this direction. Generally speaking, the minister (or clergyman) is chairman of this committee, but if he needs his time for other work, this should not be necessary. The district visitors may or may not be members, but they should be absolutely under its control so far as relief work is concerned, and should report regularly as to the families under their care. The most effectively organised of these committees are served by secretaries who have submitted themselves to special training for the position; and in large parishes the work of such a secretary is so arduous and important that it is sometimes found necessary to appoint a salaried official. Indeed, the demand for trained parish workers of this type, competent to guide the energies of a large number of volunteer workers, is becoming considerable.

Ideal of Helpfulness.

Before entering in detail upon the various kinds of secular work which may be usefully carried on in a parish, it is necessary to consider what it is that we are aiming at, what ideal we set before us. I take it that the picturesque conception of the Lady Bountiful, distributing minute packets of grocery and flannel petticoats to a duly grateful and humble peasantry, no longer attracts us. It is wholly out of accord with the spirit of a wise and large-minded democracy that any section of the community should be permanently dependent upon the benevolence of another section. In place of it we are substituting the ideal of a community in which all classes shall be normally prosperous and independent, earning sufficient to enable them to order their own lives; but in which also rich and poor alike may find in his neighbour a true friend upon whom he can rely for strength in times of trouble. It is a strange misconception to think that such mutual help is needed only by the poor, or that it can be rendered mainly by means of money. It often happens that the most effective help calls for no expenditure of money at all, while long experience has led some of the greatest philanthropists—such as Chalmers—to maintain the apparent paradox that the poor can be better helped by taking money from them than by giving it to them. One thing, at least, is certain, that no one need be hindered from taking up parish work by the fact that he has no funds at his disposal. Such a one, indeed, is far more likely to be successful in his work than another who is known to have a long purse. And in so far as the men and women who have to earn their own living have shared the experiences and difficulties of the wage-earners, they are in a position of great advantage in this work of mutual assistance amongst the poor; an advantage only partially compensated by the greater leisure and culture of the well-to-do. For this reason no scheme of parish work is complete which does not include the active co-operation of working-class members.

HELEN BOSANQUET.

SOCIAL WORK IN VILLAGES.

IN reporting the annual meeting of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union at Whitsuntide, we reserved our notes of the greater part of the paper read by Miss Sewell, formerly head of the Southwark Women's University Settlement, on "Religious and Social Work in Villages" until we could make fuller use of them, to follow Miss Sewell in her admirable account of the many opportunities of public service open to cultured residents in villages. That is what we propose now to do.

In Elementary Schools.

Whatever we may think of the new Education Act, said Miss Sewell, it is not to be denied that we stand at a critical point in the matter of education, and the country schools will offer splendid opportunities for raising the whole standard of education, if the right enthusiasm is put into the work. The school manager has great opportunities; the village school can be touched on so many sides. The choice of the teacher is of the first importance, the special problem of the school being, perhaps, the smallness of its staff. This becomes more acute as the standard of teaching rises and the variety of subjects is increased. In towns the difficulty is in part met by visiting teachers for special subjects. The new county authorities, we must hope, will organise schemes to use local voluntary help. Many educated people, with a little training, could teach special subjects in the village school. Regularity and continuity would indeed be necessary, but that should not be unattainable. Anyone anxious to do a really good piece of social work should study the requirements of the education department, and qualify for some such subject.

Dull Winter Evenings.

Then for the adults, and the young people after they have left school, there is much to be done. From October to February the evenings are long, and in the village often extremely dull. The darkness falls so soon, unrelieved by street lamps or the light of shop windows. There is nothing to do outside, and the cottages are so small, while so few of the people have interests in reading or handicraft. There should be in every village a public building, a hall for music, for showing pictures, for lectures, for seasonal festivals and social gatherings; a workshop for children in the daytime and adults in the evening, where simple handicrafts could be pursued; a club-room, and, if possible, a kitchen. The building should be beautiful as well as useful, and around it all sorts of social amenities should cluster. In organising such a building, there is infinite scope for individual effort; but failing such a hall, the day-school should be used, or some private room.

Music in the Village.

Music is a great resource. It is natural for people to like music, and they are so clearly the better for it that to neglect it, as we do far too much, is pure waste of opportunity. A certain amount of church music there is, none too good. The children are taught a little singing in the schools, but not of such standard as it should be. There should be a choral society in every village; in many there might also be an orchestral society. The difficulty generally is to find a teacher. Concerts given by others, and organ recitals, cannot take the place of music made by the people themselves. There is stimulus and discipline in this, which is all wholesome, and gives a moral lift, the value of which cannot be over-estimated. Whatever is left out, it should not be the choral society. The village band can be a great institution.

Village Festivals.

The village should have its festivals, when class differences are less in evidence, when there can be a meal in common, games and competitions shared by all, and a masque or dance, or something of the kind, not got up by one class for another, but done together. The organising and training for this is the share of the most leisured and capable, and gives great scope for work and that close contact with others which is the most useful thing of all.

Health of the Village.

The health of the village is of the first importance. What is most needed is a wider knowledge of elementary household hygiene, and proper sanitary arrangements. For this a little may be done in the school. There is already homely teaching of domestic economy in villages, but this might be greatly expanded. As to village sanitation, water supply and drainage are of the first importance, and the latter demands original and scientific treatment.* The better management of cottage property offers a great opening to educated women with leisure. Women are specially fitted for this work, and if they are trained by a short course, great good may be done.

Wealth of the Village.

To add to the wealth of the village community the best course is to improved education, that the people may have the needful training for the work for which they are best fitted. New rural industries should be developed, the cultivation of fruit and flowers, poultry and bees, and in the winter time, skilled handicrafts, while sales of what is produced should be organised and industrial exhibitions. The most help in this direction is given by those who make one of these things a hobby, and give genuine interest to its promotion. Nor should thrift be forgotten, but the savings bank and a branch of a good and sound friendly society should be encouraged in every village.

* In this connection Miss Sewell warmly commended Dr. G. V. Poore's book on Rural Hygiene.

Service on Public Bodies.

Public service on the parish or district council or as guardian of the poor opens up a great interest. There is the administration of old charities, the sanitary authority, the care of gardens and open spaces, the upholding of local reputation; in all these ways, serving with others, gaining the confidence of others, the moral health of the community is tested and maintained.

Special Village Difficulties.

(1) One special difficulty of the village is that each element of society is represented by so few individuals that it seems hardly possible to provide for each. The school is too small to teach all we should like, there are too few boys for the club, too few men to form a gardening society, and so on. There is something in this difficulty, and yet there are great advantages in small numbers. In teaching, each individual gets more attention, and there is opportunity for closer personal care.

(2) Another difficulty is that in the village there is so much gossip, scandal, and petty jealousy that nothing runs easily. Much will depend on the tone set by those who should be the leaders of opinion in the village. Good feeling, good judgment, personal restraint in the discussion of others even in a friendly spirit, these and the serious desire to help must reduce the difficulty to very narrow limits.

(3) Then there is the difficulty of the parson and the squire, the tendency of all work in the village to be in the hands of one or the other, and their thinking that they have the right to govern. One may acknowledge a great debt to the country clergy of all denominations and schools, yet this government by one is not the best form even theoretically, and save in exceptional cases it has a blighting and depressing effect on the development of the community. The difficulty grows less acute daily, and recent changes in local government, and now in education, go to weaken individual authority, and the change is all to the good. To meet the difficulty, the necessary influence possessed by a large landowner should be frankly recognised. He owes much to the place in which he lives, and ought to do his duty by it. His co-operation is essential to successful social work. Facts should be recognised, and authority admitted up to a certain point. Every village will have its own problems of difficulty in the matter of co-operation, and workers should remember that thorough knowledge of any subject and enthusiasm give a natural authority. Whether in games, in sanitation, or in the school, real mastery gives power. In that peaceful way problems of authority will best be met, and the help that each desires to give will be most effectively rendered.

THE virtue of Paganism was strength; the virtue of Christianity is obedience.—Augustus Hare.

LITERATURE.

ANNA SWANWICK.*

This life of Miss Anna Swanwick by her niece, Miss Mary Bruce, is deeply interesting. Unlike many modern biographies, it is short, and can be read through in two or three hours. Perhaps the impression made is the more definite on that account. We have read the book with a continually increasing admiration for the quiet effectiveness of the portrait. The biographer never obtrudes herself, but her skill, which is the skill of love, is seen as a pervading influence. She has produced a little book in which not only the friends of Miss Swanwick will rejoice but for which all who read it must be grateful. It cannot fail to do any reader good to be brought into contact with so gracious, happy, and sympathetic a personality as that of Miss Swanwick.

Miss Swanwick was born in Liverpool in 1813, being descended on her father's side from Philip Henry. She and her two elder sisters grew up in a cultivated and beautiful home. The education of girls at school was no doubt very inferior in method to that of the present day, but if, as Miss Bruce says, "one result of the education given to girls in those days was the creation of an intense thirst for knowledge and a longing for opportunity to fill in the blanks left by imperfect teaching," it seems that education then accomplished what it often fails to do in our days.

In 1832† Dr. Martineau came to Liverpool as minister of Paradise-street Chapel. Miss Swanwick writes of that time: —

> When Mr. Martineau first came to Liverpool my mind seemed to be suddenly opened—I saw things I had never before even imagined. I took an interest in things I could not appreciate before he came, in fact, every day I felt myself to be acquiring new powers and interests. I look back upon that time as the happiest part of my life, and most thoroughly did I enjoy it.

This was the beginning of a friendship which lasted nearly seventy years, and which must have been a great happiness to Dr. Martineau as well as to Miss Swanwick.

In 1835 her youngest sister and her inseparable companion, Mary Swanwick, married Henry Bruce, son of Rev. Dr. Bruce of Belfast. The enforced separation was a great grief to Miss Anna Swanwick. Life seemed to have lost its interest for her. She forced herself to the study of German as an anodyne, and translated Goethe's "Iphigenia" and his "Torquato Tasso," thus finding by instinct as it were her life work in seeking relief from sorrow. Women are perhaps happier than men in knowing instinctively what they like and what they can accomplish. Many men with literary power like Richard Jefferies waste years of life in seeking blindly for the line of work which is their own, and only find it after many useless efforts. It belonged to the happily balanced nature and intuitive wisdom of Miss Swanwick that she found at once and without effort the kind of literary work in which she could achieve success. In 1838 Mrs. Swanwick and her two unmarried daughters left Liverpool for London. Shortly afterwards Miss Swanwick went to Berlin for eight months. There she studied Hebrew and Greek as well as German under Professor Zumpt. We find her very soon translating Plato's Dialogues into German; she writes home that she is reading "The Phædo" in the original, and had found it a mine of wealth.

She also found time for lessons in mathematics, this being a subject in which she was as deeply interested as in philosophy and literature. "She was a rare instance," says her biographer "of great intellectual ability and power of deep thinking, combined with an almost childish simplicity of character."

In 1843 Mr. Murray published some of her German translations under the title of "Selections from the Dramas of Goethe and Schiller." It was a time when through the influence especially of Carlyle working upon ground prepared by Coleridge, the interest of cultivated Englishmen had been directed towards German literature. Men desired to know something of the great German philosophers and poets who had awakened such enthusiasm in a few leaders of English thought. They rejoiced to feel that there was a new large world of thought and beauty in that undiscovered country; they welcomed its teaching gladly and were ready to admire without stint or jealousy.

Another publisher, Mr. Bohn—too well known by indolent students—was impressed by Miss Swanwick's work, and in 1850 published a second volume of her translations from the German, and then asked her to undertake the translation of "Faust." The appearance of the first part of "Faust" in 1851 gave her an assured position in the world of literature. This is not the place to discuss the value of her translation, and to compare it with the many others which have since appeared. It must be sufficient to say, with her biographer, that thirty years later a fifth edition was published, and that it still holds its own among the rest.

On the appearance of "Faust" Miss Swanwick was strongly urged by Baron Bunsen to undertake the translation of the dramas of Æschylus. With such encouragement she determined to make the attempt, and set herself to what was the hardest and most important work of her life. Æschylus is the most difficult, as he is the greatest, of the Greek dramatists. His text is often corrupt, and his choruses are at once the despair of the undergraduate and the delight of the scholar. It was a daring thing for a woman who had not been through any of the orthodox Greek training in public school or university, to undertake the translation into English poetry of such an author. The great Trilogy was published in 1865, and was received with general and striking praise. A woman scholar at that time had to fear in her reviews not so much slashing attacks as against an equal, but rather condescending tolerance as towards an inferior. The tone to be expected was that of Dr. Johnson in his well-known criticism on a woman making a speech: "Sir, it is like a dog standing on its hind legs: it is not done well, but the wonder is that it is done at all." This is not the tone, speaking generally, in which Miss Swanwick's work was received. "Even the 'Saturday Reviler,' as it was then called, was astonished to find itself vying in enthusiasm with the rest, and admitting that 'here is fit cause for the advocates of the rights of women to gather together and chant a pæan in commemoration of their advanced prospects and position.'" Especially gratifying was a letter of appreciation from Mr. Gladstone addressed to "A. Swanwick, Esq." This letter was the beginning of a friendship with Mr. Gladstone which Miss Swanwick naturally regarded as one of her greatest privileges.

Miss Swanwick broke down in health after the great effort involved by this work, and was ordered into country solitude. Within the next few years she completed the translation of the rest of the dramas of Æschylus and of the second part of "Faust." We cannot, however, dwell longer on this side of her life. It was through this that she gained reputation and the opportunity of large social relationships, but it was through something else that she gained the affection and reverence of many friends. "I remember you," writes an old relative when nearly ninety, "a dear little girl of seven, intent upon doing kindness to all around you, and years afterwards I found you blessed with the same spirit. It has been the joy of your life, and has caused more happiness to others than you can have any idea of."

In the midst of her engrossing literary work in London she found time for giving lessons to girls drawn from the poor streets round Tottenham Court-road. At first they came to her house in Woburn-square two evenings a week; later the classes were held in a room over a shop which was nearer to their work, and later still, when Dr. Martineau came to London and the Portland British Schools were built, these classes were incorporated in the school. When this was accomplished Miss Swanwick turned her attention to youths, and held evening and Sunday classes for them. "I always found," she says, "that my lads appreciated the best poetry, and any tale of heroism and self-sacrifice won their hearts and held their attention."

Miss Swanwick also took great interest in the opening of Queen's College in 1847, and Bedford College in 1850. She cared much for the higher education of women, and did all in her power for its promotion.

In an address given at Bedford College, Miss Swanwick gives advice to the women students, of which her own life was a realisation :—

> Students are to be found distinguished for their classical and mathematical attainments, who at the same time are unconscious of the wide realms of intellectual culture which lie beyond their own comparatively narrow sphere. Such one-sided culture tends to bring the so-called higher education of women into disrepute. . . . Above all, let a woman remember that her happiness and success in life will depend, not upon the mere acquisition of knowledge, but upon the cultivation of what has been justly styled "mental hospitality," together with a large and warm-hearted sympathy with her fellow-creatures. She must bear in mind that though she be conversant with the language of the Greeks or Romans, and though she understand the mysteries of the higher mathematics, and have not charity, in the broadest sense of the word, it will profit her comparatively little.

"She was eager to learn the notes of progress in politics, science, religion and literature in the Old World and the New, to listen to an account of any new theory or discovery, and to sympathise with the interests of all with whom she came in contact." "It was striking," says Lady Huggins, "how universal were her interests, and her eager desire to know of the newer developments in subjects which had special interest for her was remarkable. She gave the impression that she knew you had much to say of interest and was anxious to hear it. She at once established a sympathetic atmosphere." It is not to be wondered at that with such sympathy and such powers Miss Swanwick was for years at the head of an informal salon, where many of the leaders of thought and action in London delighted to meet.

---

* "Anna Swanwick." A Memoir and Recollections, 1813—1899. Compiled by her Niece, Mary L. Bruce. With Portraits. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s. net.)

† The Memoir says 1831, by mistake.

We receive beautiful glimpses of the inner home life, from which it is evident that behind her love of books, her philanthropies, and wide social connection there was a devoted love to her relatives and nearest friends which was at the centre of her life. When in 1879 her sister Catherine lost her sight, Miss Swanwick "gave up in a great measure her social and public engagements and the time for her own work, and with beautiful unselfishness devoted herself for the next four years to the care and amusement of her sister."

Miss Swanwick, like Cephalus in her favourite Plato, enjoyed old age. In 1898 she writes :—

> With regard to myself being in my eighty-fifth year, I feel that my working days are over ; nevertheless, I recognise with joy that with advancing age my sense of the wonderful beauty of the universe as seen in the infinitely great and the infinitely little grows more and more intense, and this joy is heightened by the recognition that our Heavenly Father reveals Himself to His children's hearts through the marvellous beauty of His glorious works.

"She retained this beautiful joyousness of spirit," says Miss Bruce, "to the last day of her life."

We can only conclude as we began, by thanking Miss Bruce for giving us such a true and simple picture of a noble life.

H. Gow.

THE NEW EDUCATIONAL METHOD.*

One of the most encouraging signs of the times is what, for want of a better term, may be called a certain visual refinement. This is evident in many directions. Our artists expend themselves less and less on great canvases, preferring little bits of light and shade, exquisite transcripts of the commonplace. The novel of observation, as we might call it, with its subtle romance and fidelity to fact, has superseded its predecessor of obvious colouring and conventional personæ. The florid and fervid pages of Macaulay and the dynamics of Carlyle have alike yielded to a treatment of history which, if not more intrinsically accurate, is at least a more sincere attempt to realise the life of the past. The increasing popularity of such books as those of Richard Jefferies in this country and Mr. W. J. Long in America is further evidence of the same tendency, viz., a discernment of and interest in commonplace things formerly passed by in favour of coarser and more striking objects.

Perhaps, however, the best evidence of this refinement is to be seen in the nature study that is so fast coming into recognition as an educational method. Instead of picking up a smattering of "natural history" by means of crude pictures of Polar bears and elephants, children are encouraged to observe the common objects about them. The simple flora of town gardens, the lichens on the copings of even the dismalest area are found to afford material not only for wonder — itself, according to Johnson, one of the chief agents in mental development — but for the systematic training of the eye and mind. It is a great thing to have the educational medium thus brought down from the unfamiliar to the familiar, or, rather, to have the eyes opened to what, though a part of the common environment, has hitherto been unfamiliar as the Antipodes.

Mr. Stenhouse's book is thus a sign of the times, and would, were it no more, deserve the attention of all who are interested in the modern movement. But it is more than this. It is by far the most considerable, as well as concise attempt we have seen to give systematic expression to this method.

The aim of nature study (he says) is not primarily the acquisition of the facts of natural history ; it is rather a training in methods of open-eyed, close, and accurate observation, especially of familiar animals and plants, which shall teach the student to see what he looks at, and to think about what he sees.

Nothing could better illustrate this definition than the method Mr. Stenhouse pursues. Each chapter and section of chapter consists of two parts, the first of which gives precise instruction for elemenmentary observations and experiments. The design of these is to exercise the reasoning faculties :—

> The student should get into the habit of asking the reasons for all the differences and resemblances which he notices. To learn what these reasons are he must observe closely, think carefully, and then make experiments to test the accuracy of his conclusions. "Be sure you are right! then look again"—(the motto of Professor Comstock) —should be his motto.

The second or descriptive portion consists in a discussion with the teacher of the meaning and relation of the results thus obtained. Of this twofold method we select a single example from "The Early Stages of Growth of Maize and Wheat" :—

> Watch for the appearance of the roots. Is there, as in the seedlings previously studied, one principal root, or are there several, all apparently of equal or nearly equal importance? Do the roots grow straight down . . . or do they spread horizontally?
>
> Notice that a rod, somewhat thicker than a root, grows out near the origin of the roots, and curves upwards towards the light. When this is about an inch long on a maize seedling, slit it open carefully and observe that it consists of a pale outer sheath and a green core. The sheath is the single cotyledon ; the green core is the young stem enclosed in a young foliage leaf. Cut open the grain and notice how the endosperm (previously explained) has shrivelled. As the seedlings become larger watch the young stem growing out at the end of its sheathing cotyledon. What is the length of the cotyledon when the stem first appears (a) in the maize, (b) in the wheat?
>
> As soon as a foliage leaf unfolds, make a careful drawing of its shape. Contrast it with the young foliage leaves of other seedlings. Hold up the leaves to the light and compare the arrangement of their veins.

This is the first part of the method intended to guide the student's own observation. Of the second or discursive part which immediately follows in larger type, and with abundant illustrations, we shall select an example presently.

The obvious utility of the method thus indicated is that it compels the student to use his own eyes, and to take nothing for granted. The attention is thus secured not by exhaustive efforts at memorising, but by the encouraging co-operation of hand and eye. In this way as in no other the student is made to teach himself, and value the results so gained, while the teacher takes his true place as helper and guide. What may be termed the moral benefit of such instruction cannot fail to be seen. The student becomes habituated to think for himself, and to depend entirely upon his reason. Such a method, if we mistake not, is the best antidote alike for authority and mental untidiness in the further things of life.

Mr. Stenhouse writes as a student to students, animated with a fresh and vivid interest in all he describes. Thus the volume is not only penetrated with method, but promises to supply in no small degree the enthusiasm necessary for the study. The twenty-one chapters, divided about equally between plant life and animal life, are full of the results of keen observation and first-hand knowledge. The style of the discursive portions is clear and simple, and in frequent instances the author passes beyond the elementary observations of the student to suggest maturer trains of thought. Take, e.g., his comment on the inherited habits of the cat and dog :—

> We will first see how the ancestral custom of living in organised packs has left its impress on the instincts of the domesticated dog. The first essential to the success of any community of animals—whether these are bees or rooks, wolves or men—is that all the creatures composing it shall conform to certain rules, which have for their object the good of the community and not merely that of the individual. Acts which promote the well-being of the society as a whole are good. . . . Acts which tend to injure the society as such are bad, and inevitably bring punishment either to the individual offender or, what is worse, to his pack. A distinction between right and wrong is thus established which would be impossible to any animal living so solitary a life that its acts affected only itself. In this manner were aroused the social instinct, the love of praise and dread of shame, the lifelong attachment to early friends, and almost all the other qualities which have so endeared the dog to mankind ; because these qualities resulted naturally from the ancestral pack life. Left to itself, the dog loses its nerve, for it is by nature unfitted for a solitary life. What more woe-begone animal is ever seen than a lost dog?
>
> Contrast the cat in this respect. It is at heart an outlaw, like its wild ancestors ; recognising in general no law but that of its own ease and gratification. Its social instinct is almost absent ; and though it sometimes displays affection to people who pet it, the cat is, as a rule, more attached to places than to persons. It retains, too, the independence and versatility which are developed by a solitary life. A lost cat can usually take care of itself and find sufficient food; and cases are not uncommon of cats having comfortable homes and choosing to live wild lives in the woods.

* "An Introduction to Nature Study." By Ernest Stenhouse, B.Sc., A.R.C.S. (London: Macmillan and Co., 1903. Pp. vii. and 422. 3s. 6d.)

It is evidently Mr. Stenhouse's aim to show the continuity of all forms of organic life. And thus the botany and zoology sections of the book form one biological whole. This also is an admirable feature. But while this logical sequence is preserved, numerous cross references render it easy for the student to take up the study at any point, as his interest may prompt. The principle of illustration, as expressing what cannot well be expressed by words, is adhered to throughout, and the selection and printing of the illustrations deserves special comment. We must congratulate Mr. Stenhouse on having produced a really valuable educative aid based on lines at once broad and natural.

T. J. HARDY.

OBITUARY.

LIEUT.-COL. HENRY TURNER, J.P.

THE bearer of an honoured name, himself held in high honour in our community, Lieut.-Colonel Henry Turner, of Stockport, passed away on Sept. 18, at the age of sixty-nine. Born in 1834, he was the fourth son of James Aspinall Turner, M.P., and great-great-grandson of a former minister of Preston Chapel. He was brought up in the best traditions of our Liberal Nonconformist fellowship, to which he remained faithful to the end. He was a lay-student in Manchester New College during the closing years of its settlement in Manchester, before the removal to London in 1853, and in that year took the B.A. degree in the University of London. Entering business as a calico printer, he became the head of the firm of Turner, Norris & Turner, of Manchester, and of the Kinder Printworks, Hayfield. He threw himself enthusiastically into the Volunteer movement, and won prizes and laurels for himself as one of the best shots in the country. He subsequently joined the Cheshire Militia, and retired in 1889 as Lieutenant-Colonel. He was for thirty-four years resident at Stockport, where he took a leading position in public life. An earnest Liberal in politics, he entered the Town Council in 1877, and served as Mayor in 1891, when he scandalised a good many pious people by inviting the Corporation to accompany him in an official visit to the Unitarian Church where he habitually worshipped. He was a magistrate not only for Stockport but also for Lancashire and Derbyshire. A staunch supporter of his Alma Mater, Mr. Turner was also a vice-president of the Home Missionary College, and took a constant interest in denominational affairs. He was one of the pillars of the Stockport church and will be greatly missed.

The funeral was at the Manchester Crematorium on Monday, Sept. 21, and on the following Sunday the Rev. B. C. Constable preached a memorial sermon in the Stockport church, in which he spoke in terms of honour and affection of their deceased friend.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

I.—INTODUCTION.

SERMON is another word for Talk, and Mount is another word for Mountain, and the Sermon on the Mount is simply the Talk on the Mountain. Or we may speak of it as the Teaching on the Hill, which followed the Preaching by the Lake. Jesus, seeing the multitudes, "went up into the mountain." The mountain was the high land on the western side of the Sea of Galilee. He went up really to rest, and to escape for a little time from the crowd. But there were some who would not let him leave them. They followed him up the slope, and then it was that he did what he could not do on the crowded plain below—he "sat down and taught." The people who wanted to hear more about the Good News of the Kingdom of God are called "disciples" or "learners." It was to them that Jesus spoke.

Two accounts of the Sermon have come down to us. One is given in the fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters of St. Matthew's Gospel; the other in St. Luke's Gospel—chiefly in the sixth chapter—but parts are found in scattered verses of other chapters. You will find it useful to put the chapters and verses together in the following order, to correspond with the order given in the First Gospel:—vi. 20–49; xiv. 34, 35; xi. 33; xvi. 17; xii. 58, 59; xvi. 18; vi. 27–36; xi. 1–4, 34–36; xvi. 13; xii. 22–34; vi. 37–42; xi. 9–13; xiii. 24–27; vi. 43–49.

What is the Sermon? What is it about? It is the Law of the New Commandment, and answers to the Law of the Old Commandment in the Old Testament. That law was also said to have been given on a mountain—Mount Sinai (Exodus xx.); but could any two scenes be more unlike—Sinai, with its thunderings and lightnings, and noise of a trumpet, and the mountain smoking, and the people standing afar off, and the Mount of the Beatitudes, as it was afterwards called, with its sunny slopes and its blue sky, and the greatest of human voices breaking the stillness of the air?

Inside the circle of the "disciples" was another group, that of the "Apostles." They were, as you know, twelve in number. They had been called, one and two and three at a time, and then had been solemnly appointed to be Christ's "messengers," or "delegates," to go wherever he might choose to send them. Four separate lists of their names are given, in Matthew x. 2–4; Mark iii. 16–19; Luke vi. 14–16; Acts i. 13; but you will remember them more easily if you place first those who are believed to have been brothers, in three pairs:—

(1) PETER, (2) ANDREW } Sons of Jonas.
(3) JAMES, (4) JOHN } Sons of Zebedee.
(5) JAMES, the Little, (6) JUDAS (brother? of James) } Sons of Alphæus.

These six are supposed to have lived at Capernaum, on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, which was also Christ's place of abode, "His own city."

Next will come:—

(7) PHILIP, of Bethsaida, also on the western shore.

(8) BARTHOLOMEW, of Cana of Galilee, if identical with Nathanael (John i. 45).

(9) MATTHEW, of Capernaum, collector in the toll-office of that town; possibly the same as Levi in Luke v. 27.

(10) THOMAS, or Didymus; both names signifying a twin-brother.

(11) SIMON, the Cananæan, or Zealot (Luke vi. 15).

(12) JUDAS ISCARIOT. If Iscariot means "the man of Kerioth" (Joshua xv. 25), Judas must have stood alone amongst the Twelve, for in Acts ii. 7 the Eleven are all spoken of as Galilæans, and Kerioth was in the extreme south of Palestine.

Peter was probably the eldest of the twelve Apostles. He and the two sons of Zebedee were the trusted Three, who were present at the Raising of Jairus' Daughter, at the Scene of the Transfiguration, and during the Agony in the Garden. Once in the Fourth Gospel, and several times in two of St. Paul's Epistles, he is called Cephas ("Rock"), and this was the name actually given to him by Jesus in Matthew xvi. 18, Peter (Rock or Stone), being the Greek word afterwards used to explain it. Similarly, James and John are called Boanerges, "Sons of Thunder" (Mark iii. 17), perhaps, because of their fiery zeal.

The Sermon was spoken in the Aramean, or Syrian, dialect. This was the common speech of the country. In the Greek translation, two Aramaic words were left just as they were spoken, and they appear also in our English version—Raca (Matthew v. 22) and Mammon vi. 24). With foreigners Jesus spoke Greek, and Hebrew he must have known, or he could not, in the synagogue, have "stood up to read," but Aramaic was the language of his home, and of his early days, and in no other tongue would he have expressed himself so freely, and so easily; it was the speech he loved best.

Among the field-labourers, and vine-dressers, and fishing-folk, who gathered round, there may have been some children. If there were any, they sat at the Teacher's feet, as they did in school.

We have now set before us the scene, and the speaker, and the audience. Next week, we will begin our study of the Sermon itself.

E. P. B.

THE STORM.

O FOOLS! to hear not in the gale
A music sounding down the skies;
We turn from Heaven's great symphonies
A broken flower-pot to bewail.

H. M. L.

WE are glad to hear from Signor Bracciforti, of Milan, that "the excellent Italian weekly Il Rinnovamento" has published an appreciative notice of our recent international meetings at Amsterdam, quoting the fundamental purpose of the Council, and telling briefly of the proceedings.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—A. B.; E. S. L. B.; J. B.; W. H. D.; H. J. E.; E. S. H.; S. H. (Dacca); T. L. H.; F. L.; T. M.; C. I, P. R.; J. R.

The Inquirer.

ESTABLISHED 1842.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE INQUIRER can be had by order of any Newsagent in the United Kingdom, or direct from the Publisher, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. If by post, the prepaid terms are:—

	s.	d.
PER QUARTER	1	8
PER HALF-YEAR	3	4
PER YEAR	6	6

One Shilling per year extra will be charged if credit is taken.

Advertisements for THE INQUIRER should be addressed to the PUBLISHER, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and should reach the office not later than Twelve o'clock on THURSDAY, to appear the same week.

All payments in respect to THE INQUIRER to be made to E. KENNEDY, 3, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

LONDON, OCTOBER 3, 1903.

THE CALL TO SERVICE.

WITH October, our churches enter with the full measure of their strength upon a new year of work, which begins after the holiday season, and continues through the strenuous winter months and the glory of the springtime, until summer calls again for rest and the delightful restoratives which Nature offers—and offers most abundantly to those who throw themselves most heartily into their life-work.

We have come back from the country now—most of us—and our faces are set to the duties of a new season's work. We have brought back many glorious memories, and energies renewed by that silent ministry, which GOD has given to Mother Nature for the building up of true men; and these gifts, and the deepened joy of human fellowship, are now to be consecrated in the field of our special service.

Consecrated, used, and enriched they are to be, both in our worship and our work. And the first thought at this moment, the first aspiration, must be for the renewal and the deepening of the spirit of worship in our churches. In them is the centre of our union, the home of our affections, the fountain of our strength. Into the House of Prayer we bring all the memories of what we have enjoyed, of what we have learnt; there we realise together the meaning of our brotherhood, the great purpose of our life; there all spiritual energies find utterance, come to a full consciousness, and in worship, in surrender to the Divine Will, receiving fresh enlightenment and impulse for devoted service, renew the manhood which is to be used in the world's work, and better equipped to meet the demands of the Kingdom of GOD.

We must seek for greater quietness in the deeper places of our hidden life, where we are with GOD, where the strength of His righteousness makes us strong, and the joy of communion, in the assurance of His unchanging love, brings light and hope into the darkest places of our life. The prophet's word of faith is still potent to stir in us the better manhood; the secret of CHRIST'S unselfishness, the surrender of perfect love, can still lift up the humblest life to a divine benignity and helpfulness, bearing witness, as nothing else, to the presence of the Holiest amid the affairs of this our life on earth. All the wealth of such communion and worship, all the gladness of such human fellowship, and renewed dedication to the true ideal of service, we must now seek again as we come together in our churches, and from that centre seek to lay the firmest hold upon the duties of the hour.

